The modalities for the delivery of parts of the Heavenly Book have been interpreted by each community, raised and guided by a prophet, as the absolute expression of God Himself. The cultural, linguistic, and social aspects of these modalities were unthinkable in the mythical framework of knowledge particular to people who received the “revelations.” When theologians came to systematize in conceptual, demonstrative ways the relations between the Word of God (Umm al-Kitab) and its manifested forms in Hebrew, Aramaic, and Arabic, they used either literalist exegesis of the scripture itself or rational categories and procedures influenced by Greek philosophy. Grammar and logic have been used as two different ways to reach and to deliver the meaning of the manifested revelation in relation to the grammatical and logical “reading,” but they did not lead to a radical critique of the postulates used in the different exegeses developed in the Middle Ages. This issue needs to be rethought today in light of the new knowledge of language, mind, logic, and history, which means that all the ancient exegesis has to be reworked, too. We are obliged today to consider differently the second meaning of the concept of Book in our expression “Societies of the Book.” The Mu’tazila touched on this point in their theory of God’s created speech. The Mushaf, as well as the Bible, are the manifested, incarnated word of God in human languages, transmitted orally by human voices, or fixed in written material. One has to answer here to a Christian objection on the specificity of Christian revelation made through Jesus as the incarnated God, not through human mediators. As I said, this is a difference in modality, not in the relation between the Heavenly Book and its terrestrial manifestations through religious imaginaire. Theological theorization transformed into substantial transcendental truths revealed by God what, in fact, had been historical, social, and cultural events and manifestations. The delivery of the Word of God by Jesus in a given society and period of history, using the Aramaic language, is a historical event just like the delivery of the Qur’an by Muhammad. That Jesus is presented as the “Son of God” and the Qur’an a speech worded by God Himself are theological definitions used in systems of beliefs and non-beliefs particular to Christian and Islamic dogma. These definitions do not change the linguistic and historical fact that the messages of Jesus, Muhammad, (and, of course, the prophets of Israel) are transmitted in human languages and collected in an “orthodox” closed corpus (Bible, Gospels, and Qur’an) in concrete historical conditions. Then, the Heavenly Book is accessible to the believers only through the written version of the books or scriptures adopted by the three communities. This second aspect of the Book is then submitted to all the constraints of arbitrary historicity. The books or scriptures are read and interpreted by the historical communities in concrete, changing, social, political, and cultural situations.

The societies where the Book—or Holy Scriptures—is used as the revelation of the divine will developed a global vision of the world, history, meaning, and human destiny by the use of hermeneutic procedures. All juridical, ethical, political, and intellectual norms had to be derived from the textual forms of the revelation. The Torah, Canon Law, and the shari’a have been elaborated on the basis of the same vision of revealed Truth and “rational” procedures from which norms have been derived. There is a common conception of human destiny commanded by the eschatological perspective (the search for salvation by obedience to God’s will) and guided in this world by the norms of the law.

The new dimension which I aim to explain by the concept of the Societies of the Book is the process of historicization of a divine category: Revelation. The believers in the three religions claim, even in the context of our secularized culture, that divine law derived from Revelation is not subject to historicity. It cannot be changed by any human legislation and it is a totally rationalized law. Scientific knowledge cannot demonstrate that this belief is based on a wrong assumption, but it can explain how it is possible psychologically to maintain the affirmation of a revealed law in the form presented in the Torah, Canon Law, and the shari’a, against the evidence of its historicity.

Traditional theological thought has not used the concept of social imaginaire and the related notions of myth, symbol, sign, or metaphor in the new meanings already mentioned. It refers constantly to reason as the faculty of true knowledge, differentiated from knowledge based on the representations of the imagination. The methodology elaborated and used by jurists-theologians shares with the Aristotelian tradition the same postulate of rationality as founding the true knowledge and excluding the constructions of the imagination. In fact, an analysis of the discourse produced by both trends of thinking—the theological and the philosophical—reveals a simultaneous use of reason and imagination. Beliefs and convictions are often used as “arguments” to “demonstrate” propositions of knowledge. In this stage of thinking, metaphor is understood and used as a rhetorical device to add an aesthetic emotion to the real content of the words; it was not perceived in its creative force as a semantic innovation or in its power to shift the discourse to a global metaphorical organization requiring the full participation of a coherent imagination. The philosophers, however, recognized the power that imagination as a faculty of privileged knowledge bestowed on the Prophet especially. [Abu ‘Ali al-Husayn] Ibn Sina [980–1037] and [Abu Bakr Muhammad] Ibn Tufayl [died 1185] used this faculty in each of their accounts of Hayy ibn Yaqzan [character in a philosophical allegory], but this did not create a trend comparable to the logocentrism of the jurists, the theologians, and the falasifa who favored Aristotelianism.

This lack of attention to the imagination did not prevent the general activity of social imaginaire—the collective representations of the realities according to the system of beliefs and non-beliefs introduced by revelation in the Societies of the Book. The social imaginaire is partially elaborated and controlled by the ‘ulama’ with their ‘Aqa’id [Creeds] (like the one written by Ibn Batta [917–997], French translation by H. Laoust, La profession de foi d’Ibn Batta [The Profession of Faith of Ibn Batta], Damascus, Syria [Institut franyais de Damas], 1958); but it is structured as well by beliefs and representations taken from the cultures preceding Islam. In all Islamic societies, there are two levels of traditions—the deepest archaic level going back to the jahiliya of each society and the more recent level represented by Islamic beliefs, norms, and practices as they have been developed since the foundation of the Muslim state. The revealed Book assumed a great importance because it provided a strategy of integration for all norms, beliefs, and practices proper to each social group. This means that the social imaginaire is generated by the interacting layers of traditions, so that it is not correct from an anthropological point of view to describe the Societies of the Book as if they were produced exclusively by the Book used as their constitution. The revealed Book had an influence on all cultural activities and political institutions to some extent. It generated a civilization of written culture opposed to, or differentiated from, the oral civilization.

The key to the Societies of the Book is thus the intensive dialectic developed everywhere between two strongly competitive forces: On the one hand, there is the state using the phenomenon of the Book in its two dimensions—the transcendent, divine, ontological message and the written literature and culture derived from it. This comprises the official culture produced and used under the ideological supervision of the state, that is, the orthodox religion defined and enforced by doctors of law (jurists-theologians). On the other hand, there are the non-integrated, resisting groups using oral, non-official culture and keeping alive non-orthodox beliefs (called heresies and condemned by the official ‘ulama’). The struggle between the reformed church and the Catholic church in the 16th century is a typical example of this competition. In Islam, we have many examples in history from the first century to the contemporary revivalist movements. The segmentary groups perpetuating oral cultures and traditions and adhering to archaic beliefs under the name of Islam, have resisted to their integration into the Muslim state. This is why the ‘ulama’—ancient and contemporary—regularly condemned the “superstitions” and “heresies” of these groups, as long as they resisted the norms of the Societies of the Book.

This model is more than a contemplative Weltanschauung; it is and remains an active paradigm of historical action with which the Societies of the Book generated their structure and destiny. Religions are superior to any scientific theory because they give imaginative solutions to permanent issues in human life, and they mobilize the social imaginaire with beliefs, mythical explanations, and rites. (For more explanations, see my Lectures du Coran.)

 5. Strategies for Deconstruction

Thus far, we have presented elements and forces acting in the Societies of the Book. This is not sufficient for thinking in new ways about the opposition between Societies of the Book and secularized societies. Thinking about this opposition is thinking from a new perspective about human destiny with two major historical results. The Societies of the Book, as well as the secularized societies, have shown the intellectual limits and the empirical failures of their respective paradigms for historical action.

Thinking about our new historical situation is a positive enterprise. We are not aiming for a negative critique of the previous attempts at the emancipation of human existence as much as we wish to propose relevant answers to pending and pressing questions. This is why we prefer to speak about a strategy for deconstruction. We need to deconstruct the social imaginaire structured over centuries by the phenomenon of the Book as well as the secularizing forces of the material civilization[398] since the 17th century.

We speak of one social imaginaire because secularization has not totally eliminated from any society all the elements, principles, and postulates organizing the social imaginaire in the Societies of the Book.

This is, I know, a controversial point among historians. Karl Lowith (Meaning in History, 1968) has shown that so-called modern ideas are just the secularized reshaping and re-expressing of medieval Christian ideas. More recently, Regis Debray (Critique de la raison politique [Critique of Political Reason], Paris: Gallimard, 1981) underlined the Christian origins of the present socialist utopia.

Hans Blumenberg tried to refute these positions in his dissertation on The Legitimacy of the Modern Age (Cambridge, Mass.: MIT Press, 1983). He showed how modernity is an alternative to Christian medieval conceptions. According to him, the modern idea of progress is the product of an imminent process of development rather than a messianic one. Long-term scientific progress guided by pluralist method and experimentation, continuity of problems rather than solutions, and history as a positive whole process cut from the transcendent God, are characteristics of the modern age. Should one, then, accept the definition of secularization as a long-term process through which religious ties, attitudes toward transcendence, the expectation of an afterlife, ritual performances, firmly established forms of speech, a typical structure of the individual imaginaire, specific articulation and use of reason and imagination, become a private concern separated from public life? One could add the triumph of pragmatism, which gives priority to action over contemplation, verification over truth, method over system, logic over rhetoric, future over past, and becoming over being.

Along this line of thinking, secularization is usually presented as one of the following: a decaying of the former capacity for receiving divine inspiration and guidance; a cultural and political program of emancipation from theological thinking and ecclesiastical dominance; the domination of nature to increase the powers of man; or the substitution of a public system of education for the private one. This is known in France as laicite, which often has been expressed as a militant attitude against the religious vision of the world, as we saw during 1982–1983 when the socialist government wanted to “unify” the national educational system (see Guy Gautier, La laicite en miroir [Secularism in the Mirror], Paris: Grasset, 1985).

Whatever the relevance of these observations to the long-term process of change undertaken first in Western societies and extended more and more to the rest of the world, two remarks are in order. First, references to traditional religions—especially the three revealed religions—are frequent and even dominating everywhere. Second, secular “religions,” like fascism, Stalinism, and Maoism, are produced by contemporary societies and govern the social imaginaire with their so-called values, norms, aims, beliefs, and representations. Secularism appears, then, as a change of methods, styles, procedures, and forms of expression in human existence; but it does not affect the ultimate force structuring and generating the human condition through the existential and historical process.

How can we obtain a clear vision of this force and describe it? Religions have mobilized it, shaped it, and formulated it by using various cultural systems, myths, rites, beliefs, and institutions. Modern ideologies do the same by using secularized languages and collective organizations. What is the common unifying reality of all these religious and ideological constructions? To answer this question we must avoid the usual opposition between the “true” religious teaching and the “false” secularist conceptions. We will be better able to discover the reality if we deconstruct methodically all the manifested cultural constructions in the various societies. Returning to the Societies of the Book, we can show a deep, common mechanism described by Marcel Gauchet (Le desenchantement du monde [The Disenchantment of the World], Paris: Gallimard, 1985) as “the debt of meaning.”

All known societies are built on an order, a hierarchy of values and powers maintained and enforced by a political power. On what conditions is a political power accepted and obeyed by the members of the society? How is it legitimized? There is no possible legitimation of any exercised power without an authority spontaneously internalized by each individual as an ultimate reference to the absolute truth. In traditional societies, authority is the privilege of a charismatic leader able to mediate the meaning located in an extra- or super-worldliness, meaning possessed by a god (or gods), and this leader delivers it in various ways to human beings. Thus, this process creates a recognition of debt in each individual consciousness and, consequently, an adherence to all the commandments of the leader.

The example of Islam gives a clear illustration of this general mechanism, one which is at the same time psychological, social, political, and cultural. A very small group of believers followed Muhammad, a charismatic leader related to the known paradigm of prophets and messengers of God in the history of salvation common to the “People of the Book.” Muhammad, supported and inspired by God, had the ability to create a new relationship to the divine through two simultaneous and interacting initiatives as all charismatic leaders do with different levels of success and innovation. He announced the absolute truth in an unusual Arabic form of expression, and he engaged the group in successive, concrete experiences of social, political, and institutional change. The Revelation translated into a sublime, symbolic, and transcendental language the daily public life of the group whose identity and imaginaire were separated from the hostile, non-converted groups (called infidels, hypocrites, enemies of God, errants, and bedouins). We can follow in the Qur’an the growth of a new collective social-cultural imaginaire nourished by new systems of connotation whose semantic substance was not primarily an abstract vision of an idealistic dreaming mind but the historic crystallization of events shared at the time by all the members of the group.

The “debt of meaning” incurred in such conditions is the most constraining for the individuals who are the actors of their own destiny. The relation to the source of authority is not separated from obedience to the political power exercised in the name of this authority. But already, in this first stage of setting up and internalizing the debt of meaning, we must pay special attention to a structural process not yet deconstructed by historians and anthropologists.

When we write the history of these twenty years (612–632) during which Muhammad created a new community, we mention the principal events in a narrative style. We neglect to point out the use made of these events by later generations of believers. In other words, how does the “debt of meaning” historically operate on the collective imaginaire to produce the concrete destiny of each group in each society? There is, in fact, a double line to follow in writing the history of societies commanded by an initial “debt of meaning” incurred in the Inaugural Age. The first is to index, describe, and articulate all the significant events and facts that occurred in each period; the second is to analyze the mental representations of these events, facts, and actions shaping the collective imaginaire which becomes the moving force of history. This study of psychological discussions of history is more explanatory than the positivist narration of “objective” history. It shows the powerful capacity of imagination to create symbolic figures and paradigms of meaning from very ordinary events and persons, at the first stage, then the transformation of these symbols into collective representations structuring the social imaginaire.

Thus, the idealized figures of Muhammad, ‘Ali [son-in-law of the Prophet, circa 596–661], Husayn [son of ‘Ali, 626–680], and other imams have been constructed to enlighten and legitimize the historical development of the community. The biographies (sira) of Muhammad and ‘Ali, as they have been fixed in the Sunni and Shi’i traditions, are the typical production of the same social imaginaire influenced by a highly elaborated mythical vision provided by the Qur’an. The whole Qur’anic discourse is already a perfect sublimation of the concrete history produced by the small group of “believers” in Mecca and Medina.

The point I want to make here is that historians of Islam, so far, have not considered the question of the imaginaire as an important historical field. I have mentioned this concept several times because it is unavoidable when we want to relate political, social, and cultural events to their psychological origins and impacts. The narrative history suggests that all the events are understandable according to a “rational” system of knowledge. No one historian raises the question: How does one rationalize, for example, the history of Salvation as it is proposed by the Holy Scriptures —Bible, Gospels, and Qur’an-and as it is received, integrated, and used by the individual and the collective imaginaire ? There is no possibility to interpret the whole literature derived from those Scriptures without taking into account the representations of Salvation perpetuated in the behaviors and the thinking activity of all believers, so that all history produced in the Societies of the Book is legitimized and assimilated by the imaginaire of Salvation, not by any “rational” construction. The theological and juridical systems elaborated by so-called “reason” are also related to the imaginaire of Salvation.

The writing and the understanding of the so-called “Islamic” history would change totally if we accept to open the field of research on social imaginaire, and the anthropological structures of this imaginaire as we can describe it, for example, through Ihya ‘uhim al-din of Ghazzali, the literature of Qur’an exegesis, the present discourse of Islamist movements (I refer to my essay, “L’Islam dans l’histoire” [Islam in History], in Maghreb-Mashreq, number 102, 1985).

 6. Revelation and History

The strategy of deconstruction leads to the ultimate decisive confrontation in the Societies of the Book. When we discover the function of social imaginaire as producing the history of the group, we cannot maintain the theory of revelation as it has been elaborated previously, that is, as images produced by the complex phenomenon of prophetic intervention.

The Qur’an insists on the necessity of man to listen. to be aware, to reflect, to penetrate, to understand, and to meditate. All these verbs refer to intellectual activities leading to a kind of rationalization based on existential paradigms revealed with the history of salvation. Medieval thought derived from this an essentialist, substantialist, and unchangeable concept of rationality guaranteed by a divine intellect. Modern knowledge, on the contrary, is based on the concept of social-historical space continuously constructed and deconstructed by the activities of the social actors. Each group fights to impose its hegemony over the others not only through political power (control of the state) but also through a cultural system presented as the universal one. Seen from this perspective, the Qur’an is the expression of the historical process which led the small group of believers to power. This process is social, political, cultural, and psychological. Through it, the Qur’an, presented as the revelation and received as such by the individual and the collective memory, is continuously reproduced, rewritten, reread, and re-expressed in a changing soci al-historical space.

History is the actual incarnation of the revelation as it is interpreted by the ‘ulama’ and preserved in the collective memory. Revelation maintains the possibility of giving a “transcendent” legitimization to the social order and the historical process accepted by the group. But this possibility can be maintained only as long as the cognitive system, based on social imaginaire, is not replaced by a new, more plausible rationality linked to a different organization of the social-historical space. This is one reason for the known opposition between falasifa and mutakallimun, or fuqaha’ [religious jurisprudents].

The struggle between the inherited thinkable and the not yet thought has become more intense in Muslim societies since the violent introduction of intellectual modernity; but, as we have seen, the same struggle between the paradigms of knowledge and action started in Western societies in the 16th century. The result has been the inversion of the priorities fixed by the revelation. Economic life and thought had been submitted to ethical-religious principles until the triumph of the capitalist system of production and exchange, which replaced the symbolic exchanges practiced in traditional societies with the rule of profit.

Within this new value system, ethical thinking has less relevance than the technical regulations of the market and the efficient control of productive forces. Democracy limits the source of authority to the acquiescence expressed in different circumstances of various professional or political groups. There is no longer any reference to the transcendental origin of authority. The question of revelation is thus eliminated; it is neither solved intellectually nor maintained as a plausible truth according to the pragmatic reason prevailing in so-called modern thought. All relations are based on the respective power of nations, groups, and individuals; ethical principles, founded on metaphysical or religious visions, lose their appeal. I do not mean that we have to go back to the “revealed” truth according to islahi thinking. I am stressing a major difficulty of our time: the rupture between ethics and materialism. At the same time, social imaginaire is not more controlled or used in a better way by “scientific” knowledge. Rather, it is mobilized more than ever by ideologues who take advantage of the modern mass media to disseminate slogans taken from religious (in Muslim societies) or secular ideologies, or from a mixture of both (in the so-called socialist regimes).

If we sum up the foregoing analysis and observations, we can stress the following propositions:

1. The social-historical space in which religions emerged, exercised their functions, and shaped cultures and collective sensibilities is being replaced by the secular positivist space of scientific knowledge, technological activities, material civilization, individual pragmatic ethics and law.

2. Scientific knowledge is divided into separate, technical, highly specialized disciplines. Religions, on the contrary, have provided global, unified, and unifying systems of beliefs and non-beliefs, knowledge and practice, as well as pragmatic solutions to the fundamental problems of human destiny: life, death, love, justice, hope, truth, eternity, transcendence, and the absolute. The nostalgia for a unified vision explains the re-emergence of religion.

3. Positivist scientific knowledge has discredited or eliminated religious functions in society without providing an adequate alternative to religion as a symbol of human existence and a source of unifying ethical values for the group. This happened in Western societies under the name of secularism (or laicisme in French), liberalism, and socialism.

4. Present thought has not yet recognized the positive aspect of secularism as a cultural and intellectual way to overcome fanatic divisions imposed by the dogmatic, superstitious use of religion. At the same time, the specific role of religion as a source for symbols in human existence also goes unrecognized.

5. Islam is not better prepared than Christianity to face the challenge of secularism, intellectual modernity, and technological civilization. The so-called religious revivalism is a powerful secular movement disguised by religious discourse, rites, and collective behaviors; but it is a secularization without the intellectual support needed to maintain the metaphysical mode of thinking and to search for an ethical coherence in human behavior. Theological and ethical thinking has reappeared in contemporary Islamic thought in the form of the ideology of liberation (political and economic). There is little intellectual concern with genuine religious issues like the consciousness of culpability, the eschatological perspective, or revelation as a springboard for mythical or symbolic thinking.

6. The concept that the Societies of the Book could help to build a new humanism which would integrate religions as cultures and not as dogmas for confessional groups (or tawa’if, as in Lebanon or Ireland) is not taken seriously either in theology or in the social scientific study of religions. But there is hope that semiotics and linguistics can create the possibility of reading religious texts in the new way we have mentioned.

7. The study of Islam today suffers particularly from the ideological obstacles created, since the 19th century, by the decay of the Muslim intellectual tradition, as it had developed from the first to the fifth century A.H., and by the economic pressure of the West, the general trend of positivist rationalism and material civilization, the powerful impact of demography since the late 1950s and the necessity of building a modern state and unifying the nation.

8. World system economists insist on the opposition between the center and the periphery. Likewise, in intellectual evolution, we should pay attention to the increasing domination of Western patterns of thought which have not been duly criticized, controlled, or mastered in Western societies themselves. Islam, which has a rich cultural tradition, is facing major issues in a generalized climate of semantic disorder; our thinking should be directed to the dangers resulting from this threat.

9. We should not forget that man agrees to obey, to be devoted, and to obligate his life when he feels a “debt of meaning” to a natural or a supernatural being. This may be the ultimate legitimacy of the state understood as the power accepted and obeyed by a group, community, or nation. The crisis of meaning started when each individual claimed himself as the source of all or true meaning; in this case, there is no longer any transcendent authority. Relations of power are substituted for relations of symbolic exchanges of meaning. To whom do we owe a “debt of meaning”?

It is our responsibility to answer this question after man has changed himself by his own initiatives, discoveries, performances, and errors. It seems that the answer will be conjectural and more and more bound to empirical research instead of to divine guidance taught by traditional religions. I learned through the Algerian war of liberation how all revolutionary movements need to be backed by a struggle for meaning, and I discovered how meaning is manipulated by forces devoted to the conquest of power. The conflict between meaning and power has been, is, and will be the permanent condition through which man tries to emerge as a thinking being.

In the full light of this experience, the question arises again: Should we Islamicize knowledge according to the revealed discourse, or should we consider Islam in the context of a universal quest for meaning? Many paths are open again. Let us explore them with confidence, hope, and lucidity.

 24—Shari’a and Basic Human Rights Concerns

‘Abdullahi Ahmed An-Na’im

‘Abdullahi Ahmed An-Na’im (Sudan-United States, born 1946) is a legal scholar and human-rights activist. He was until recently head of Africa Watch, a human-rights organization in Washington, D.C. He received law degrees from the University of Khartoum in the Sudan and Cambridge University in England and a doctorate in law from the University of Edinburgh in Scotland. He has taught at law schools in the Sudan, Canada, and the United States. An-Na’im’s legal training may define his work less than his identity as a prominent follower of Mahmoud Mohamed Taha (see chapter 28), an innovative—some would say heterodox—Islamic reformer, whose work An-Na’im has translated into English. He has focused his own contributions on the compatibility of Taha’s interpretation of Islam and Western notions of human rights.[399]

Some of the issues discussed [in earlier chapters of An-Na’im’s book] in relation to constitutionalism and criminal justice can be seen as issues of human rights in the domestic context of the modern nation-state. In that context, however, they are commonly known as fundamental constitutional rights. As used in this chapter, the term human rights refers to those rights recognized by and promoted through international law and institutions. Thus, although fundamental constitutional rights and international human rights are both concerned with the same type of claim or entitlement, the former deals with these claims and/or entitlements in the context of a domestic legal system while the latter deals with them in the context of the international legal system.

In accordance with the fundamental purpose of this book—to enable Muslims to exercise their right to self- determination without violating the rights of others to the same—this chapter will attempt to identify areas of conflict between shari’a [Islamic law] and universal standards of human rights and seek a reconciliation and positive relationship between the two systems. The hypothesis of this chapter, like that of the preceding chapters, is that if they implement historical shari’a, Muslims cannot exercise their right to self-determination without violating the rights of others. It is possible, however, to achieve a balance within the framework of Islam as a whole by developing appropriate principles of modern Islamic public law.

Stating the objectives of the chapter in this way raises the initial question of the relevance of so-called universal human rights to shari’a, or for that matter to Islam itself. Why should universal human rights be a criterion for judging shari’aand an objective of modern Islamic public law?

 Universality of Human Rights

Article 1.3 of the Charter of the United Nations ... imposes on all members of the United Nations the obligation to cooperate in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex (gender), language, or religion. But the charter did not define the terms human rights and fundamental freedoms. That task was undertaken by the United Nations in a series of declarations, conventions, and covenants drafted and adopted since 1948.[400] The U.N. human rights documents and regional documents of Europe, the Americas, and Africa[401] all have the same premise—that there shall be universal standards of human rights which must be observed by all countries of the world, or countries of the region in the case of regional documents.

There is some debate as to the genuine universality of some of these standards,[402] and there are some serious problems of enforcement. This does not mean, however, that there are no universal and binding standards or that enforcement efforts should be abandoned. The position adopted here is that there are certain universal standards of human rights which are binding under international law and that every effort should be made to enforce them in practice. Thus the principle of respect for and protection of human rights has been described as jus cogens, that is, such a fundamental principle of international law that states may not repudiate by their agreement.[403] This would, of course, be true of respect for and protection of human rights in principle. It is easier to give examples of human rights of this stature, such as the prohibition of genocide and slavery, than to define the concept in a categorical fashion. Nevertheless, such a definition, or at least a criterion by which human rights may be identified, will be attempted below.

The main difficulty with working to establish universal standards across cultural, and particularly religious, boundaries is that each tradition has its own internal frame of reference because each tradition derives the validity of its precepts and norms from its own sources. If a cultural, especially religious, tradition relates to other traditions at all, it is likely to do so in a negative and perhaps even hostile way. To claim the loyalty and conformity of its members, a cultural or religious tradition would normally assert its own superiority over other traditions.[404]

Nevertheless, there is a common normative principle shared by all the major cultural traditions which, if construed in an enlightened manner, is capable of sustaining universal standards of human rights. That is the principle that one should treat other people as he or she wishes to be treated by them. This golden rule, referred to earlier as the principle of reciprocity, is shared by all the major religious traditions of the world. Moreover, the moral and logical force of this simple proposition can easily be appreciated by all human beings of whatever cultural tradition or philosophical persuasion.

It is not easy to place oneself in the exact position of another person, especially if that other person is of a different gender or religious belief.[405] The purpose of the principle of reciprocity, as applied to the present argument, is that one should try to achieve the closest possible approximation to placing oneself in the position of the other person. Assuming that one is in the exact position of the other person in all material respects, including gender and religious belief or other convictions, what basic human rights would one demand?

It should be emphasized that reciprocity is mutual so that when one identifies with another person, one would ascribe equivalent reciprocity to the belief system of the other person. Thus, when person X accepts the status or belief of person Y for the purposes of conceding Vs right to the same treatment which X would demand for himself, X would assume that Y accepts the same principle of reciprocity toward X by conceding to X the same rights he would demand for himself. In other words, X should not be entitled to deny Y's rights on the grounds that Y is unlikely to afford X the same rights because Y's belief system does not impose that obligation upon Y. If Y's belief system in fact fails to accord X the same rights, the answer would be for X to insist on reciprocity from Y rather than abdicate his obligation to afford Y the same rights he would claim for himself.

The problem with using the principle of reciprocity in this context is the tendency of cultural, and particularly religious, traditions to restrict the application of the principle to other members of its cultural or religious tradition, if not to a certain group within the given tradition.[406] The historical conception of the principle of reciprocity under shari'a did not apply to women and non-Muslims to the same extent that it applied to Muslim men.[407] In other words, by granting women and nonMuslims a lower status and sanctioning discriminatory treatment against them, shari'a denies women and non-Muslims the same degree of honor and human dignity it guarantees to Muslim men.

This general problem will have to be addressed within each cultural tradition. In the case of Islam, for example, one must be able to establish a technique for reinterpreting the basic sources, the Qur’an and sunna [practice of the Prophet], in a way that would enable us to remove the basis of discrimination against women and non-Muslims. The technique I find most promising has already been explained in [an earlier section] and applied to questions of constitutionalism, criminal justice, and international relations. In the remainder of this chapter, I hope to explain the inadequacy of shari’a as a basis for human rights in the Muslim context and propose an alternative Islamic foundation for universal human rights.

Without going into the details of arguments that may be too closely identified with a particular cultural tradition,[408] one can make the following basic transcultural justification for universal standards of human rights. The criteria I would adopt for identifying universal human rights is that they are rights to which human beings are entitled by virtue of being human. In other words, universal standards of human rights are, by definition, appreciated by a wide variety of cultural traditions because they pertain to the inherent dignity and well-being of every human being, regardless of race, gender, language, or religion.[409] It follows that the practical test by which these rights should be identified is whether the right in question is claimed by the particular cultural tradition for its own members. Applying the principle of reciprocity among all human beings rather than just among the members of a particular group, I would argue that universal human rights are those which a cultural tradition would claim for its own members and must therefore concede to members of other traditions if it is to expect reciprocal treatment from those others.

In content and substance, I submit that universal human rights are based on the two primary forces that motivate all human behavior, the will to live and the will to be free.[410] Through the will to live, human beings have always striven to secure their food, shelter, health, and all other means for the preservation of life. Moreover, people have always striven to improve the quality of their lives through the development and manipulation of available physical resources and through political struggle to achieve the fair and equitable distribution of wealth and power among the members of the particular community. At one level, the will to be free overlaps with the will to live, in that it is the will to be free from physical constraints and to be secure in food, shelter, health, and other necessities of a good life. At another level, the will to be free exceeds the will to live in that it is the driving force behind the pursuit of spiritual, moral, and artistic well-being and excellence.

The right to seek the satisfaction of the legitimate claims of these two forces is granted by every cultural tradition to its own members and must therefore, in accordance with the principle of reciprocity, be granted to the members of other traditions. This is, in my view, the basis of the universality of certain minimum human rights. By applying this simple criterion, we can identify those rights, claims, and entitlements that ought to be protected as human rights even if they are not identified as such by any formal document.

* Relevant Standards of Human Rights

Our primary concern here is to establish cross-cultural foundations for the universality of human rights. Consequently, other major and important issues, such as the relationship between strategic goals and tactical means, the question of hierarchy and trade-offs between different sets of rights, and the legitimacy of permitting derogations from certain obligations in times of emergency are not discussed in this book.

Being consistent with its own historical context, shari’a restricted the application of the principle of reciprocity in relation to women and non-Muslims. As frequently suggested throughout this book, the inadequacy of the public law of shari’a can only be understood and supplemented through a consideration of the impact of the historical context within which shari’a was constructed by the founding jurists of the eighth and ninth centuries A.D. out of the original sources of Islam. In that historical context, it was natural for the Muslim jurists to restrict the “other person” in the reciprocity rule to other Muslim men. This is a common feature of all historical cultural traditions and is also reflected in attitudes and policies of modern nation- states. It is for this aspect of the historical interpretation of the principle of reciprocity that I have said earlier that this principle can sustain universal human rights “if it is construed in an enlightened manner.” An enlightened construction would extend the “other person” to all human beings, regardless of gender, religion, race, or language.

If such an enlightened construction is to be effective in changing Muslim attitudes and policies, two conditions must be satisfied. First, the proposed broad construction of the other person has to be valid and credible from the Islamic point of view. This can be done only through Islamic arguments that repudiate the historical restrictive construction and support the alternative broader construction. Second, other cultural and religious traditions must undertake a similar process of enlightened construction. It seems to me that the historical restriction of the other person to male members of one's own culture was unavoidable when other cultural traditions practiced similar exclusion of women and nonmembers of the particular culture. It would therefore seem to follow that we need to overcome historical hostility and resentment through concurrent action, each working within his or her own cultural tradition toward the same goal.

In the following outline of the relevant universal human rights, it is useful to quote international custom and treaties that recognize these rights because they establish norms that are binding on Muslim states under international law. In quoting these documents, however, it is not suggested that the given rights are accepted as universal simply because they are recognized as such by the documents. Rather, the rights are recognized by the documents because they are universal human rights, that is, rights to which every human being is entitled by virtue of being human.

Slavery is one of the most serious impediments on both the will to live and the will to be free. Although it has been practiced by every major human civilization throughout history, slavery, in the sense of institutionalized and legal ownership of human beings as chattel, has finally come to be universally condemned and outlawed by both domestic and international law. [411] More effort is needed to eradicate all shades and forms of economic exploitation and degradation reminiscent of slavery. In the present context, however, we are concerned with slavery as a legal institution.

The abolition of slavery may well be the first example of the acceptance of an international human right as a limitation on domestic jurisdiction.[412] In other words, the antislavery movement established a precedent for recognizing the principle that the violation of a universal human right by one country is the legitimate concern of other countries.[413] As a result of this movement, a series of international agreements was concluded, culminating in one of the most widely ratified conventions condemning and prohibiting slavery under international law.[414] Moreover, several major international treaties have since reiterated the prohibition of slavery and required signatory states to outlaw and eliminate its practice in their domestic jurisdictions.[415]

Another early example of international cooperation in the field of human rights is the movement to eliminate the persecution of and discrimination against religious minorities.[416] Besides the moral abhorrence of such practices, persecution and discrimination on grounds of religion were perceived to be among the major causes of international conflict and war.[417] Consequently, a number of international treaties declared such persecution and discrimination a violation of human rights.[418]

A third area of emerging universal human rights, as defined above, is the prohibition of discrimination on grounds of gender. Although this right did not receive international attention as early as the other two rights, it has now come to be recognized as a universal human right under a variety of international conventions.[419]

The principle of nondiscrimination does not preclude all differential treatment on grounds such as race, gender, or religion. In this respect, I would agree with the proposition that one has to judge the nature of differential treatment in light of its purpose. “If the purpose or effect is to nullify or impair the enjoyment of human rights on an equal footing, the practice is discriminatory.”[420] In this way, one would accept action that has the purpose or effect of enhancing rather than impairing the enjoyment of human rights on an equal footing.[421] It is not necessary to go into these issues in detail in this context. What is being affirmed here is that discrimination on grounds such as gender and religion violates human rights....

 Shari’a and Human Rights

In [an earlier chapter] it was argued that the historical context within which shari’a was constructed and applied by the early Muslims explained and justified its sanction of Muslim antagonism toward non-Muslims and its countenance of the use of force against them. By the same token, shari’a‘s position on what is known in modern terminology as human rights was also justified by the historical context. During the formative stages of shari’a (and for the next millennium at least) there was no conception of universal human rights anywhere in the world. Slavery was an established and lawful institution in many parts of the world throughout this period. Until the 19th century A.D., moreover, it was normal throughout the world to determine a person’s status and rights by his religion. Similarly, up to the 20th century A.D., women were not normally recognized as persons capable of exercising legal rights and capacities comparable to those enjoyed by men. Full citizenship and its benefits were to be restricted to the men of certain ethnic or racial groups within a particular polity in the same way that status and its benefits were restricted by shari’a to Muslim men. The most that shari’a could do, and did in fact do, in that historical context was to modify and lighten the harsh consequences of slavery and discrimination on grounds of religion or gender. [422]

Once again, to argue that shari’a‘s restrictive view of human rights was justified by the historical context and that it was an improvement on the preexisting situation is not to say that this view is still justified. On the contrary, my position is that since shari’a‘s view of human rights was justified by the historical context, it ceases to be so justified in the present drastically different context. By the same token that shari’a as a practical legal system could not have disregarded the conception of human rights prevailing at the time it purported to apply in the seventh century, modern Islamic law cannot disregard the present conception of human rights if it is to be applied today. In an early short piece, Khadduri said: “Human rights in Islam, as prescribed by the divine law [shari’a], are the privilege only of persons of full legal capacity. A person with full legal capacity is a living human being of mature age, free, and of Moslem faith. It follows, accordingly, that non-Moslems and slaves who lived in the Islamic state were only partially protected by law or had no legal capacity at all."[423] While accepting this statement as a substantially accurate presentation of the position under shari'a,[424] I would add the following qualification with respect to the status of Muslim women: although it is true that they have full legal capacity under shari'a in relation to civil and commercial law matters, in the sense that they have the requisite legal personality to hold and dispose of property and otherwise acquire or lose civil liabilities in their own independent right, Muslim women do not enjoy human rights on an equal footing with Muslim men under shari'a. Moreover, in accepting Khadduri's statement of the position under shari'a, I would also reiterate my often-stated position that this aspect of shari'a is not the final word of Islam on the subject. As I shall argue at the end of this chapter, an alternative formulation of Islamic public law which would eliminate these limitations on human rights is both desirable and possible.

When we consider writings by contemporary Muslim scholars, we find that most of the published expositions of human rights in Islam are not helpful because they overlook the problems of slavery and discrimination against women and non-Muslims.[425]

One of the better discussions of human rights in Islam, which shows sensitivity to gender discrimination, is that by Riffat Hassan entitled "On Human Rights and the Qur'anic Perspectives."[426] The problem with this article is that it is selective in its choice of the Qur'anic perspectives. In overlooking some relevant verses of the Qur'an, the author fails to confront those Qur'anic perspectives which are not consistent with her vision of the Qur'anic perspectives on human rights. As will be suggested at the end of this chapter, the only effective approach to achieve sufficient reform of shari'a in relation to universal human rights is to cite sources in the Qur'an and sunna which are inconsistent with universal human rights and explain them in historical context, while citing those sources which are supportive of human rights as the basis of the legally applicable principles and rules of Islamic law today.

In contrast to the generally evasive approach of the majority of Muslim writers on human rights issues, a few other Muslim writers have adopted a more honest and candid approach. A good example of this approach is Sultanhussein Tabandeh’s Muslim Commentary on the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. This short book has the merit of clearly indicating the inconsistencies between shari’a and the 1948 Universal Declaration of Human Rights in relation to the status of women and non-Muslims.[427] Tabandeh notes these inconsistencies to argue that Muslims are not bound by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in these respects, whereas I am suggesting that it is shari’a which should be revised, from an Islamic point of view, to provide for these universal human rights. I welcome the clear statement of the inconsistencies between shari’a and universal human rights as part of my argument for Islamic law reform. It should be recalled, however, that the proposed reform must maintain its Islamic legitimacy if it is to be effective in changing Muslim attitudes and policies on these issues.

For our purposes here, we need not go into an exhaustive statement of all human rights because there are no fundamental problems with shari’a except for slavery and discrimination on grounds of gender and religion. It is more to the point to focus on those human rights standards which are violated by shari’a, the prohibition of slavery and discrimination on grounds of gender and religion.

* Slavery

It is obvious that shari’a did not introduce slavery, which was the norm throughout the world at the time. Shari’a recognized slavery as an institution but sought to restrict the sources of acquisition of slaves, to improve their condition, and to encourage their emancipation through a variety of religious and civil methods.[428] Nevertheless, slavery is lawful under shari’a to the present day.[429] It is unlikely today that institutionalized slavery will be formally sanctioned in any Muslim country.[430] If the right conditions under which slaves may be acquired should arise today and someone was made a slave under those conditions, shari’a would protect the “rights” of both the master and the slave in the same way it did 13 centuries ago. In this respect, one would appreciate the candid and honest statement of the situation under shari’a by Tabandeh, who noted the absence of any possibility of finding confirmation of the legality of the enslavement of any person today, and then proceeded to say:

<quote>

Nonetheless, should the legal condition for the enslavement of anyone be proven (because he had been taken prisoner fighting against Islam with a view to its extirpation and persisted in invincible ignorance in his sacrilegious and infidel convictions, or because there did exist legal proof that all his ancestors without exception had been slaves descended from a person taken prisoner conducting a warfare of such invincible ignorance) Islam would be bound to recognize such slavery as legal, even though recommending the freeing of the person and if possible his conversion, in this modern age.[431]

</quote>

In accepting this as an accurate statement of shari'a, I am not accepting this aspect of shari'aas the final and conclusive law of Islam. In this light, it would be lawful, from shari'a's point of view, if slavery is reestablished in a modern Islamic state. As I have argued in [a previous chapter], however, there is the possibility of replacing these dated and archaic aspects of shari'a with modern and humane principles of Islamic law. Such an enlightened construction would prohibit slavery as a matter of Islamic law. Thus it is shari'a and not Islam that "would be bound to recognize such slavery" under Tabandeh's statement.

To make an Islamic argument for the prohibition of slavery, we first need to know the circumstances under which slavery is permitted by shari'a and its rules regarding the treatment and emancipation of slaves.

There is no verse in the Qur'an which directly sanctions the enslavement of any person, but many verses do so by implication when, for example, the Qur'an speaks of a Muslim's right to cohabit with his slave concubine, which clearly presupposes the existence of such slave women. The same can be said of sunna on the subject.[432] The only way a person who is born free may be brought into slavery under shari’a is through military defeat in a war sanctioned by shari’a.[433] According to the founding jurists, subjecting the vanquished unbelievers to slavery is one of the options open to Muslims under shari’a. Thus the Shafi’i school allowed the imam [leader] four options in dealing with prisoners of war: immediate execution, enslavement, or release with or without ransom. The Maliki school restricted the options to execution, enslavement, or release with ransom, and the Hanafi school reduced them further to either execution or enslavement.[434]

Once a person is brought into slavery through military conquest or is born to slave parents, he or she remains a slave until emancipated. While a slave, he or she may be employed in whatever manner deemed fit by his or her master but must be treated with kindness and compassion as required by shari’a.[435] That does not preclude the sale of slaves in principle, but it may place some limitations on the conditions under which the sale is concluded, such as a requirement not to separate a mother and child when they are sold as slaves.[436]

Shari’a encouraged the emancipation of slaves through a variety of methods. The emancipation of slaves is designated by Sura 9, Verse 60, and Sura 2, Verse 177, of the Qur’an as one of the prescribed items of expenditure of the official treasury or private charity. Moreover, the emancipation of a slave is prescribed by some verses of the Qur’an, such as Sura 4, Verse 92, and Sura 58, Verse 3, as religious penance and atonement for some sins, and recommended by others, such as Sura 2, Verse 177, and Sura 89, Verses 11–13, as a most meritorious act. Sura 24, Verse 33, of the Qur’an encourages a Muslim to grant the wish of a slave who wants to contract with the master for emancipation in exchange for the payment of a certain sum of money or performance of certain services.

Given the entrenched position of slavery throughout the world at the time, Islam had no choice but to recognize the institution of slavery in that historical context and do its best to improve the conditions under which slaves were to endure their unfortunate status. It can also be argued that Islam was aiming at the elimination of slavery by restricting its incidence and encouraging its termination. But since there was no internal mechanism by which slavery was to be rendered unlawful by shari’a, it continued to be lawful under that system of law up to the present day.

Riffat Hassan quoted with approval the argument made by G.A. Parwez [India-Pakistan, born 1903] to the effect that since the Qur’an restricted the source of slavery to prisoners of war, and then prescribed in Sura 47, Verse 4, that prisoners of war were to be set free either for ransom or as a favor, it follows that “the door for future slavery was thus closed by the Qur’an forever. Whatever happened in subsequent history was the responsibility of the Muslims and not of the Qur’an.”[437] Similarly, it is sometimes argued by modern Muslims that this verse of the Qur’an prohibits the enslavement of captives after a war with Muslims. The relevant part of this verse may be translated as follows: “When you meet the unbelievers [in battle], smite at their necks [kill them]. Once you have thoroughly subdued them, then [hold] and bind [them]. Thereafter [practice] either generosity [by freeing them without compensation] or [for] ransom, until war is terminated.”

These arguments are, in my view, examples of selective citation of shari’a sources leading to serious distortion and confusion. When we consider that both the Qur’an and sunna did recognize and regulate slavery in a number of ways, that the Prophet himself and leading Companions had slaves, and that all the founding jurists of shari’a took the existence of slavery for granted and elaborated rules for its regulation, we cannot dismiss the matter as the alleged failure of generations of Muslims to implement the intention of the Qur’an to abolish slavery. Despite the apparent limitation by this verse of the options open to Muslims over their captives, it is a historical fact that Muslim armies, during and after the Prophet’s time, have continued to exercise the option to enslave their captives. Moreover, it should be emphasized that the founding jurists of shari’a did not perceive this verse as excluding the option of enslavement of captives.[438] This verse may now be used in an argument for prohibiting enslavement as a matter of Islamic law, but this possible construction of the verse should not be confused with the position under shari’a as it has been established by early Muslim practice and authoritatively stated by the founding jurists.

I believe that the early Muslims were correct in interpreting the Qur’an and sunna as recognizing the institution of slavery in the historical context of early Islam. In the current historical context and with a new principle of interpretation such as the one proposed in the present study, the basic premise of the argument by modern Muslims against slavery may now be used to abolish slavery under Islamic law in an authoritative manner. Although those arguments cannot be accepted to alter the legal and historical fact that shari’a recognized slavery, and continues to do so to the present day, they provide a very significant indication of the eagerness of modern Muslims to abolish slavery in Islamic law. Modern Muslims should welcome the evolutionary approach proposed by Ustadh [Teacher] Mahmoud Mohamed Taha. As applied to slavery, for example, that principle would conclude that though shari’a implemented the transitional legislative intent to permit slavery, subject to certain limitations and safeguards, modern Islamic law should now implement the fundamental Islamic legislative intent to prohibit slavery forever.

When slavery was eventually abolished in modern Muslim states, in some cases as late as the 1960s and after, that result was achieved through secular law and not shari’a.[439] Given the formal abolition of slavery in all Muslim countries, some may argue that it is no longer an issue. I disagree and believe that slavery is a fundamental human rights issue for Muslims until it is abolished in Islamic law.

In my view, it is utterly abhorrent and morally indefensible for shari’a to continue to sanction slavery today, regardless of the prospects of its practice. Moreover, the fact that slavery is permissible under shari’a does have serious practical consequences not only in perpetuating negative social attitudes toward former slaves and segments of the population that used to be a source of slaves but also in legitimizing forms of secret practices akin to slavery. In the Sudan, for example, images of slavery under shari’a and Islamic literature continue to support negative stereotypes of Sudanese from the southern and western parts of the country, which were sources of slaves until the late 19th century. Moreover, recent news reports indicate that Muslim tribesmen of southwestern Sudan feel justified in capturing nonMuslims from southern Sudan and keeping them in secret slavery.

* Discrimination on Grounds of Gender and Religion

A similar analysis applies to discrimination against women and non-Muslims under shari’a. Both types of discrimination were the norm at the time.[440] While accepting such discrimination in principle, shari’a restricted its incidence and reduced its scope.[441] Nevertheless, when viewed in modern perspective, principles of shari’a sanctioning serious and unacceptable discrimination on grounds of gender and religion are, in my view, untenable today.

According to shari’a, non-Muslims may live within a Muslim state either under the status of dhimmi [protected religious groups] for non-Muslim subjects or the status of aman (pledge of security or safe-conduct) for non-Muslim aliens.[442] Various examples of discrimination under the public law of shari’a on grounds of religion were given in the chapters on constitutionalism and criminal justice. As explained earlier, personal and private law matters for non-Muslims within an Islamic state were left to their own personal law and communal arrangements for administration. Should the matter involve a Muslim, shari’a would apply.

Discriminatory shari’a rules of personal and private law include the following:

· A Muslim man may marry a Christian or Jewish woman, but a Christian or Jewish man may not marry a Muslim woman.[443] Both Muslim men and women are precluded from marrying an unbeliever, that is, one who does not believe in one of the heavenly revealed scriptures.[444]

- Difference in religion is a total bar to inheritance. Thus a Muslim may neither inherit from nor leave inheritance to a non-Muslim.[445]

Examples of discrimination on grounds of gender in family and private law include the following:[446]

- A Muslim man may be married to up to four wives at the same time but a Muslim woman can only be married to one man at a time.[447]

- A Muslim man may divorce his wife, or any of his wives, by unilateral repudiation, talaq, without having to give any reasons or justify his action to any person or authority. In contrast, a Muslim woman can obtain divorce only by consent of the husband or by judicial decree for limited specific grounds such as the husband’s inability or unwillingness to provide for his wife.[448]

- In inheritance, a Muslim woman receives less than the share of a Muslim man when both have equal degree of relationship to the deceased person.[449]

We are not concerned here with the historical justification of these instances of discrimination on grounds of religion or gender. Reasonable people may differ in their view of the historical sufficiency of any justifications that may be offered for any particular instance of discrimination. For example, it may be argued that economic and social conditions of seventh-century Arabia did not justify some or all of the discriminatory rules cited above. It is my submission, however, that regardless of differences over the historical sufficiency ofjustifications, these instances of discrimination against women and non-Muslims under shari’a are no longer justified.

It should be emphasized here that such unacceptable discrimination exists despite the modern reforms of personal law in several Muslim countries. As explained in [a previous chapter], these efforts cannot achieve the desired degree of reform because of the internal limitations of reform within the framework of historical shari’a. Moreover, the limited benefits achieved through these modern reforms are constantly challenged and threatened by more fundamental principles of shari’a which remain intact in the jurisprudence and legal practice of the countries that introduced those reforms.

In light of the preceding discussion, the following conclusions seem justified. First, in continuing to recognize slavery as a lawful institution, even if only in theory, shari’a is in complete violation of a most fundamental and universal human right. It is very significant that slavery was abolished in the Muslim world through secular law and not shari’a and that shari’a does not object to the reinstitution of slavery under its own conditions regarding the source of slaves and conditions for their treatment. Although the vast majority of contemporary Muslims abhor slavery, it remains part of their religious law.

Second, discrimination on grounds of religion and gender under shari’a also violates established universal human rights. Discrimination on grounds of religion has been found to be one of the major causes of international conflict and war because other countries that sympathize with the persecuted non- Muslim minority are likely to be prompted into acting in support of the victims of religious discrimination, thereby creating a situation of international conflict and possibly war. More important, it is my submission that discrimination on grounds of either gender or religion is morally repugnant and politically untenable today.

These are, in my view, the most serious points of conflict and tension between shari’a and universal human rights as defined in the present study. Before proceeding to an application of the method of reconciliation adopted in this book, it may be helpful to highlight the relevance of this conflict and tension. Is it of purely historical interest or is it relevant to the current policy and practice of Muslim states?

 Current Muslim Ambivalence on Human Rights

The basic inconsistency between a historical, religiously determined conception of individual and collective rights under shari’a and a contemporary universalistic conception of human rights is clearly reflected in the ambivalence of modern Muslim states on the issue. The policies of these countries are influenced, whether consciously or unconsciously, by inherently contradictory forces. On one hand, there is the pull of historical religious traditions which sanction discrimination on grounds of religion and gender. On the other hand, there is the push of modernist domestic and international forces in favor of human rights and against discrimination on grounds of religion or gender. This ambivalence is reflected, in my view, in the subscription by some Muslim countries to international human rights documents which they are unable to uphold within their national jurisdictions because of the role of shari’a in the domestic legal systems of those countries.

It is difficult to provide detailed and conclusive documentation of human rights violations in many countries, especially in the Muslim world, because of the lack of verifiable records.[450] Moreover, it is much more difficult to link those violations, to the extent that they are documented, to the influence of shari’a.[451] Nevertheless, the ambivalence of Muslim countries in the field of human rights can be illustrated by comparing the content of the international human rights documents to which a particular Muslim country has subscribed and the shari’a rules being enforced in that country as a matter of domestic law. A clear example can be found by contrasting Egypt’s international obligation to eliminate discrimination on grounds of gender with rules of shari’a personal law that apply to Muslims in Egypt.[452]

Article 1 of the 1979 International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, to which Egypt is a party, defines discrimination against women as “any distinction, exclusion or restriction made on the basis of sex which has the effect or purpose of impairing or nullifying the recognition, enjoyment or exercise by women, irrespective of their marital status, on a basis of equality of men and women, of human rights and fundamental freedoms in the political, economic, social, cultural, civil or any other field.” Articles 3 to 16 of the convention implement this definition through very specific and precise provisions for the elimination of discrimination against women in the fields of political and public life, education, employment, health care, and others.

In ratifying this convention, Egypt entered reservations on Articles 9, 16, and 29. Although the reservations on Articles 9 and 29, dealing with nationality of children and submission to arbitration under the convention, may be based on national policy not necessarily related to shari’a, the one on Article 16 is expressly related to shari’a. Whereas the article requires complete equality between men and women in all matters relating to marriage and family relations during the marriage and upon its dissolution, Egypt’s reservation states that its obligations “must be without prejudice to the Islamic shari’a provisions.” In this way, it can be said that Egypt is aware of the conflict between the international obligation established by that article and its own shari’a personal law for Muslims. As long as this is the only aspect of Egyptian law based on shari’a which is inconsistent with Egypt’s obligation under this convention and other international human rights instruments, it can be said that Egypt is honest in its position and serious in its intention to honor its international human rights obligations. That is not enough. Egypt and all other Muslim countries should bring every aspect of their law, including personal law for Muslims, into complete conformity with human rights standards.

Given the various ways in which shari’a discriminates against women and non-Muslims and the powerful influence of shari’a on private as well as official Muslim behavior throughout the world, however, it is reasonable to conclude that more serious consequences of Muslim ambivalence on human rights are unavoidable. Moreover, this ambivalence is likely to increase in scope and degree if the current trend toward greater Islamization of public life in Muslim countries should continue.

The relevance of shari’a to contemporary Muslim practice raises the basic issue of how to reconcile shari’a with universal standards of human rights. As in the case of similar issues raised in our discussion of questions of constitutionalism, criminal justice, and international law, reconciliation can be achieved only through the drastic reform of shari’a. It now remains to be seen how the reform technique explained earlier operates in achieving the desired reconciliation between Islamic law and universal human rights from within the Islamic tradition.

 Universal Human Rights in Islam

Once again, and in culmination of the basic argument of this book, we come to the same conclusion. Unless the basis of modern Islamic law is shifted away from those texts of the Qur’an and sunna of the Medina stage,[453] which constituted the foundations of the construction of shari’a, there is no way of avoiding drastic and serious violation of universal standards of human rights. There is no way to abolish slavery as a legal institution and no way to eliminate all forms and shades of discrimination against women and non-Muslims as long as we remain bound by the framework of shari’a. As stated in [a previous chapter] and explained in relation to constitutionalism, criminal justice, and international law, the traditional techniques of reform within the framework of shari’a are inadequate for achieving the necessary degree of reform. To achieve that degree of reform, we must be able to set aside clear and definite texts of the Qur’an and sunna of the Medina stage as having served their transitional purpose and implement those texts of the Meccan stage which were previously inappropriate for practical application but are now the only way to proceed.

A similar approach is proposed for achieving the reconciliation of Islamic law with the full range of universal human rights identified through the criteria indicated earlier in this chapter. The key to the success of this part of the effort is to convince Muslims that the other person with whom they must identify and accept as their equal in human dignity and rights includes all other human beings, regardless of gender and religion. This would require an explanation of why the verses of antagonism which instructed Muslims to be awliya, friends and supporters, of each other and disassociate themselves from all non-Muslims, should not apply today. It would also require showing that Sura 4, Verse 34, of the Qur’an, which establishes general male guardianship over women, and other verses which establish specific instances of discrimination against women, should not be implemented today.

In accordance with the logic of the evolutionary principle proposed by Ustadh Mahmoud Mohamed Taha, the texts of the Qur’an emphasizing exclusive Muslim solidarity were revealed during the Medina stage to provide the emerging Muslim community with psychological support in the face of the violent adversity of nonMuslims. In contrast to these verses, the fundamental and eternal message of Islam, as revealed in the Qur’an of the Mecca period, preached the solidarity of all humanity. In view of the vital need for peaceful coexistence in today’s global human society, Muslims should emphasize the eternal message of universal solidarity of the Qur’an of the Mecca period rather than the exclusive Muslim solidarity of the transitional Medina message. Otherwise, Muslims would only provoke counter exclusive solidarity by non-Muslims, thereby repudiating the prospects for peaceful co-existence and cooperation in promoting and protecting universal human rights.

The application of Ustadh Mahmoud’s evolutionary principle to male qawwama, guardianship, over women has already been explained. Male guardianship over women has been rationalized by Sura 4, Verse 34, as following from the economic and security dependence of women on men. Because such dependence is no longer necessarily true, argued Ustadh Mahmoud, male guardianship over women should be terminated. Both men and women should now be equally free and equally responsible before the law, which guarantees economic opportunity and security for all members of the community.

The application of this evolutionary principle of interpretation to specific instances of discrimination against women and non-Muslims can be illustrated by the rule of shari’a prohibiting marriage between a Muslim woman and a non-Muslim man. This rule is based on the combined operation of the guardianship of the man, in this case the husband, over his wife, and that of a Muslim over a non-Muslim. Since a non-Muslim husband may not be the guardian of his Muslim wife, shari’a prohibits such a marriage. If either form of guardianship, of a husband over his wife or of a Muslim over a non-Muslim, is repudiated, there would be no justification for prohibiting marriage between a Muslim woman and a non-Muslim man. The evolutionary principle of Ustadh Mahmoud would repudiate both types of guardianship.

The evolutionary principle will also repudiate another possible rationale of the prohibition of marriage between a Muslim woman and a non-Muslim man, namely, the assumption that a wife is more susceptible to influence by her husband than vice versa. In other words, it appears to be assumed that if such a marriage is permitted, it is more likely that the non- Muslim husband will draw his Muslim wife away from Islam than that she will draw him to Islam. This rationale is, of course, part of the wider sociological phenomenon, namely, the lack of confidence in a woman's integrity and good judgment. Educational and other efforts are needed to repudiate this sociological phenomenon in all its manifestations. Besides its immediate practical impact, legal reform can also be an effective tool of education and leadership. This task can be begun by removing, through the application of the evolutionary principle of Ustadh Mahmoud, all aspects of the law which discriminate against women, thereby encouraging and sustaining a positive view of women.

 Conclusion

Salman Rushdie [born 1947], an Indian-born Muslim novelist who became a British citizen, published in Britain a novel entitled Satanic Verses in September 1988. In various parts of the novel, and especially in a dream sequence therein, irreverent references are made to the Prophet of Islam, his wives, and leading Companions. Although made in metaphorical fictitious form, the associations and negative connotations are obvious.

Within a few months, thousands of Muslims were demonstrating in various parts of the Muslim world, burning copies of the book, and demanding that it be banned not only in their own countries but throughout the world. Some of the demonstrators called for the death of Rushdie. In mid-February 1989, Imam [Ruhollah] Khomeini of Iran [1902–1989] issued a declaration in which he called on Muslims to kill Rushdie and any person associated with the publication and sale of the book. When Rushdie issued a statement a few days later expressing his regrets for any affront and anguish his book may have caused Muslims, Khomeini responded by saying that Rushdie's apology would not be accepted and that he should be killed even if he repented and recanted his insults to Islam and the Muslims. These events were widely reported in the media all over the world.

In the following remarks, I am assuming, for the sake of argument, that Rushdie's book is extremely offensive to Muslims. I am also assuming that freedom of expression is not absolute. It is conceivable that a published work, whether claiming to be a work of fiction or scholarship, can cause such harm to some identifiable private or public interest as to justify the banning or restriction of its circulation. Although I believe that it should be extremely difficult to make a convincing case for banning a work, I am assuming that it is not impossible to do so. Moreover, I am also assuming that Rushdie's book warrants examination with a view to its possible banning by the appropriate authorities.

Assuming all this, I find it extremely disturbing that thousands of Muslims in many parts of the world are demanding not only the banning of the book but also the murder of the author. What is even more disturbing is that a head of a Muslim country, Imam Khomeini of Iran, has called on Muslims to seek out and murder a citizen of another country, and a non-Muslim country at that, without the benefit of trial and a chance to defend himself. Khomeini does not speak for all the Shi'i Muslims of the world, let alone the Sunni Muslims, who are by far the vast majority of Muslims today. Nevertheless, since the vast majority of Muslims have failed to condemn Khomeini's action, they are to be taken as acquiescing to it.

Even though shari'a rules of procedure are extremely underdeveloped, many Muslims would argue that sufficient authority can be found to support the conclusion that Khomeini's action is totally wrong and invalid in shari'a for at least three reasons. First, assuming that Khomeini is the undisputed ruler of an Islamic state (dar al-Islam), his jurisdiction under shari'a does not extend to a non-Islamic state (dar al-harb). In modern terms, shari’a does not give the ruler of an Islamic state the power to punish the citizen of a non-Islamic state. Second, even if Khomeini were to have jurisdiction over Rushdie on the absurd ground that the ruler of an Islamic state has universal jurisdiction over Muslims anywhere in the world, shari’a requires that a person be charged with an offense and allowed a chance to defend himself before he may be punished. Third, repentance and recantation of heretic views is always a complete defense against a charge of apostasy (ridda), which is presumably the offense Rushdie is supposed to have committed.

All of these objections to Khomeini’s action are procedural and formal in nature. That thousands of Muslims in many parts of the Muslim world have demanded the death of Rushdie can only mean that they continue to perceive this to be the appropriate penalty for apostasy. In other words, Muslims are saying that if Rushdie is subject to the jurisdiction of an Islamic state, was duly charged and tried, and refused to recant his views, he should be put to death. This is the prevailing view of shari’a, which is not disputed by the vast majority of Muslims, who are demanding the application of shari’a today as the public law of Muslim countries. Even those Muslims who argue that the death penalty is not required by shari’a for peaceable nonviolent apostasy would still have to concede the variety of other negative legal consequences to the apostate noted earlier, including the possibility of a discretionary punishment (ta’zir) short of death.

Although I know this to be the position under shari’a, I am unable as a Muslim to accept the law of apostasy as part of the law of Islam today. If the prevailing view of apostasy remains valid today, a Muslim could be put to death for expressing views in a given Muslim country which are deemed by the dominant view in that country to be tantamount to apostasy. For example, from some Sunni perspectives, the views of many Shi’i Muslims amount to apostasy; and from some Shi’i perspectives, the views of many Sunni Muslims amount to apostasy. If the shari’a law of apostasy is to be applied today, it would be conceivable for some Shi’i Muslims to be sentenced to death in a Sunni country and vice versa.

Furthermore, it is conceivable for a Muslim within the Sunni tradition, for example, to be put to death for apostasy by the authorities even though many contemporary Muslims regard that person to be an exemplary Muslim. Numerous examples can be cited from Muslim history of leading Sufi (Muslim mystic) men who were killed for apostasy despite their large following among Muslims at the time. Other examples can be cited of currently respected scholars, such as Ibn Taymiyya [12631328], who could have been put to death under the pretext of the shari’a law of apostasy if their opponents were in control of the machinery of the state at the time. Many modern Muslim intellectuals, such as ‘Ali ‘Abd al-Raziq [1888–1966], have been denounced and threatened with death for expressing profound scholarly views. Ustadh Mahmoud Mohamed Taha was executed for apostasy in the Sudan in January 1985 for his views on Islamic reform.

These instances would suggest to me that toleration of unorthodoxy and dissent is vital for the spiritual and intellectual benefit of Islam itself. The shari’a law of apostasy can easily be abused and has been abused in the past to suppress political opposition and inhibit spiritual and intellectual growth. This aspect of shari’a is fundamentally inconsistent with the numerous provisions of the Qur’an and sunna which enjoin freedom of religion and expression.

Another aspect of the historical experience of Muslims brought into focus by the Rushdie affair is the tradition of direct violent action and self-help, which goes back to the earliest times of Islam. Examples can be cited of the Prophet instructing Muslims to kill someone on sight or to correct an injustice by direct action. Unless these instances are identified and explained in their specific historical contexts or other special circumstances, they will continue to be used to undermine the rule of law and motivate terrorist action.

The Rushdie affair has attracted much attention because of its international, especially Western, dimension. Although I am fully aware of the realities of international power politics, I still believe that this affair is useful in publicizing the drastic incompatibility between shari’a and modern standards of international relations and human rights. Some of those who rushed to defend Rushdie no doubt had their ulterior motives; some may have acted out of spite for Islam and Muslims. As a Muslim, however, I have to concede that it was Muslim actions that gave occasion for such reactions. More important, I am concerned with the views of men and women of goodwill and sensitivity and wish to emphasize the value of this affair in illustrating the need for Islamic reform.

Although many contemporary Muslims would privately object to shari’a‘s suppression of freedom of belief and expression, very few are willing to express their objections publicly for fear of being branded as apostates themselves—guilt by association. Other Muslims would find it difficult to admit their objections, even to themselves, for fear of losing their faith in the process. As long as the public law of shari’a continues to be regarded as the only valid view of the law of Islam, most Muslims would find it extremely difficult to object to any of its principles and rules or to resist their practical implementation, however repugnant and inappropriate they may find them to be.

The public law of shari’a has not been applied for many generations in most parts of the Muslim world. Moreover, the nature and style of classical treatises on shari’a make them generally inaccessible even to the highly educated contemporary Muslim. As a result of these and other factors, the vast majority of Muslims today are unaware of the full implications of the modem application of the public law of shari’a. If contemporary Muslims can clearly envisage the ways in which the application of shari’a would affect their daily lives, and if they were given a free choice in opposing the application of shari’a without the threat of prosecution for apostasy or the fear of losing their faith in Islam, I believe that most of them would strongly oppose the application of shari’a today.

The fundamental objective of this book is to start a process of drastic reform of Islamic law that would enable Muslims to seek to achieve their right to selfdetermination in terms of an Islamic identity (whether Sunni, Shi’i, or variations thereof), including the application of Islamic law, without violating the rights of others to self-determination. To this end, the book explains the negative consequences of the modern application of shari’a to demonstrate that it is not the appropriate vehicle for Islamic self-determination in the present context. An Islamic alternative to shari’a is provided as the appropriate framework for Muslims to exercise their right to self-determination while fully respecting the rights of others, whether within their own countries or in other lands.

Reference has already been made to the difficulties facing Muslims who would otherwise criticize shari’a and oppose its application today. To help these Muslims overcome their inhibitions, I have shown that shari’a was in fact constructed by Muslim jurists over the first three centuries of Islam. Although derived from the fundamental divine sources of Islam, the Qur’an and sunna, shari’a is not divine because it is the product of human interpretation of those sources. Moreover, this process of construction through human interpretation took place within a specific historical context which is drastically different from our own. It should therefore be possible for contemporary Muslims to undertake a similar process of interpretation and application of the Qur’an and sunna in the present historical context to develop an alternative public law of Islam which is appropriate for implementation today.

In addition to explaining and documenting the validity of this premise, I have suggested that the reform methodology developed by the late Sudanese Muslim reformer Ustadh Mahmoud Mohamed Taha appears to be the most appropriate means for constructing the modern public law of Islam out of the Qur’an and sunna as interpreted in the present historical context. Whether this particular methodology is accepted or rejected by contemporary Muslims, the need for drastic reform of the public law of shari’a is beyond dispute.

Optimism is a necessity of life, especially for a Muslim today. As a Muslim optimist, I believe in the power of ideas, when expounded in the right way at the right time, to inspire significant social and political change. I also believe in the progressive force of life and the ability of people to struggle for and achieve a quality of life compatible with their human dignity and well-being. It would be irresponsible wishful thinking on my part, however, to overlook the power of reactionary forces or to underestimate the difficulties facing the struggle for human dignity and well-being.

I am painfully aware that the vast majority of the Muslim peoples throughout the world live at a superficial level of both Islam and modern civilization. Although they claim adherence to Islam and exhibit apparent commitment to its ritualistic formalities, most contemporary Muslims fail to appreciate and live up to its moral and spiritual essence. Moreover, although they have grown accustomed to enjoying the benefits of modern technology and claim adherence to modern institutions, the majority of Muslim peoples have little appreciation of the values and ways of thinking that underlie and sustain that technology and those institutions. Many distinguished modern Muslim scholars have lamented this state of affairs in the Muslim world, but as long as it persists, the voices of fanaticism will find receptive ears and the forces of regression will have eager followers.

It may therefore appear presumptuous to expect a book that is written in English and is likely to be banned in some Muslim countries to have any significant impact in the Muslim world. Despite the oppressive nature of most political regimes and the conservative orientation of many societies in the Muslim world, however, I believe that the ideas expressed here will reach the hearts and minds of many Muslims. For one thing, most of these ideas already exist, perhaps in somewhat rudimentary and reticent form, in the hearts and minds of many Muslims, especially the younger generations, who are the more active agents of social change. It is my hope and expectation that this book will act as a catalyst for change in the Muslim world by presenting these ideas in a systematic and comprehensive fashion and providing them with an Islamic rationale, Moreover, the cultural interdependence of the modern world is making it increasingly difficult to exclude ideas and diminish their impact.

Contemporary Muslims are not the only audience for this book. Although issues of Islamic law reform and social and political change in the Muslim world are primarily the business of the peoples of Muslim countries, these matters are the legitimate concern of all humankind because of their impact on the human rights and fundamental freedoms of human beings. Conversely, the peoples of Muslim countries should be concerned with similar matters in non-Muslim lands. Humanity can no longer disclaim responsibility for the fate of human beings in any part of the world. This is the glorious achievement of the modern international human rights movement. All the peoples of the world are hereby invited to assist Muslims in their predicament and to accept the assistance of Muslims to non-Muslims in their predicaments. It should be emphasized, however, that these efforts of mutual assistance must be undertaken with due sensitivity and goodwill if they are to be most effective.

It is my conviction as a Muslim that the public law of shari’a does not represent the law of Islam which contemporary Muslims are supposed to implement in fulfillment of their religious obligation. I also strongly believe that the application of the public law of shari’a today will be counterproductive and detrimental to Muslims and to Islam itself. I hope that this book, with the help and guidance of God, will contribute in bringing all Muslims to a clear realization of these facts and in enabling them to develop and implement the appropriate public law of Islam for today.

My trust in God leads me to believe that current efforts to implement the public law of shari’a will fail because they are harmful to the best interests of Islam and the Muslims. These efforts will fail because the public law of shari’a is fundamentally inconsistent with the realities of modern life. This is my firm conviction as a Muslim. My only concern is to avoid the human suffering which is likely to be caused by this doomed endeavor. May this book, by the grace of God, contribute to minimizing that suffering.

 25—The Problem of ‘Ulama’

Alhaji Adeleke Dirisu Ajijola

Islamic reformers in Nigeria are divided in numerous factions, some of them liberal and most of them not. The more moderate reformers tend to be members of the political elite, which has ruled Nigeria for much of the independence period through military dictatorship; their religious liberalism does not always carry over into their political beliefs.[454]$$$ By contrast, Alhaji Adeleke Dirisu Ajijola (Nigeria, born 1932), an attorney and prolific author on Islamic themes, espouses reform in both the political and religious arenas. In this text, Ajijola forcefully defends the right of all Muslims to interpret religious doctrine, contesting the monopoly of the ‘ulama’ (religious scholars).

The ‘ulcmai’ in Islam simply form a category of citizens specialized in Islamic humanistic culture and little knowledge of Muslim law. Those who are advanced in Islamic legal studies are given the name offuqaha’ or jurists. Normally disputes or cases pertaining to religious matter may be referred to them.

It must, however, be noted that ‘ulanai’ are not what clerics are in Christian communities or in any other religions, for in Islam, there is neither clergy nor an intermediary between man and God.

But today in Nigeria, the ‘ulcmai’ have taken over as the leaders of Muslim communities—a job they are not equipped to handle properly. It must be conceded that the survival of Islamic learning in the present-day Nigeria is due to their uncompromising efforts. Credit must also be given to them for religious education.

Nevertheless, at the present time they are giving wrong education to our young men and women, for any young person who devotes himself only to religious education as presently thought without incorporating professional education as it is imparted today, is ill equipped for the struggle of life and the race for progress in fast-changing Nigeria.

Many of the ‘ulanai’ who have become Muslim leaders have themselves lost the true spirit of Islam. They do not have the ability to interpret the principles and law of Islam in the light of changing conditions. They have little juristic insight or practical wisdom. They lack the power of action and are utterly incapable of reducing the external and flexible principles of Islam from the book of God, and the teaching of the Prophet to the changing conditions of life.

On the contrary, they are obsessed with the past and addicted to uncritical acceptance and blind imitation of ancient dead Muslim jurists’ views, especially those of the Maliki school of [Islamic] law on all issues. Some of the so-called learned and highly [educated] government officials among the so-called qadis [Islamic judges] equate the Qur’an with the work of ancient jurists—with the consequence that whenever any problem arose, they did not turn to the divine book, the Holy Qur’an which is above the limitation of time and space, but instead devoted their attention to books produced by the ancient jurists who are men like themselves.

With great respect to the ancient jurists who have made great contributions to Islam, these men with all their great qualities were not apostles of God. Their wisdom and foresight could never transcend the limitations of their time and condition and varying circumstances of life of their age.

The teaching of these jurists, however wise and pious, are not at all capable of guiding the Muslim on the eve of the 21st century of the Christian era, at a time when the conditions as well as the practical fields of human activities have undergone a revolutionary change, which only God Almighty could know and which could not possibly have been foreseen centuries earlier by any person not endowed with prophetic insight and powers.

The ‘ulcmai’ were not equipped with the required instruments to proffer alternative lines of development. They were merely interested in condemning the evils of Western civilization without appreciating the good in it. This has led to inertia and inaction. They forget that the trend of events in the modern world cannot be countered with outdated logic, outworn argument; the ‘ulaw’ cannot gain anything by closing their eyes to the reality of modern Nigeria.

It is a pity that our ‘ulaw’ did not try seriously to comprehend the prevailing trends and the mental make-up of modern men and women in Nigeria. They are incapable of proffering solutions to the various complicated intellectual economic, political and practical problems that the new conditions of life have created for the Muslim of the present age. They merely go to Mecca without noticing the legal, economic and social evolution that is taking place in Saudi Arabia.

Even in the manner in which they are trying to explain, the teaching and law of Islam appear to be calculated to repel rather than attract the modern educated mind. Indeed some of their explanations are so crude that they are a disservice to Islam.

Many of these ‘ulcmai’ still live in the past. ‘Ulama’ were the standard bearers of Islamic learning and culture of the past, but because of deficiencies in their education they are incapable of leading and guiding modern Muslims in any spheres of life.

Their concern is to force Nigerian Muslims to apply the so-called Maliki school of law in all legal matters. To them this is the panacea solution to the problem facing the Muslims.

There are other groups of Muslims who have Western education and whose motto is to succeed in world affairs. These groups join other similar groups of nonMuslim religion [primarily Christianity] in controlling the intellectual, literary, economic and political affairs ofNigeria.

But unlike their non- Muslim counterparts who take active part in their religion, they are ignorant of the principles and essential features of Islam. They are alien to the spirit of Islamic culture and are unaware of the character of communal organization of Islam and its social law, except for its spark of faith in the recesses of their mind.

The Muslim in this group does not at all differ from a non-Muslim. When there is any conflict between Muslims and non-Muslims, they immediately condemn their fellow Muslims, branding them as intolerant. Yet, it is this group of Muslims that have Western education and possess intellectual, technical and practical power, and it is they alone, with non-Muslims of the other group, that possess the capacity and the strength to govern the affairs of Nigeria. The UnOma” and the Western-educated Muslims are diametrically opposed and often at loggerheads with each other. This is a dangerous situation which must be resolved in the interests of Islam. This situation is blamed on ‘ulmrni’ and Muslim leaders whose duty right at the onset of colonization ofNigeria was to bestir themselves and try to comprehend the principles and essential future of the new civilization of the West, and make the best use of their sons and daughters who acquired this education.

This should have avoided the present struggle between the stagnant and backward cultural position of Muslim leaders, the ‘ulama’, and the civilization of the West, which the Western-educated Muslims have acquired, throbbing with life and zeal with light of knowledge and the vigor of activities.

This problem can be solved only through the interpretation of the principle of Islamic theology and law in the light of changing conditions. The Muslims must go back to the Qur’an to find remedy to their problems.... But it is tragic that Nigerian ‘ulcmai’ seem to shun any such endeavors calling them to revert to the principal source of Islamic civilization to find solutions to Muslims’ problems.

To progress, the educated Muslim has to study the intellectual and scientific foundation on which the edifice of Western civilization has been raised.

With the help of ijtihad [Islamic interpretation], they should [seek] to persuade the Muslims to accept and press into service the useful practical knowledge and scientific discoveries that enable Western nations to achieve such remarkable material progress. They should fit these new instruments of progress in keeping with the principles of Islam, into the educational system and social life of Muslims.

Islam resolves the supposed conflicts between science and religion; it does not ask Muslims to ignore the law of nature and reject what is established through positive scientific observation and calculations. On the contrary, it exacts its followers to study the law of nature and derive benefits from them.

Rational speculation is the foundation of Islam. The Qur’an, which urges men to consider the universe for themselves, laid the foundation of scientific research. The Qur’an stresses scientific investigation by urging people to find out the secrets of creation for themselves. “Do they not consider how camels have been created, nor how the sky has been lifted, nor how the mountains have been created, not even how the earth has been flattened?” [Sura 88, Verses 17–20].

The Qur’an reconciles science and religion, [while] the stand accepted today as materialism appears to have reached its climax and has found itself in urgent need of spiritual values.

In order to awaken man’s faith in one God, it does not use miracles but ordinary faculty of human reason. Later on, in order to awaken belief in the prophets and in the divine revelations, Islam presents that great miracle known as the Qur’an (which in itself is both an understandable science and the intelligible word of God).

It does not expect that man should accept Islam with passive faith, without the active application of his intelligence. Rather, it invites him to understand it, to meditate on it to the limit which human intelligence and reason permit, and it challenges him to find a way to deny its superiority, or find a work which could be its equal (Sura 2, Verse 24).

The importance which is assigned to reason and difference of opinion in Islam is such that for the majority of Muslims, when there is an irreconcilable conflict between an alleged tradition and reason, the latter must prevail and the tradition must be rejected as spurious. Difference of opinion has been described by the Qur'an as a continuous aspect of human life and even as a purpose of creation. "And if thy Lord had willed, he verily would have made mankind one nation, yet they cease not to differ, save those on whom thy Lord hath mercy, and for that He did create them" (Sura 11, Verses 118–119). Now, a religion which has its basis in rational speculation, and which gives such a broad scope to reason, a religion that orders the use of all the faculties bestowed upon man by God, and consequently the one which is greatest of all, namely, his intelligence, how could such a religion be an obstacle in the way of science and philosophy?

When the courts and schools of Islam were lighthouses, when knowledge reached Europe which was at that time in the midst of the darkness of the Middle Ages; when the thoughts of Muslim philosophers reached such heights that they led the way for Western scholars; when Harun ar-Rashid [caliph, circa 763–809] required a school for the study of various sciences to be attached to each mosque; and when libraries rich in hundreds and thousands of books were opened to scholars all over the Islamic world, were the Muslims not the first to apply experimental methods, long before Francis Bacon [English scientist, 1561–1626] proclaimed their necessity?

The development of chemistry, of astronomy, the propagation of Greek science, the promotion of the study of medicine and the discovery of various physical laws— are not these to the credit of the Muslims?

It is an admitted fact that Muslims made notable contributions in the fields of mathematics, chemistry and physical sciences, the greatest being the use of objective experiments to test the veracity of facts. The achievements of Jabir Ibn Hayyan (Geber) [Syrian scientist, 721- 776] were outstanding and constituted, until the eighteenth century, the foundation of modern chemistry. The name of the anthropologist and free thinker Abu ‘Uthman ‘Amr Ibn Bahr Al-Jahiz (died 869) is ranked amongst the most distinguished pioneers of this discipline. He was a radical theologian, whose books are still read for the elegance of his Arabic prose.

If this is so, then it is wrong to say as many Christians in Nigeria assume, that it is in the nature of Islamic religion to create obstacles in the way of the progress of science. Let us say instead that at times statesmanship was compelled, in order to preserve peace in certain territories, to repress currents of thoughts which the rulers believed could become dangerous to the public order, that political and sometimes personal struggles, rather than religious causes, have in the past determined the attitudes of theologians, lawmakers, traditionalists and philosophers.

It must, however, be recognized that even today in certain Muslim environments, there are strong objections to rational science and to modern industry. Such traditional Muslims remain strongly bound to their old traditions, based on their school of law.

Some Muslims are even filled with exaggerated fanaticisms. There are still jurists who are so attached to the literal expressions ofjuristic work which they regard as fundamental that they refuse to express an opinion when a new case appears for which no clue is to be found in these juristic work; or they try to keep the case in abeyance until they succeed in agreeing on a well-accepted opinion of one of their preferred authors—but it is not fair to accuse the spirit of Islam of rigidity and immobility, simply because of certain local situations and customs that are to be found in particular historical conditions today, or because of the over-rigid mentality of certain Muslim groups who accepted the juristic work as divine law.

But, unfortunately, many Muslim leaders in Nigeria have not adopted scientific methods, but follow blindly the views of the ancient jurists, particularly those of the Maliki school of law. They argue only that they want to establish an Islamic way of life; they forget that this way of life must relate to the reality of life in Nigeria, otherwise this ideal will remain a mere slogan and deception.

The Islamic way of life to me means scientific advancement and progress coupled with Islamic principles which should make Muslims remain spiritually and morally human beings and not machines.

The Nigerian Muslims like their non-Muslims brothers are engaged in a titanic struggle against poverty, hunger and disease. They know that their lot can be improved only by superior knowledge which science and technology bring with them.

At the beginning of Islam, there was cross-fertilization of knowledge existing in the Orient and Occident. It is an interesting fact of history that at that time the stimulation for scientific development flowed from Muslims to non-Muslims and today it must flow from non-Muslims to Muslims.

I do not think that it is derogatory to learn science and technology from a non-Muslim, but in learning new things from others, the Muslim should retain those good things that are wonderful and beautiful in Islamic teaching, doctrines that are capable of removing friction amongst individuals and nations.

The Muslim should have an open mind and an open heart in adopting good things from other people. Muslim scientists must develop critical minds and use initiative, independence and persistence when dealing with European scientific discovery.

European scientists were able to lay the foundation of technological and industrial power because they devoted themselves to further inquiry and research. Muslim scientists similarly have to acquire knowledge with continuous and painstaking efforts at extending the frontiers of knowledge.

Today is the age of science and the civilization of science. Anyone desirous of living an honorable life cannot escape the use of modern science. The quicker the ‘ulama’ and Muslims enter the age of science the better.

The basic problems of Nigeria today in the field of science and technology are associated with a search for greater productivity and a higher standard of living for its populace. This is why Muslims must lay emphasis on scientific education with a bias towards Islamic studies.

 Why Islamic Law Should be Applied

Modern man is threatened by a world created by himself; he is faced with the conversion of mind to naturalism, dogmatic secularism and opposition to belief in the Transcendent.

The true remedy, therefore, for the ills that affect mankind and threaten to overwhelm it today and tomorrow is for man to turn to God with single-minded purpose and make his peace with Him, having sincerely determined that in all matters, whatever, His guiding rule shall be....

That is why the Muslims all over the world want the application of Islamic civil law. Islamic civil law sets forth and places at man’s disposal a most effective and potent means of achieving the purpose of life. It is the best of all God’s numberless bounties bestowed upon man; it is indispensable for the beneficent growth of man in the epoch now unfolding before him....

But, the real question is not whether Islamic civil law should be applied or not, which all Muslims accept, but whether Nigeria should continue to apply classical juristic work without any modification or whether Islamic civil law in Nigeria should be applied within the primary source of Islamic law, i.e. the Qur’an and tradition of the Prophet....

The problem of Muslims in Nigeria is that many of the so-called Arabists believe that juristic work is so comprehensive that it provides solutions to all human problems for all times.

But, with all the comprehensiveness of the juristic works, this system is after all an individual interpretation and as such cannot claim any finality. Did the founders of our schools of laws ever claim finality for their reasoning and interpretation? “Never.”

The teaching of the Qur’an that life is a process of progressive creation necessitates that each generation, guided but unhampered by the work of its predecessors, should be permitted to solve its own problems.

Unfortunately many Muslims and non-Muslims regard the systems [prescribed] by various juristic school as the shari’a [Islamic law], although the juristic works constitute a long development of interpretation of the term ijtihad or reasoning. But this reasoning, to be accepted, must always rest on the texts of the Qur’an and the accepted sunna [practices of the Prophet]. But this juristic reasoning is always apt to vary from jurist to jurist and from time to time. The variety of opinion within juristic reasoning implies on the one hand a wealth ofjuridical [sources] and the remarkable techniques of interpreting the shari’a to solve the problems of their days. This, however, must be subordinated to the binding texts of the shari’a. A particular juristic notion may be rigid or may be wrong, nor should any juristic school or group of schools be identified with the Holy Qur’an and Prophet of Islam.

The principles in the Qur’an have great potentialities of expansion and development by interpretation from age to age to meet the changing conditions of man. It seeks to guide its followers in secular as well as spiritual affairs. It gave the world a sound conception of state, society and law unrivaled by any other religion or civilization.

Today it is recognized that Islamic civil law is a living force and, progressing in many Muslim countries within its accepted limits imposed by the divine command, is capable of meeting the challenge of the modern age.

Islamic civil law takes the whole of human conduct for its field. The verse conspectus of the jurists' work was not contained in Qur'an or the sunna. The jurists used their reason to interpret the law to solve the problem of their days. The problem facing the Muslim today could hardly have been conceived by the classical writers. Why then should the Muslims of today consider the jurists' views as divine law, and as such regard it as basically immutable?

The Qur'an and the sunna have always been regarded by the early doctors of Muslim laws as providing them a ground work of legal principles which far from leaving no scope for thought and legislative activities, had enabled them to evolve a practical legal system. The most significant is that there is no comparative system of civil law even in the so-called developed countries that can rival the excellency of Islamic civil law....

The Muslims of the present age must find solutions to their problems from the Holy Qur'an and the sunna. This they can only do by exerting their energy and reasoning in conducting research into the Holy Qufan and interpreting it in the light of modern scientific knowledge. But the Muslims will never develop as long as they blindly follow and accept as final the view ofjuristic works which were meant to solve the problems of 700 to 1300, which in my view is not relevant to the problems of the Muslims on the eve of 21st century of the Christian era.

It is tragic for the Muslims of Nigeria that Muslim leaders, particularly the Arabists occupying high official positions, have themselves lost the true spirit of Islam. They do not have the ability to interpret the principles and laws of Islam in the light of the changing conditions.... On the contrary, they are obsessed with the past and addicted to uncritical acceptance and blind imitation of antique Muslim juristic works as a final authority on Islam....

I am not advocating for the total rejection ofjuristic opinion, but I am opposed to following them blindly as if they are the final authority on Islam. The present generation of Muslims may gain from their work on how they have interpreted the shari’a to meet and solve the problems of their days. But present- day Muslims must never regard juristic reasoning as final. They must use their own intelligence to interpret the shari’a to meet the problems of today.

 26—The Evolution and Devolution of Religious Knowledge

Abdul-Karim Soroush

Abdul-Karim Soroush (Iran, born 1945), a pharmacologist and philosopher educated in Iran and England, was until recently a dean at the Research Institute for Human Sciences in Tehran and “one of the most prominent speakers in Iran in the 1990s,” lecturing at mosques, universities, and over the radio.[455]$$$ Soroush used this prominent position to argue forcefully for a rethinking of Islam’s relationship to the non-Muslim West. In particular, his studies in the philosophy of science have led him to suggest that Islamic nations can and must allow scientific advance, including relatively free conditions for researchers, and that religion can be studied “rationally” like other phenomena.[456]$$$ In this essay, Soroush argues that religion is divine but religious interpretation is human, fallible, and even sociologically determined. Such positions have put Soroush at odds with other Islamic scholars in Iran. In the mid-1990s, Soroush received death threats for his theological positions, was physically attacked on two occasions, has been banned from public lectures, and may lose his job.[457]$$$

The science of nature is a human endeavor to understand nature, and the science of religion is a human endeavor to understand religion. All understanding assumes suppositions and entails “categorization,” that is, subsuming the particular under universal categories and concepts. Understanding religion is no exception. It is preceded by certain assumptions and principles which are necessary conditions for its intelligibility and interpretation.

This seemingly Kantian position is more than familiar today, but a century ago not only was it a blasphemous view concerning religion, but a dubious one even in the case of natural sciences. The positivism of [John Stuart] Mill [English philosopher, 1806–1873] and [Francis] Bacon [English philosopher, 1561–1626] based itself on the idea that “brute facts” were available and only needed an open eye to be captured by observation. But later developments in the philosophy of science demonstrated clearly, to their utter disappointment, that these “brute facts” existed nowhere except in the barren lands of wild hallucinations of speculators. Even in simple inductive research, where the regular association of successive events is under scrutiny, one cannot be sure of the complete list of the relevant factors nor of the right aspects of the events subject to generalization. In all these cases one has to be equipped with a preassumed picture of the scene of research in order to know where to begin and where to end, what to include and explain and what to exclude as irrelevant or unimportant. These schemes are not sacrosanct; they can be criticized, modified, refined or perhaps redefined, but two things are absolutely certain about them: number one, their absolute inevitability in the field of research and for the purpose of understanding; number two, their transcendence and independence relative to the world of experiment.

Now, more important than all that is their impact on the whole context of the final product of the research. Preassumptions are not like chemical catalysts whose function is only to facilitate an otherwise slow chemical reaction, but rather like a matchmaker whose mediation determines who marries whom and shapes the whole structure of the ensuing family, within the conceivable and available possibilities of the age. The main and radical difference between positivist and post-positivist philosophy is the recognition of the fact, on the part of philosophers, that observation does not stand alone; it is theory-laden. In other words it is, of necessity, preceded by theories on the one hand and colored by the same theories on the other. Interestingly enough, scientific instruments which seem to provide us with careful observation and measurements, such as microscopes and nuclear magnetic resonance devices, are nothing but complex theoretical assumptions arranged and objectified in such a way as to allow us to put certain questions to nature and obtain answers therefrom.

The theory-ladenness of observations has been shown to be a fact of the history of science, as well as an implicit requirement of the method of science, that is, the logic of the understanding of nature. This important and pivotal insight, permeating the whole body of science, has been able to link areas as far apart from each other as logic, history, and the sociology of science, re-molding them into a unified whole, namely the contemporary post-positivistic philosophy of science.

In the same sense and exactly for the same reasons, one can say that the text does not stand alone, it does not carry its own meaning on its shoulders, it needs to be situated in a context, it is theory-laden, its interpretation is in flux, and presuppositions are as actively at work here as elsewhere in the field of understanding. Religious texts are no exception. Therefore their interpretation is subject to expansion and contraction according to the assumptions preceding them and/or the questions enquiring them. These assumptions can be of very different nature, ranging from philosophical, historical, and theological to the more specific assumptions such as linguistic and sociological ones. (These are part of the worldview of the age, which need not and do not usually enter the mind through formal education, but are utilized inadvertently and fluently.)

Now, since presuppositions are age-bound, can change and do change in fact, religious knowledge, or the science of religion which is the product of comprehending it, will be in continuous flux, and since it is only through those presuppositions that one can hear the voice of revelation—hence the religion itself is silent—and since the interpretation of the text is social by nature and depends on the community of experts, like all learned activities it will be an independent dynamic entity, abstracting from individual interpreters; containing right and wrong, certain and dubious ideas—the wrong ones being as important as the right ones from the evolutionary point of view. It is a branch of knowledge, no less, no more.

The outcome of the preceding concise arguments can be briefly listed as follows:

1. Religion, or revelation for that matter, is silent.

2. The science of religion is relative, that is, relative to presuppositions.

3. The science of religion is age-bound, because presuppositions are.

4. Revealed religion itself may be true and free from contradictions, but the science of religion is not necessarily so.

5. Religion may be perfect or comprehensive, but not so for the science of religion.

6. Religion is divine, but its interpretation is thoroughly human and this-worldly.

That is the story of religion. All this implies that religion is always surrounded by a host of contemporaneous data and deliberations, in constant give and take with them, the interpretation of which remains constant so long as these external elements are constant; once they change, the change will be reflected in the understanding of religion as well. Therefore it is not because of conspiracy or aberration of mind or illegitimate manipulation or extravagant interpretations that the science of religion changes. Rather, it is the natural product of the evolution of human understanding in non-religious fields and contexts that forces religion to be comprehended differently. And as mentioned above, external factors are responsible not only for the change, but also for the constancy of religious interpretation throughout the ages.

The worldview of classical humanity—its view of nature, man, God, history, language, society, happiness, certainty, reason, knowledge and the like—was reflected in its understanding of religion in the same manner and to the same extent as the worldview of modern humanity has exerted its influence on the science of religion. Each interpretation, of course, seems as natural and as true as the other to the party concerned.

This rough statement of the position of the “evolution and devolution of religious knowledge” may seem a pretty straightforward a priori piece of epistemology, not unfamiliar to hermeneuticists and philosophers of science. But it has two serious shortcomings. First, it may not look convincing or revealing enough to more historically minded scholars, who may ask for more historical data and a posteriori justification in support of the suggested doctrine. Second, it may seem a flatly false and even blasphemous idea about religion, whose revelatory nature, according to true believers, guarantees its constancy, relevance, and truth throughout history. Relativity and change are characteristics of man- made systems whose application to divine revelation would be utterly misplaced. In addition to that, it seems as if the doctrine puts religion at the mercy of extra- religious principles whose truth and accuracy are not certain, compromising the whole message of religion, whose main mission is to offer fallible humanity an infallible source of certainty and information.

Both questions are too complex to be treated here in depth and in full. But certain remarks are in order.

First, as to the demand of historians. The conflict between science and religion in Europe from the 16th century onwards is a very telling case. At first glance science made mincemeat of religion, disproved it in an unsurpassed manner, and demonstrated its reactionary nature forever.

(This is clearly a positivistic orientation that makes the meaning transparent for the unarmed observer.) But for more serious thinkers, religious and otherwise, and from an epistemological standpoint, it was a matchless opportunity to uncover the essence of those epoch- making champions. It showed at least that the clergy, trying in earnest to comprehend revelation, had generously and undeliberately utilized their medieval and premedieval worldviews to acquire the “true” interpretation of the Book, and of course they could not have done otherwise. All they should have realized, and it was later realized thoroughly indeed, thanks to the blessed conflict, was that a new constellation of suppositions was also conceivable in which religion might seem more consistent with the wisdom of the age. Reinterpretations began, and they were as we now know, nothing but revisions made in light of extra- religious shifts. It was seldom the case that words were found to be mistranslated from Greek or Syriac. Rather, debates on the language of religion revealed the depth of the indebtedness of textual interpretation to the implicit principles and presuppositions of the believers. It should be obvious by now that it is not enough for an interpreter to give simply a consistent interpretation of a whole text; interpretation must also be consistent with the received wisdom of the age.

Horrifying as this might sound, one has to notice that this has been the actual practice of all serious religious thinkers of all ages. In Iran, for instance, [Molla] Sadroddin Shirazi [1571–1640] and his followers are proud that they have successfully reconciled shari’a [Islamic law], ‘itfan [mysticism], and philosophy—in short, revelation and reason. This can only occur through a reinterpretation of shari’a according to the principles of philosophy, that is, to subsume it under philosophical categories. Some might think that Sadroddin’s rational justification of the dogmas of religion is the proper essence of his efforts to reconcile reason and revelation. But to put matters this way is to put the cart before the horse. In order to justify a statement rationally, one has to rationalize it first, that is, define its concept and categories in such a way as to render them liable to rational justification. Take the case of bodily resurrection (ma’ad). Sadroddin says quite explicitly that it does not become a true philosopher to be content with a simple belief in ma’ad; rather he must secure a rational understanding thereof. He must accept, for instance, an Aristotelian definition of the body as consisting of form and matter, and he must also accept Sadroddin’s principle that the form, rather than the matter, is the primary constituent element of the body, in order to justify bodily resurrection in a rational metaphysical way (bodies being resurrected in form rather than in matter). In other words, philosophical understanding of the text precedes the philosophical justification of it.

Therefore, the desired reconciliation between religion and philosophy cannot be purchased except at the expense of one being colored by the other; that is, only a conceptually philosophical religion (or, more meticulously put, a philosophized comprehension of a religious text) can be reconciled with philosophy, and a conceptual mystification of the religion would always precede the mystical justification of it, and so forth.

Mystical and philosophical Islam are but two conceivable kinds of Islam, better articulated and refined than others at the present, but in practice there are virtually innumerable types of Islam, all sharing the common feature of being in balance with the believers' extra-religious system of thought. Now, disputing the validity of those mystical and philosophical interpretations of the text is missing the point completely. These are parts and moments of the history of religion; all science is a mixture of right and wrong ideas. Despite the fact that every scientist tries hard to secure hard facts and true ideas, science itself, transcending the beliefs and opinions of this or that particular scientist, cannot but consist of errors, misunderstandings, dubious hypotheses, arguments and counterarguments, side by side with firmly established facts and conclusions. To see only the good side of the story is to distort history. There, defeats are as important as victories, and both are of the same value as far as the evolutionary life of science is concerned. The science of religion, to repeat the same point again, is no exception.

As another example take the case of tafsir bira'y, that is, the interpretation of the Qur'an according to one's wishes and views (ra'y comes from ru'ya, meaning "to see," so that "view" is the exact rendering of the word). Muslims have been severely warned against this kind of interpretation, and a tradition of the Prophet has it that he who interprets the Qur'an in conformity with his views, his dwelling place (in the hereafter) will be filled with fire.

Controversies over the exact meaning and applicability of tafsir-bi-ra’y are never-ending. Everybody claims to have avoided it while at the same time accusing others of committing the sin of subjecting the Qur’an to his own views, and rightly so, and no one really shows the way out. It has proved to be a hard nut to crack. In our own time ‘Allama Mohammad Husayn Tabataba’i [1903–1981], the author of Tafsir al-Mizan [The Scale, an Analysis of the Qur’an, 20 volumes, 1954–1972], suffered from the same charge despite his own warning in the introduction to his commentary against mixing up tatbiq (conforming) and tafsir (commenting).

The gracious advice of some of the uninitiated, that the objective commentator accomplishes the impossible task of wiping from mind every idea and opinion, except perhaps grammar and vocabulary, should be taken with a grain of salt. It is impossible because the history of religion demonstrates clearly that no one has ever been able to comply with this advice. Even more disastrously, to do so would be undesirable as well, because it would render the whole task of interpretation unrealizable. One has, at the least, to take a position as to whether God speaks in figurative language or not. Surely this position cannot be derived from the texts of religion themselves, or we will be trapped in a vicious circle. Therefore the position and its negation are both views (ra’y) to be adopted prior to the act of interpretation. So how are we to understand the threatening warning about objective and opinion-free interpretation of the Qur’an? Isn’t it the case that all interpretations are theoryladen? If so, then isn’t it better to take the warning as meaning simply not to base our interpretation on unsubstantiated theories? Yes. That is all. Therefore, everything hinges upon the extratextual positions again.

Tabataba’i, in his commentary, names theologians, philosophers, Sufis, and modernists as four groups who did not take care to extract the exact meaning of the text, but rather tried to impose their own views upon it, and committed ta’wil [claiming an internal meaning in contrast to the outward meaning], which is the paradigmatic case of tafsir bi-ra’y, in order to make verses of the Qur’an conform to their positions. In the case of modernists he specifically mentions the ta’wil they made about ‘assh (throne), kursi (chair), lowh (tablet), qalam (pen), interpreting these terms so as to imply material things (Tabataba’i, p. 7). He goes on to say that all these methods have one serious shortcoming in common, namely, imposing extratextual scientific and/or philosophical meanings on verses, thereby converting some of the literal meanings of the words into metaphors and some of the direct meanings into ta’wil.

His own method, according to Tabataba’i, is to collate one part of the text to another in order to construct the meaning through this hermeneutical circle. But he gives us at least one explicit hint as to the implicit foundations of his method, namely, that the language of the Qur’an is not to be taken too materialistically, because neither the materiality nor the actual structure of things are included in the meanings of words, only their functions are intended. Take the word “scale” (mizan), for instance, whose meaning does not include “having pans.” Digital scales are scales too. Perhaps future generations will witness totally different kinds of scales that we cannot dream of today. But one thing is certain: so long as something functions as a scale, it can be called a scale, no matter what it is made from or how it works. This paves the way, according to Tabataba’i, for us to grasp the true meaning of words like mizan (scale), lowh (tablet), and arsh (throne) in the Qur’an, and for us to avoid repeating the mistakes of those superficial theologians and traditionalists who took the words to imply familiar material things. The idea, of course, comes from Abu Hamid al-Ghazzali [philosopher, 1058–1111] (and later [Jalal al-Din] Rumi [poet, 1207–1273] and Fayz Kashani [Mulla Muhsin, circa 1598–1680]). Al-Ghazzali is adamant in his Mishkat al-Anwar [The Niche of Lights] that the word “light” (nur), for instance, literally implies the immaterial light, and that its application to familiar physical light is entirely metaphorical.

Again, disputing the validity of these conclusions is totally irrelevant. What matters from the vantage point of epistemology is to notice the lofty suppositions that are at work here, and the testimony of one of the great members of the dynasty of commentators, namely, Tabataba’i, about the history of tafsir [textual analysis] (indeed, the whole history of religion) as being tampered with by the uneducated views and improper wishes of mystics, philosophers, theologians, traditionalists and modernists alike. Modifying tone and terms, we can state the same fact as follows: the science of religion has been under continuous construction and reconstruction by various commentators and interpreters during its long history, and religion is nothing but the history of the science of religion, of course.

We come to the conclusion then that the whole history of the sincere efforts of commentators to liberate Qur’anic commentary from the infiltration of external ideas have ended in one sharp and important result, namely, the practical unavoidability of such infiltration, together with its epistemological inevitability. In other words, it is in practice unavoidable because it is epistemologically inevitable.

Another example may serve the purpose better. The commentator Tabataba’i, who is at the same time also a metaphysician of the first rank, tries laboriously to show that the principle of causality is endorsed by the Qur’an, whereas Jalal al-Din Rumi, the great Iranian mystic poet of the 7th century A.H., points exactly in the opposite direction, that is, that indeterminism is the lesson to be drawn from the Qur’an:

<quote>

The prophets came in order to cut the cord of causes: They flung their miracles at Saturn.

The whole of the Qur’an consists in the cutting off of causes. Its theme is the glory of the poor and the destruction of Abu Lahab [early enemy of Islam].

In like manner, from the beginning of the Qur’an to the end, is the abandonment of causes and means. (Mathnavi [Couplets], volume 3, verses 2517, 2520, 2525)

</quote>

Also of some interest is the criticism that Tabataba’i levels against [Mulla Mohammad Baqer] Majlesi, the great traditionalist (muhaddith) of the 11th century A.H. [1627–1698 A.D.] and the compiler of Bihar al-anwar [Seas of Light] in 110 volumes. Majlesi’s persuasion was anti-philosophical—hence his rejection of words like ruh [spirit] and nafs [soul] as referring to immaterial entities. Tabataba’i takes issue with him not on the literal meanings of words but on one of the main suppositions he imputes to Majlesi, namely, the idea that the language of religion is addressed only to laymen. According to Tabataba’i, this is not the case, that some of the sayings of the Prophet (peace be upon him) and his progeny are addressed to experts as well, so that one must look at them with a trained eye. Tabataba’i thinks that Majlesi’s mistrust of philosophy and philosophers has led him to infer incorrect and superficial meanings from some of the deepest and most exalted texts of Islam.

The case of mutashabihat is even more telling. According to SuraAl-‘Imran (Sura 3, Verse 7), the verses of the Qur’an are divided into two major classes, muhkamat and mutashabihat, roughly referring to verses having certain and uncertain implications, respectively. Few verses in the Qur’an are as controversial as this one. Commentators’ major controversial revolve around two central points: first, the exact meaning of these terms; second, the secret and the expediency of those “ambiguous” verses revealed to the Prophet. Some have argued that only the disconnected characters in the beginning of each sura are mutashabih, and all else is muhkam. Some have held that all verses covering resurrection and the attributes of God are mutashabih; still others have maintained that only verses concerning practical rituals and observances are muhkam; others consider only abrogated verses to be mutashabih; and one can find various other views as well.

As to the second point, namely, the question why the Qur’an contains such unclear verses, one comes across many curious hypotheses. These are but a few of them:

1. Mutashabihat are there in order for the believers to be distinguished from unbelievers. Faith cannot be but blind. True believers approve of all verses of the Qur’an, despite the fact that some of them offer no clear interpretation, but nonbelievers rely on their own reason and reject verses with unjustifiable or unclear meanings.

2. Mutashabihat are instrumental in mobilizing and cultivating reason, which is so dear to the Creator; hence their importance and their need to be incorporated in the Qur’an.

3. Mutashabihat attract the ill-hearted to the Qur’an in order to find materials for their devilish purposes; but this very act may sometimes lead them to the right path and may enlighten their hearts through the study of the Qur’an as a whole, both mutashabihat and muhkamat.

4. Religion and revelation are intended for all people, learned and otherwise; therefore, some very exalted ideas have to be conveyed in a very simple language, in the process mutilating facts and statements. Mutashabihat are verses in which language is under severe strain, due to the loftiness of the guest and the tininess of the nest (to borrow an analogy from Rumi).

As can be seen, none of these views really deals with the requirements of textual interpretation; therefore all of them miss the important point that the presence of mutashabihat in the Qur’an is something inherent in the text, emerging in the context of interpretation, and has nothing to do with testing unbelievers and so on. The issue of mutashabihat is not confined to the Qur’an alone. All texts, especially revealed ones, should be expected to contain muhkamat as well as mutashabihat, whose existence is the clear cause and effect of the expansion and contraction of the science of religion. Once one looks carefully at the process of understanding texts, which is always to subject to presuppositions, the true meaning of and reason for their presence in the Qur’an becomes evident. Interestingly enough, the Qur’an itself does not give any clue as to how mutashabihat can be determined and distinguished from other verses, and the whole history of Islam clearly shows that virtually every verse of the Qur’an has been suspected at one time or another of being mutashabih, which is clear evidence in favor of the suggestion that all this stems from the nature of interpretation and interpreters’ presuppositions.

As an instance of a non-linguistic presupposition, I may point to the problems one expects religion to solve—in brief, the question of expectations. Now this has got a very long and well-known theological ancestry reaching back to the vexed question of why people are in need of prophets. This is clearly an extra-religious question, the answer to which can have a profound impact on the way one interprets the text. Theologians who think that people cannot lead a happy life, individually and socially, without receiving guidance from prophets, naturally expect religions to advise people not only how to purify their souls and worship their creator, but also how to marry, wash, clean, eat, transact business, hire employees, lend money, punish criminals, and—above all—rule the country. These expectations of course induce one to search the text carefully and meticulously, lest one miss the minutest point alluding faintly to these anticipated matters, taking every hint seriously and building an entire edifice out of it. This is of course the dominant view in the Muslim world today.

But to those theologians who think otherwise, the content of the text is to be divided into two parts, essentials and accidentals, accidentals being functions of the cultural, social, and historical environment of the delivery of the main message, and more generally those points and allusions which are considered to be beyond the proper field of expectations. There are many hadiths (sayings of the Prophet) concerning treatment of diseases, say, but nobody really considers them essential to Islam because that is not what makes people needy of prophets. People themselves can find the facts about diseases and drugs through trial and error. If that is so, then what about philosophy, economics, politics, and the like? Are these also beyond the proper field of the mission of prophets? These are very crucial and hotly debated questions among Muslim intellectuals today, but the main issue sometimes remains untouched or unattended, namely the extratextuality of the question of expectations. These problems are not to be decided on the strength of text and tradition or historical facts. On the contrary, tradition and the text should be explained in light of the expectations.

Treating these questions requires a good deal of philosophy, politics, sociology, and history, and that is what gives the science of religion the flavor of the age. That also explains why the true ijtihad(rational adjudication) in disciplines such asfiqh [Islamic jurisprudence] cannot materialize unless a true ijtihadin first principles has taken place beforehand. This, in turn, shows why fiqh has been so stagnant in religious seminaries in recent centuries. Since fiqh is a “consumer” science, its stagnation is due to the lack of dynamism on the part of the “producer” disciplines like economics, political philosophy, and ‘Ilm al-Imran (the sociology of Ibn Khaldun [13321406]). These constitute the relevant reasons for the stagnation. The story of the causes is different, of course.

The status and significance of religious revivalism and intellectualism can now be better understood. Broadly speaking, revivalism can transpire in two different manners, positive and negative. Negative revivalism consists in purging and purifying current religious understanding of alien elements and doing justice to the more neglected dimensions thereof—the great champion of the field being al-Ghazzali, no doubt. Positive revivalism, by contrast, is more attentive to and more deeply concerned with the extra-religious factors and foundations required for and relevant to the time-bound comprehension of the text. The most prominent representative of this orientation is Muhammad Iqbal [India, 1877–1938], whose main complaint was directed to the dominance of Greek thought over Islamic culture. Both al-Ghazzali and Iqbal serve the same purpose, of course, namely, to keep the mission of religion alive. The difference is due to the first-order and second-order epistemological outlooks of the two forms of reform.

This brings me to the end of my treatment of the first question. But before leaving this part of the discussion, I would like to emphasize the point that religious reform in our time cannot succeed unless one is vigilant to the continuous new developments taking place in the different areas of thought. Mottos like “back to the roots” or “try the neglected sources” or “find a brave inspired thinker” can be very misleading. No reform can take place without re-shuffling the traditional suppositions, and no reshuffling will be forthcoming unless one is well acquainted with both revelation and ideas developed outside the sphere of revelation. The truths uncovered inside and outside the sphere of revelation sooner or later approach an equilibrium. To combat the stagnation one has to mobilize the external sources. Muslims’ decadent understanding of the sacred texts was a consequence of the decadent civilizational, cultural, and social climate, rather than vice versa.

Now as to the second charge, namely, betraying the sacredness of the text, sacrificing its eternal message at the doorstep of the vagaries of the age, and undermining the certitude of faith, I’d better start with a short dialogue which took place recently between a friend and myself. “What is your position on the Islamization of knowledge?” he asked me quite seriously, and then added in a jocular way, “Perhaps you opt for a scientization of Islam rather than Islamization of knowledge?” “Neither of the two,” I replied. “I opt for the humanization of religion.” That was my reply, and in fact it is the basic foundation on which the whole edifice of “The Evolution and Devolution of Religious Knowledge” is erected. Revealed religion, of course, is divine, but not so for the science of religion, which is a thoroughly human production and construction. It is human in the sense that it is imprinted by virtually all characteristics of human beings, both noble and mean.

Rationality, prejudice, egoism, truth-seeking, obliviousness, greed, fallibility, partiality, complacency, easygoingness, acquisitiveness, and the like all have their due share in the science of religion and all influence it in one way or another. True, the revelation is divine, but what about the interpretation of the revelation?

The interpretation no doubt may be conjectural, fallible, changeable, partial, fallacious, one-sided, misguided, prejudiced, culture-bound, and incomplete, but this is what the Source of Revelation has ordained it to be. We are fallible human beings and that is our lot from Truth. The case of religion is no better than the case of nature. There also we are captives of our humanity. No human science is sacred, the science of religion being no exception. But of course, the revelation itself is different. Therefore the dichotomy of the revelation/interpretation should be kept intact. We are all immersed in an ocean of interpretations, and whenever one tries to offer the “true” interpretation of the text, he makes himself even more engaged. To capture the true intention of the Revelator is an ideal toward which all of us approach collectively, but in the end we may discover that the true intention of the Revelator was nothing but the collective endeavor of mankind itself. Here the action and its telos coincide. This is not to desacralize the sacred or to secularize religion; it is the simple and at the same time subtle instance of the naturalization of the supernatural, or if you like, the manifestation of the supernatural as and in the natural.

The secular view is blind to the supernatural, but here we look at human interpretation as revelation descended anew, from the heaven of the text to the earth of interpretation through the angel of the reason of the age, after being revealed to the Prophet once in the past. In other words we look at revelation in the mirror of interpretation, much as a devout scientist looks at creation in the mirror of nature. Of progress we are not certain, but evolution is certainly guaranteed.

Now there is a sharp difference between faith and knowledge. Faith is always personal and private, and firmer or less firm, but knowledge cannot be but collective, public, and fallible. A higher-order look at the historical process of the evolution of knowledge shows us that despite the firm belief of individual believers in their own interpretation of revelation, the caravan of knowledge, informed by all kinds of complexities and contrarieties, is breaking its way ahead, feeding on the controversies, competitions, and cooperations of its members, irrespective of their individual desires and faiths. Our lot is nothing but to hope. That is what Jalal al-Din Rumi has exhorted us:

<quote>

The merchant of timid disposition and frail spirit Neither gains nor loses in his quest.

Nay, he suffers loss, for he is deprived and despicable.

Only he that is an eater of flames will find the light.

Inasmuch as affairs turn upon hope,

The affairs of religion are most worthy.

Here it is most permitted to knock at the door.

Naught but hope is possible. (Mathnavi, volume 3, verses 3084–3092)

</quote>

Once that is understood, the way for religious democracy and the transcendental unity of religions, which are predicated on religious pluralism, will have been paved— these being but two fruits of that auspicious tree.

<quote>

Seest thou not how God sets forth a parable: a goodly word like a goodly tree, whose root is firmly fixed and whose branches reach to the heavens. It brings forth its fruits at all times by the leave of its Lord. (Qur’an, Sura 14, Verses 24–25)

</quote>

* Part VI— Progress

 27—The Principle of Movement in the Structure of Islam

Muhammad Iqbal

Muhammad Iqbal (India, 1877–1938)—poet, philosopher, lawyer—is widely considered the spiritual father of Pakistan. His presidential address to the Muslim League in 1930 helped to launch the movement toward the partition of British South Asia into two nations, the predominantly Muslim Pakistan and the predominantly Hindu India.[458] As important as his political legacy is Iqbal's position as "a driving force for Islamic modernism in South Asia."[459] Iqbal leveled sharp criticism against the rigidity of traditional religious exegesis and called for a renewed emphasis on "movement" in the interpretation of Islam.

As a cultural movement Islam rejects the old static view of the universe, and reaches a dynamic view. As an emotional system of unification it recognizes the worth of the individual as such, and rejects blood-relationship as a basis of human unity. Blood-relationship is earth-rootedness. The search for a purely psychological foundation of human unity becomes possible only with the perception that all human life is spiritual in its origin. Such a perception is creative of fresh loyalties without any ceremonial to keep them alive, and makes it possible for man to emancipate himself from the earth. Christianity which had originally appeared as a monastic order was tried by Constantine [Roman emperor, reigned 306–337] as a system of unification. Its failure to work as such a system drove the Emperor Julian [reigned 361363] to return to the old gods of Rome on which he attempted to put philosophical interpretations. A modern historian of civilization has thus depicted the state of the civilized world about the time when Islam appeared on the stage of History:

<quote>

It seemed then that the great civilization that it had taken four thousand years to construct was on the verge of disintegration, and that mankind was likely to return to that condition of barbarism where every tribe and sect was against the next, and law and order were unknown. The old tribal sanctions had lost their power. Hence the old imperial methods would no longer operate. The new sanctions created by Christianity were working division and destruction instead of unity and order. It was a time fraught with tragedy. Civilization, like a gigantic tree whose foliage had overarched the world and whose branches had borne the golden fruits of art and science and literature, stood tottering, its trunk no longer alive with the flowing sap of devotion and reverence, but rotted to the core, riven by the storms of war, and held together only by the cords of ancient customs and laws, that might snap at any moment. Was there any emotional culture that could be brought in to gather mankind once more into unity and to save civilization? This culture must be something of a new type, for the old sanctions and ceremonials were dead, and to build up others of the same kind would be the work of centuries.

</quote>

The writer then proceeds to tell us that the world stood in need of a new culture to take the place of the culture of the throne, and the systems of unification which were based on blood-relationship. It is amazing, he adds, that such a culture should have arisen from Arabia just at the time when it was most needed. There is, however, nothing amazing in the phenomenon. The world-life intuitively sees its own needs, and at critical moments defines its own direction. This is what, in the language of religion, we call prophetic revelation. It is only natural that Islam should have flashed across the consciousness of a simple people untouched by any of the ancient cultures, and occupying a geographical position where three continents meet together. The new culture finds the foundation of world unity in the principle of towhid [one- ness]. Islam, as a polity, is only a practical means of making this principle a living factor in the intellectual and emotional life of mankind. It demands loyalty to God, not to thrones. And since God is the ultimate spiritual basis of all life, loyalty to God virtually amounts to man’s loyalty to his own ideal nature. The ultimate spiritual basis of all life, as conceived by Islam, is eternal and reveals itself in variety and change. A society based on such a conception of Reality must reconcile, in its life, the categories of permanence and change. It must possess eternal principles to regulate its collective life; for the eternal gives us a foothold in the world of perpetual change. But eternal principles when they are understood to exclude all possibilities of change which, according to the Qur’an, is one of the greatest “signs” of God, tend to immobilize what is essentially mobile in its nature. The failure of Europe in political and social science illustrates the former principle; the immobility of Islam during the last 500 years illustrates the latter. What then is the principle of movement in the structure of Islam? This is known as ijtihad [Islamic interpretation].

The word literally means “to exert.” In the terminology of Islamic law it means to exert with a view to form an independent judgment on a legal question. The idea, I believe, has its origin in a well-known verse of the Qur’an—“And to those who exert We show Our path.” [Sura 29, Verse 69] We find it more definitely adumbrated in a tradition of the Holy Prophet. When Mu’adh [ibn Jabal, died 627] was appointed ruler of Yemen, the Prophet is reported to have asked him as to how he would decide matters coming up before him. “I will judge matters according to the Book of God,” said Mu’adh. “But if the Book of God contains nothing to guide you?” “Then I will act on the precedents of the Prophet of God.” “But if the precedents fail?” “Then I will exert to form my own judgment.” The student of the history of Islam, however, is well aware that with the political expansion of Islam systematic legal thought became an absolute necessity, and our early doctors of law, both of Arabian and non-Arabian descent, worked ceaselessly until all the accumulated wealth of legal thought found a final expression in our recognized schools of law. These schools of law recognize three degrees of ijtihad: (1) complete authority in legislation which is practically confined to the founders of the schools, (2) relative authority which is to be exercised within the limits of a particular school, and (3) special authority which relates to the determining of the law applicable to a particular case left undetermined by the founders. In this paper I am concerned with the first degree of ijtihad only, i.e. complete authority in legislation. The theoretical possibility of this degree of ijtihad is admitted by the Sunnis, but in practice it has always been denied ever since the establishment of the schools, inasmuch as the idea of complete ijtihad is hedged round by conditions which are wellnigh impossible of realization in a single individual. Such an attitude seems exceedingly strange in a system of law based mainly on the groundwork provided by the Qur’an which embodies an essentially dynamic outlook on life. It is, therefore, necessary, before we proceed farther, to discover the causes of this intellectual attitude which has reduced the Law of Islam practically to a state of immobility. Some European writers think that the stationary character of the Law of Islam is due to the influence of the Turks. This is an entirely superficial view, for the legal schools of Islam had been finally established long before the Turkish influence began to work in the history of Islam. The real causes are, in my opinion, as follows:

1. We are all familiar with the Rationalist movement which appeared in the church of Islam during the early days of the ‘Abbasids [caliphs, reigned 750–1258], and the bitter controversies which it raised. Take for instance the one important point of controversy between the two camps—the conservative dogma of the eternity of the Qur’an. When Rationalists denied it because they thought that this was only another form of the Christian dogma of the eternity of the word; on the other hand, the conservative thinkers whom the later ‘Abbasids, fearing the political implications of Rationalism, gave their full support, thought that by denying the eternity of the Qur’an the Rationalists were undermining the very foundations of Muslim society. [Ibrahim ibn Sayyar] Nazzam [circa 775–845], for instance, practically rejected the traditions [hadiths], and openly declared Abu Hurayra [a Companion of the Prophet, died 678] to be an untrustworthy reporter. Thus, partly owing to a misunderstanding of the ultimate motives of Rationalism, and partly owing to the unrestrained thought of particular Rationalists, conservative thinkers regarded this movement as a force of disintegration, and considered it a danger to the stability of Islam as a social polity. Their main purpose, therefore, was to preserve the social integrity of Islam, and to realize that the only course open to them was to utilize the binding force of shari’a [Islamic law], and to make the structure of their legal system as rigorous as possible.

2. The rise and growth of ascetic Sufism, which gradually developed under influences of a non-Islamic character, a purely speculative side, is to a large extent responsible for this attitude. On its purely religious side Sufism fostered a kind of revolt against the verbal quibbles of our early doctors. The case of [Abu ‘Abdallah] Sufyan Sauri [715–778] is an instance in point. He was one of the acutest legal minds of his time, and was nearly the founder of a school of law; but being also intensely spiritual, the dry-as-dust subtleties of contemporary legists drove him to ascetic Sufism. On its speculative side which developed later, Sufism is a form of freethought and in alliance with Rationalism. The emphasis that it laid on the distinction of zahir and batin (Appearance and Reality) created an attitude of indifference to all that applies to Appearance and not to Reality.

This spirit of total other-worldliness in later Sufism obscured men's vision of a very important aspect of Islam as a social polity, and offering the prospect of unrestrained thought on its speculative side it attracted and finally absorbed the best minds in Islam. The Muslim state was thus left generally in the hands of intellectual mediocrities, and the unthinking masses of Islam, having no personalities of a higher calibre to guide them, found their security only in blindly following the schools.

On the top of all this came the destruction of Baghdad—the center of Muslim intellectual life—in the middle of the 13th century. This was indeed a great blow, and all the contemporary historians of the invasion of Tartars describe the havoc of Baghdad with a half-suppressed pessimism about the future of Islam. For fear of further disintegration, which is only natural in such a period of political decay, the conservative thinkers of Islam focused all their efforts on the one point of preserving a uniform social life for the people by a jealous exclusion of all innovations in the law of shari'a as expounded by the early doctors of Islam. Their leading idea was social order, and there is no doubt that they were partly right, because organization does to a certain extent counteract the forces of decay. But they did not see, and our modern 'ulama' [religious scholars] do not see, that the ultimate fate of a people does not depend so much on organization as on the worth and power of individual men. In an overorganized society the individual is altogether crushed out of existence. He gains the whole wealth of social thought around him and loses his own soul. Thus a false reverence for past history and its artificial resurrection constitute no remedy for a people's decay. "The verdict of history," as a modern writer has happily put it, "is that worn out ideas have never risen to power among a people who have worn them out." The only effective power, therefore, that counteracts the forces of decay in a people is the rearing of self-concentrated individuals. Such individuals alone reveal the depth of life. They disclose new standards in the light of which we begin to see that our environment is not wholly inviolable and requires revision. The tendency to overorganization by a false reverence of the past as manifested in the legists of Islam in the 13th century and later, was contrary to the inner impulse of Islam, and consequently invoked the powerful reaction of Ibn Taymiyya, one of the most indefatigable writers and preachers of Islam, who was born in 1263, five years after the destruction of Baghdad.

Ibn Taymiyya was brought up in Hanbalite tradition. Claiming freedom of ijtihad for himself he rose in revolt against the finality of the schools, and went back to first principles in order to make a fresh start. Like [Abu Muhammad ‘Ali] Ibn Hazm [994–1064]—the founder of Zahiri school of law—he rejected the Hanafite principle of reasoning by analogy and ijma’ [consensus] as understood by older legists for he thought agreement was the basis of all superstition. And there is no doubt that, considering the moral and intellectual decrepitude of his times, he was right in doing so. In the 16th century [Jalal-al-Din] Suyuti [died 1505] claimed the same privilege of ijtihad to which he added the idea of a renovator at the beginning of each century. But the spirit of Ibn Taymiyya’s teaching found a fuller expression in a movement of immense potentialities which arose in the 18th century from the sands of Nejd [Arabia], described by [Duncan Black] Macdonald [Orientalist, 1863–1943] as the “cleanest spot in the decadent world of Islam.” It is really the first throb of life in modern Islam. To the inspiration of this movement are traceable, directly or indirectly, nearly all the great modern movements of Muslim Asia and Africa, e.g., the Sennusi movement, the Pan-Islamic movement, and the Babi movement, which is only a Persian reflex of Arabian Protestantism. The great puritan reformer, Muhammad Ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhab, who was born in 1700, studied in Medina, traveled in Persia, and finally succeeded in spreading the fire of his restless soul throughout the whole world of Islam. He was similar in spirit to [Abu Hamid] Ghazzali’s [1058–1111] disciple, Muhammad Ibn Tumart [1077–1130]—the Berber puritan reformer of Islam who appeared amidst the decay of Muslim Spain, and gave her a fresh inspiration. We are, however, not concerned with the political career of this movement, which was terminated by the armies of Muhammad ‘Ali Pasha [ruler of Egypt, circa 1768- 1849]. The essential thing to note is the spirit of freedom manifested in it: though inwardly this movement, too, is conservative in its own fashion. While it rises in revolt against the finality of the schools, and vigorously asserts the right of private judgment, its vision of the past is wholly uncritical, and in matters of law it mainly falls back on the traditions of the Prophet.

Passing on to Turkey, we find that the idea of ijtihad, reinforced and broadened by modern philosophical ideas, has long been working in the religious and political thought of the Turkish nation. This is clear from Halim Sabri's [Sibay *, Ottoman Empire and Turkey, 1883–1946] new theory of Islamic Law, grounded on modern sociological concepts. If the renaissance of Islam is a fact, and I believe it is a fact, we too one day, like the Turks, will have to re-evaluate our intellectual inheritance. And if we cannot make any original contribution to the general thought of Islam, we may, by healthy conservative criticism, serve at least as a check on the rapid movement of liberalism in the world of Islam.[460]

I now proceed to give you some idea of religiopolitical thought in Turkey which will indicate to you how the power of ijtihad is manifested in recent thought and activity in that country. There were, a short time ago, two main lines of thought in Turkey represented by the Nationalist Party and the Party of religious reform. The point of supreme interest with the Nationalist Party is above all the State and not Religion. With these thinkers religion as such has no independent function. The state is the essential factor in national life which determines the character and function of all other factors. They, therefore, reject old ideas about the function of State and Religion, and accentuate the separation of Church and State. Now the structure of Islam as a religio-political system, no doubt, does permit such a view, though personally I think it is a mistake to suppose that the idea of state is more dominant and rules all other ideas embodied in the system of Islam. In Islam the spiritual and the temporal are not two distinct domains, and the nature of an act, however secular in its import, is determined by the attitude of mind with which the agent does it. It is the invisible mental background of the act which ultimately determines its character. An act is temporal or profane if it is done in a spirit of detachment from the infinite complexity of life behind it; it is spiritual if it is inspired by that complexity. In Islam it is the same reality which appears as Church looked at from one point of view and State from another. It is not true to say that Church and State are two sides or facets of the same thing. Islam is a single unanalyzable reality which is one or the other as your point of view varies. The point is extremely far-reaching and a full elucidation of it will involve us in a highly philosophical discussion. Suffice it to say that this ancient mistake arose out of the bifurcation of the unity of man into two distinct and separate realities which somehow have a point of contact, but which are in essence opposed to each other. The truth, however, is that matter is spirit in space-time reference. The unity called man is body when you look at it as acting in regard to what we call the external world; it is mind or soul when you look at it as acting in regard to the ultimate aim and ideal of such acting. The essence of towhid as a working idea is equality, solidarity, and freedom. The state, from the Islamic standpoint, is an endeavor to transform these ideal principles into space-time forces, an aspiration to realize them in a definite human organization. It is in this sense alone that the state in Islam is a theocracy, not in the sense that it is headed by a representative of God on earth who can always screen his despotic will behind his supposed infallibility. The critics of Islam have lost sight of this important consideration. The ultimate Reality, according to the Qur'an, is spiritual, and its life consists in its temporal activity. The spirit finds its opportunities in the natural, the material, the secular. All that is secular is therefore sacred in the roots of its being. The greatest service that modern thought has rendered to Islam, and as a matter of fact to all religion, consists in its criticism of what we call material or natural—a criticism which discloses that the merely material has no substance until we discover it rooted in the spiritual. There is no such thing as a profane world. All this immensity of matter constitutes a scope for the self-realization of spirit. All is holy ground. As the Prophet so beautifully puts it: "The whole of this earth is a mosque." The state according to Islam is only an effort to realize the spiritual in a human organization. But in this sense all state, not based on mere domination and aiming at the realization of ideal principles, is theocratic.

The truth is that the Turkish nationalists assimilated the idea of the separation of Church and State from the history of European political ideas. Primitive Christianity was founded, not as a political or civil unit, but as a monastic order in a profane world, having nothing to do with civil affairs, and obeying the Roman authority practically in all matters. The result of this was that when the State became Christian, State and Church confronted each other as distinct powers with interminable boundary disputes between them. Such a thing could never happen in Islam; for Islam was from the very beginning a civil society, having received from the Qur'an a set of simple legal principles which, like the twelve tables of the Romans, carried, as experience subsequently proved, great potentialities of expansion and development by interpretation. The Nationalist theory of state, therefore, is misleading inasmuch as it suggests a dualism which does not exist in Islam.

The Religious Reform Party, on the other hand, led by Said Halim Pasha [1863–1921; Ottoman Grand Vizier, or prime minister, 1913–1916], insisted on the fundamental fact that Islam is a harmony of idealism and positivism; and, as a unity of the eternal verities of freedom, equality, and solidarity, has no fatherland. “As there is no English Mathematics, German Astronomy or French Chemistry,” says the Grand Vizier, “so there is no Turkish, Arabian, Persian or Indian Islam. Just as the universal character of scientific truths engenders varieties of scientific national cultures which in their totality represent human knowledge, much in the same way the universal character of Islamic verities creates varieties of national, moral and social ideals.” Modern culture based as it is on national egoism is, according to this keen-sighted writer, only another form of barbarism. It is the result of an over-developed industrialism through which men satisfy their primitive instincts and inclinations. He, however, deplores that during the course of history the moral and social ideals of Islam have been gradually de-Islamized through the influence of local character, and pre-Islamic superstitions of Muslim nations.

These ideals today are more Iranian, Turkish, or Arabian than Islamic. The pure brow of the principle of towhid has received more or less an impress of heathenism, and the universal and impersonal character of the ethical ideals of Islam has been lost through a process of localization. The only alternative open to us, then, is to tear off from Islam the hard crust which has immobilized an essentially dynamic outlook on life, and to rediscover the original verities of freedom, equality, and solidarity with a view to rebuild our moral, social, and political ideals out of their original simplicity and universality. Such are the views of the Grand Vizier of Turkey. You will see that following a line of thought more in tune with the spirit of Islam, he reaches practically the same conclusion as the Nationalist Party, that is to say, the freedom of ijtihadwith a view to rebuild the law of shari’a in the light of modern thought and experience.

Let us now see how the Grand National Assembly [Turkey’s parliament] has exercised this power of ijtihadin regard to the institution of khilafat [caliphate]. According to Sunni Law the appointment of an imam [leader] or khalifa [caliph] is absolutely indispensable. The first question that arises in this connection is this—Should the Caliphate be vested in a single person? Turkey’s ijtihad is that according to the spirit of Islam the Caliphate or Imamate can be vested in a body of persons, or an elected Assembly. The religious doctors of Islam in Egypt and India, so far as I know, have not yet expressed themselves on this point. Personally, I believe the Turkish view is perfectly sound. It is hardly necessary to argue this point. The republican form of government is not only thoroughly consistent with the spirit of Islam, but has also become a necessity in view of the new forces that are set free in the world of Islam.

In order to understand the Turkish view let us seek the guidance of Ibn Khaldun [1332–1406]—first philosophical historian of Islam. Ibn Khaldun, in his famous Prolegomena, mentions three distinct views of the idea of Universal Caliphate in Islam: (1) That Universal Imamate is a Divine institution, and is consequently indispensable; (2) that it is merely a matter of expediency; (3) that there is no need of such an institution. The last view was taken by the Khawarji.[461] It seems that modern Turkey has shifted from the first to the second view, i.e., to the view of the Mu’tazila[462] who regarded Universal Imamate as a matter of expediency only. The Turks argue that in our political thinking we must be guided by our past political experience which points unmistakably to the fact that the idea of Universal Imamate has failed in practice. It was a workable idea when the Empire of Islam was intact. Since the break-up of this Empire independent political units have arisen. The idea has ceased to be operative and cannot work as a living factor in the organization of modern Islam. Far from serving any useful purpose it has really stood in the way of a reunion of Independent Muslim States. Persia has stood aloof from the Turks in view of her doctrinal differences regarding the khilafat; Morocco has always looked askance at them, and Arabia has cherished private ambition. And all these ruptures in Islam for the sake of a mere symbol of a power which departed long ago. Why should we not, he can further argue, learn from experience in our political thinking? Did not Qazi Abu Bakr Baqilani [Iraq, died 1013] drop the condition of qarshiyat [membership in the Quraysh tribe of the Prophet] in the khalifa in view of the facts of experience, i.e., the political fall of the Quraysh and their consequent inability to rule the world of Islam? Centuries ago Ibn Khaldun, who personally believed in the condition of qarshiyat in the khalifa, argued much in the same way. Since the power of the Quraysh, he says, has gone, there is no alternative but to accept the most powerful man as Imam in the country where he happens to be powerful. Thus Ibn Khaldun, realizing the hard logic of facts, suggests a view which may be regarded as the first dim vision of an International Islam fairly in sight today. Such is the attitude of the modern Turk, inspired as he is by the realities of experiences, and not by the scholastic reasoning ofjurists who lived and thought under different conditions of life.

To my mind these arguments, if rightly appreciated, indicate the birth of an International ideal which, though forming the very essence of Islam, has been hitherto overshadowed or rather displaced by Arabian Imperialism of the centuries of Islam. This new ideal is clearly reflected in the work of the great nationalist poet Zia [Gokalp] [Turkey, 1875–1924], whose songs, inspired by the philosophy of Auguste Comte [French social theorist, 1798–1857], have done a great deal in shaping the present thought of Turkey. I reproduce the substance of one of his poems from Professor [August] Fischer’s [1922] German translation:

<quote>

In order to create a really effective political unity of Islam, all Moslem countries must first become independent: and then in their totality they should range themselves under one Caliph. Is such a thing possible at the present moment? If not today, one must wait. In the meantime the caliph must reduce his own house to order and lay the foundation of a workable modern state.

In the international world the weak find no sympathy; power alone deserves respect.

</quote>

These lines clearly indicate the trend of modern Islam. For the present every Moslem nation must sink into her own deeper self, temporarily focus her vision on herself alone, until all are strong and powerful to form a living family of republics. A true and living unity, according the nationalist thinkers, is not so easy as to be achieved by a merely symbolical overlordship. It is truly manifested in a multiplicity of free independent units whose racial rivalries are adjusted and harmonized by the unifying bond of a common spiritual aspiration. It seems to me that God is slowly bringing home to us the truth that Islam is neither Nationalism nor Imperialism but a League ofNations which recognizes artificial boundaries and racial distinctions for facility of reference only, and not for restricting the social horizon of its members.

From the same poet the following passage from a poem called “Religion and Science” will throw some further light on the general religious outlook which is being gradually shaped in the world of Islam today:

<quote>

Who were the first spiritual leaders of mankind? Without doubt the Prophets and Holy men. In every period religion has led philosophy; From it alone morality and art receive light. But then religion grows weak, and loses her original ardor! Holy men disappear, and spiritual leadership becomes, in name, the heritage of the Doctors of Law! The leading star of the Doctors of Law is tradition; They drag religion with force on this track; but philosophy says: “My leading star is reason: you go right, I go left.”

Both religion and philosophy claim the soul of man and draw it on either side!

When this struggle is going on pregnant experience delivers up positive science, and this young leader of thought says, “Tradition is history and Reason is the method of history! Both interpret and desire to reach the same indefinable something!”

But what is this something?

Is it a spiritualized heart?

If so, then take my last word—Religion is positive science, the purpose of which is to spiritualize the heart of man!

</quote>

It is clear from these lines how beautifully the poet has adopted the Comtian idea of the three stages of man’s intellectual development, i.e., theological, metaphysical, and scientific—to the religious outlook of Islam. And the view of religion embodied in these lines determines the poet’s attitude towards the position of Arabic in the educational system of Turkey. He says:

<quote>

The land where the call to prayer resounds in Turkish; where those who pray understand the meaning of their religion; the land where the Qur’an is learnt in Turkish; where every man, big or small, knows full well the command of God; O! Son of Turkey! that land is thy fatherland!

</quote>

If the aim of religion is the spiritualization of the heart, then it must penetrate the soul of man, and it can best penetrate the inner man, according to the poet, only if its spiritualizing ideas are clothed in his mother tongue. Most people in India will condemn this displacement of Arabic by Turkish. For reasons which will appear later the poet’s ijtihad is open to grave objections, but it must be admitted that the reform suggested by him is not without a parallel in the past history of Islam. We find that when Muhammad Ibn Tumart—the Mehdi of Muslim Spain—who was a Berber by nationality, came to power, and established the pontifical rule of the Mawahidin, he ordered for the sake of the illiterate Berbers, that the Qur’an should be translated and read in the Berber language; that the call to prayer should be given in Berber; and that all the functionaries of the Church must know the Berber language. In another passage the poet gives his ideal of womanhood. In his zeal for the equality of man and woman he wishes to see radical changes in the family law of Islam as it is understood and practiced today:

<quote>

There is the woman, my mother, my sister, or my daughter; it is she who calls up the most sacred emotions from the depths of my life! There is my beloved, my sun, my moon and my star; it is she who makes me understand the poetry of life! How could the Holy Law of God regard these beautiful creatures as despicable beings? Surely there is an error in the interpretation of the Qur’an by the learned?

The foundation of the nation and the state is the family!

As long as the full worth of the woman is not realized, national life remains incomplete.

The upbringing of the family must correspond with justice;

Therefore equality is necessary in three things—in divorce, in separation, and in inheritance.

As long as the woman is counted half the man as regards inheritance and one fourth of man in matrimony, neither the family nor the country will be elevated. For other rights we have opened national courts of justice;

The family, on the other hand, we have left in the hands of schools.

I do not know why we have left the woman in the lurch?

Does she not work for the land? Or, will she turn her needle into a sharp bayonet to tear off her rights from our hands through a revolution?

</quote>

The truth is that among the Muslim nations of today, Turkey alone has shaken off its dogmatic slumber, and attained self-consciousness. She alone has claimed her right of intellectual freedom; she alone has passed from the ideal to the real—a transition which entails keen intellectual and moral struggle. To her the growing complexities of a mobile and broadening life are sure to bring new situations suggesting new points of view, and necessitating fresh interpretations of principles which are only of an academic interest to a people who have never experienced the joy of spiritual expansion. It is, I think, the English thinker Hobbes who makes this acute observation that to have a succession of identical thoughts and feelings is to have no thoughts and feelings at all. Such is the lot of most Muslim countries today. They are mechanically repeating old values, whereas the Turk is on the way to creating new values. He has passed through great experiences which have revealed his deeper self to him. In him life has begun to move, change, and amplify, giving birth to new desires, bringing new difficulties and suggesting new interpretations. The question which confronts him today, and which is likely to confront other Muslim countries in the near future is whether the Law of Islam is capable of evolution—a question which will require great intellectual effort, and is sure to be answered in the affirmative; provided the world of Islam approaches it in the spirit of ‘Umar [Companion of the Prophet and second caliph, 592- 644]—the first critical and independent mind in Islam who, at the last moments of the Prophet, had the moral courage to utter these remarkable words: “The Book of God is sufficient for us.”

We heartily welcome the liberal movement in modern Islam; but it must also be admitted that the appearance of liberal ideas in Islam constitutes also the most critical moment in the history of Islam. Liberalism has a tendency to act as a force of disintegration, and the race-idea which appears to be working in modern Islam with greater force than ever may ultimately wipe off the broad human outlook which Muslim people have imbibed from their religion. Further, our religious and political reformers in their zeal for liberalism may overstep the proper limits of reform in the absence of a check on their youthful fervor. We are today passing through a period similar to that of the Protestant revolution in Europe, and the lesson which the rise and outcome of [Martin] Luther's [16th-century Protestant Reformation] movement teaches should not be lost on us. A careful reading of history shows that the Reformation was essentially a political movement, and the net result of it in Europe was a gradual displacement of the universal ethics of Christianity by systems of national ethics. The result of this tendency we have seen with our own eyes in the Great European War [World War I] which, far from bringing any workable synthesis of the two opposing systems of ethics, has made the European situation still more intolerable. It is the duty of the leaders of the world of Islam today to understand the real meaning of what has happened in Europe, and then to move forward with self-control and a clear insight into the ultimate aims of Islam as a social polity.

I have given you some idea of the history and working of ijtihad in modern Islam. I now proceed to see whether the history and structure of the Law of Islam indicate the possibility of any fresh interpretation of its principles. In other words, the question that I want to raise is—Is the Law of Islam capable of evolution? [Max] Horten [born 1874], Professor of Semitic Philology at the University of Bonn, raises the same question in connection with the Philosophy and Theology of Islam. Reviewing the work of Muslim thinkers in the sphere of purely religious thought he points out that the history of Islam may aptly be described as a gradual interaction, harmony, and mutual deepening of two distinct forces, i.e., the element of Aryan culture and knowledge on the one hand, and a Semitic religion on the other. The Muslim has always adjusted his religious outlook to the elements of culture which he assimilated from the peoples that surrounded him. From 800 to 1100, says Horten, not less than one hundred systems of theology appeared in Islam, a fact which bears ample testimony to the elasticity of Islamic thought as well as to the ceaseless activity of our early thinkers. Thus, in view of the revelations of a deeper study of Muslim literature and thought, this living European Orientalist has been driven to the following conclusion: "The spirit of Islam is so broad that it is practically boundless. With the exception of atheistic ideas alone it has assimilated all the attainable ideas of surrounding peoples, and given them its own peculiar direction of development."

The assimilative spirit of Islam is even more manifest in the sphere of law. Says Professor [C. Snouck] Hurgronje [1857–1936], the Dutch critic of Islam:

When we read the history of the development of Islamic Law we find that, on the one hand, the doctors of every age, on the slightest stimulus, condemn one another to the point of mutual accusations of heresy; and, on the other hand, the very same people, with greater and greater unity of purpose, try to reconcile the similar quarrels of their predecessors.

These views of modern European critics of Islam make it perfectly clear that, with the return of new life, the inner catholicity of the spirit of Islam is bound to work itself out in spite of the rigorous conservatism of our doctors. And I have no doubt that a deeper study of the enormous legal literature of Islam is sure to rid the modern critic of the superficial opinion that the Law of Islam is stationary and incapable of development. Unfortunately, the conservative Muslim public of this country is not yet quite ready for a critical discussion offiqh [Islamic jurisprudence], which, if undertaken, is likely to displease most people, and raise sectarian controversies; yet I venture to offer a few remarks on the point before us.

1. In the first place, we should bear in mind that from the earliest times, practically up to the rise of the ‘Abbasids, there was no written law of Islam apart from the Qur’an.

2. Secondly, it is worthy of note that from about the middle of the first century up to the beginning of the fourth not less than nineteen schools of law and legal opinion appeared in Islam. This fact alone is sufficient to show how incessantly our early doctors of law worked in order to meet the necessities of a growing civilization. With the expansion of conquest and the consequent widening of the outlook of Islam these early legists had to take a wider view of things, and to study local conditions of life and habits of new peoples that came within the fold of Islam. A careful study of the various schools of legal opinion, in the light of contemporary social and political history, reveals that they gradually passed from the deductive to the inductive attitude in their efforts at interpretation.

3. Thirdly, when we study the four accepted sources of Islamic Law and the controversies which they invoked, the supposed rigidity of our recognized schools evaporates, and the possibility of a further evolution becomes perfectly clear. Let us briefly discuss these sources.

(a) The Qur’an. The primary source of the Law of Islam is the Qur’an. The Qur’an, however, is not a legal code. Its main purpose, as I have said before, is to awaken in man the higher consciousness of his relation with God and the universe. No doubt the Qur’an does lay down a few general principles and rules of a legal nature, especially relating to the family—the ultimate basis of social life. But why are these rules made part of a revelation the ultimate aim of which is man’s higher life? The answer to this question is furnished by the history of Christianity which appeared as a powerful reaction against the spirit of legality manifested in Judaism. By setting up an ideal of other-worldliness it no doubt did succeed in spiritualizing life, but its individualism could see no spiritual value in the complexity of human social relations. “Primitive Christianity,” says [Friedrich] Naumann [1860–1919] in his Briefe uber Religion, “attached no value to the preservation of the state, law, organization, production. It simply does not reflect on the conditions of human society.” And Naumann concludes: “Hence we either dare to aim at being without a state, and thus throwing ourselves deliberately into the arms of anarchy, or we decide to possess, alongside of our religious creed, a political creed as well.” Thus the Qur’an considers it necessary to unite religion and State, ethics and politics in a single revelation much in the same way as Plato [Greece, 427–347 B.C.], does in his Republic.

The important point to note in this connection, however, is the dynamic outlook of the Qur’an. I have fully discussed its origin and history. It is obvious that with such an outlook the Holy Book of Islam cannot be inimical to the idea of evolution. Only we should not forget that life is not change, pure and simple. It has within it elements of conservation also. While enjoying his creative activity, and always focusing his energies on the discovery of new vistas of life, man has a feeling of uneasiness in the presence of his own unfoldment. In his forward movement he cannot help looking back to his past, and faces his own inward expansion with a certain amount of fear. The spirit of man in its forward movement is restrained by forces which seem to be working in the opposite direction. This is only another way of saying that life moves with the weight of its own past on its back, and that in any view of social change the value and function of the forces of conservatism cannot be lost sight of. It is with this organic insight into the essential teaching of the Qur'an that modern Rationalism ought to approach our existing institutions. No people can afford to reject their past entirely; for it is their past that has made their personal identity. And in a society like Islam the problem of a revision of old institutions becomes still more delicate, and the responsibility of the reformer assumes a far more serious aspect. Islam is non-territorial in its character, and its aim is to furnish a model for the final combination of humanity by drawing its adherents from a variety of mutually repellent races, and then transforming this atomic aggregate into a people possessing a self-consciousness of their own. This was not an easy task to accomplish. Yet Islam, by means of its well-conceived institutions, has succeeded to a very great extent in creating something like a collective will and conscience in this heterogeneous mass. In the evolution of such a society even the immutability of socially harmless rules relating to eating and drinking, purity or impurity, has a life-value of its own, inasmuch as it tends to give such society a specific inwardness, and further secures that external and internal uniformity which counteracts the forces of heterogeneity always latent in a society of a composite character. The critic of these institutions must therefore try to secure, before he undertakes to handle them, a clear insight into the ultimate significance of the social experiment embodied in Islam. He must look at their structure, not from the standpoint of social advantage or disadvantage to this or that country, but from the point of view of the larger purpose which is being gradually worked out in the life of mankind as a whole.

Turning now to the groundwork of legal principles in the Qur'an, it is perfectly clear that far from leaving no scope for human thought and legislative activity the intensive breadth of these principles virtually acts as an awakener of human thought. Our early doctors of law taking their clue mainly from this groundwork evolved a number of legal systems; and the student of Islamic history knows very well that nearly half the triumphs of Islam as a social and political power were due to the legal acuteness of these doctors. "Next to the Romans," says [Alfred] Von Kremer [Orientalist, 1828–1889], "there is no other nation besides the Arabs which could call its own a system of law so carefully worked out." But with all their comprehensiveness, these systems are after all individual interpretations, and as such cannot claim any finality. I know the 'ulama' of Islam claim finality for the popular schools of Islamic Law, though they never found it possible to deny the theoretical possibility of a complete ijtihad. I have tried to explain the causes which, in my opinion, determined this attitude of the ‘ulama’; but since things have changed and the world of Islam is today confronted and affected by new forces set free by the extraordinary development of human thought in all its directions, I see no reason why this attitude should be maintained any longer. Did the founders of our schools ever claim finality for their reasonings and interpretations? Never. The claim of the present generation of Muslim liberals to re-interpret the foundational legal principles, in the light of their own experience and the altered conditions of modern life is, in my opinion, perfectly justified. The teaching of the Qur’an that life is a process of progressive creation necessitates that each generation, guided but unhampered by the work of its predecessors, should be permitted to solve its own problems.

You will, I think, remind me here of the Turkish poet Zia, whom I quoted a moment ago, and ask whether the equality of man and woman demanded by him, equality, that is to say, in point of divorce, separation, and inheritance, is possible according to Islamic Law. I do not know whether the awakening of women in Turkey has created demands which cannot be met without a fresh interpretation of foundational principles. In the Punjab [region in northern India], as everybody knows, there have been cases in which Muslim women wishing to get rid of undesirable husbands have been driven to apostasy. Nothing could be more distant from the aims of a missionary religion. The Law of Islam, says the great Spanish jurist Imam [Abu Ishaq al-] Shatibi [died 1388] in his Al-Muwafiqat [i usul al-shari’a] [The Correspondences on the Methodology of Islamic Law], aims at protecting five things—din [religion], nafs [soul], ‘aql [intellect], mal [property], and nasl [progeny]. Applying this test I venture to ask: “Does the working of the rule relating to apostasy, as laid down in the hidaya [guidance], tend to protect the interests of the Faith in this country?” In view of the intense conservatism of the Muslims of India, Indian judges cannot but stick to what are called standard worlds. The result is that while the peoples are moving the law remains stationary.

With regard to the Turkish poet’s demand, I am afraid he does not seem to know much about the family law of Islam. Nor does he seem to understand the economic significance of the Qur’anic rule of inheritance. Marriage, according to Islamic Law, is a civil contract. The wife at the time of marriage is at liberty to get the husband’s power of divorce delegated to her on stated conditions, and thus secure equality of divorce with her husband. The reform suggested by the poet relating to the rule of inheritance is based on a misunderstanding. From the inequality of their legal shares it must not be supposed that the rule assumes the superiority of males over females. Such an assumption would be contrary to the spirit of Islam. The Qur’an says: “And for women are rights over men similar to those for men over women” [Sura 2, Verse 228].

The share of the daughter is determined not by any inferiority inherent in her, but in view of her economic opportunities, and the place she occupies in the social structure of which she is part and parcel. Further, according to the poet’s own theory of society, the rule of inheritance must be regarded not as an isolated factor in the distribution of wealth, but as one factor among others working together for the same end. While the daughter, according to Islamic Law, is held to be full owner of the property given to her both by the father and the husband at the time of her marriage; while, further, she absolutely owns her dower-money which may be prompt or deferred according to her own choice, and in lieu of which she can hold possession of the whole of her husband’s property till payment, the responsibility of maintaining her throughout her life is wholly thrown on the husband. If you judge the working of the rule of inheritance from this point of view, you will find that there is no material difference between the economic position of sons and daughters, and it is really by this apparent inequality of their legal shares that the law secures the equality demanded by the Turkish poet. The truth is that the principles underlying the Qur’anic law of inheritance—this supremely original branch of Islamic Law as Von Kremer describes it—have not yet received from Muslim lawyers the attention they deserve. Modern society with its bitter class- struggles ought to set us thinking; and if we study our laws in reference to the impending revolution in modern economic life, we are likely to discover, in the foundational principles, hitherto unrevealed aspects which we can work out with a renewed faith in the wisdom of these principles.

(b) The hadith [traditions of the Prophet]. The second great source of Islamic Law is the traditions of the Holy Prophet. These have been the subject of great discussion both in ancient and modern times. Among their modern critics Professor [Ignacz] Goldziher [Orientalist, 1850–1921] has subjected them to a searching examination in the light of modern canons of historical criticism, and arrives at the conclusion that they are, on the whole, untrustworthy. N.P. Aghnides [born 1883], after examining the Muslim methods of determining the genuineness of a tradition, and pointing out the theoretical possibilities of error, arrives at the following conclusion:

<quote>

It must be said in conclusion that the preceding considerations represented only theoretical possibilities and that the question how far these possibilities have become actualities is largely a matter of how far the actual circumstances offered inducements for making use of the possibilities. Doubtless the latter, relatively speaking, were few, and affected only a small proportion of the entire sunna [practice of the Prophet, a chief source of Islamic law]. It may therefore be said that for the most part the collections of sunna considered by the Muslims as canonical are genuine records of the rise and early growth of Islam. (Mohammedan Theories of Finance)

</quote>

For our present purposes, however, we must distinguish traditions of a purely legal import from those which are of a non-legal character. With regard to the former, there arises a very important question as to how far they embody the pre-Islamic usages of Arabia which were in some cases left intact, and in others modified by the Prophet. It is difficult to make this discovery, for our early writers do not always refer to pre-Islamic usages. Nor is it possible to discover that the usages, left intact by express or tacit approval of the Prophet, were intended to be universal in their application. Shah Wali-Ullah [India, 1703–1762] has a very illuminating discussion on the point. I reproduce here the substance of his view. The prophetic method of teaching, according to Shah Wali-Ullah, is that, generally speaking, the law revealed by a prophet takes especial notice of the habits, ways, and peculiarities of the people to whom he is specifically sent. The prophet who aims at all-embracing principles, however, can neither reveal different principles for different peoples, nor leaves them to work out their own rules of conduct. His method is to train one particular people, and to use them as a nucleus for the building up of a universal shari’a. In doing so he accentuates the principles underlying the social life of all mankind, and applies them to concrete cases in the light of the specific habits of the people immediately before him. The shari’a values (ahkam) resulting from this application (e.g., rules relating to penalties for crimes) are in a sense specific to that people; and since their observance is not an end in itself they cannot be strictly enforced in the case of future generations. It was perhaps in view of this that Abu Hanifa [circa 699–767], who had a keen insight into the universal character of Islam, made practically no use of these traditions. The fact that he introduced the principle of istihsan, i.e., juristic preference, which necessitates a careful study of actual conditions in legal thinking, throws further light on the motives which determined his attitude towards this source of Islamic Law. It is said that Abu Hanifa made no use of traditions because there were no regular collections in his day. In the first place, it is not true to say that there were no collections in his day, as the collections of Abdul Malik [Ibn Jurayj, 699–767] and [Muhammad ibn Muslim] Zuhri [670-circa 737] were made not less than thirty years before the death of Abu Hanifa. But even if we suppose that these collections never reached him, or that they did not contain traditions of a legal import, Abu Hanifa, like Malik and Ahmad ibn Hanbal [780–855] after him, could have easily made his own collection if he had deemed such a thing necessary. On the whole, then, the attitude of Abu Hanifa towards the traditions of a purely legal import is to my mind perfectly sound; and if modern Liberalism considers it safer not to make any indiscriminate use of them as a source of law, it will be only following one of the greatest exponents of Islamic Law in Sunni Islam. It is, however, impossible to deny the fact that the traditionists, by insisting on the value of the concrete case as against the tendency to abstract thinking in law, have done the greatest service to the Law of Islam. And a further intelligent study of the literature of traditions, if used as indicative of the spirit in which the Prophet himself interpreted his Revelation, may still be of great help in understanding the life-value of the legal principles enunciated in the Qur’an. A complete grasp of their life-value alone can equip us in our endeavor to re-interpret the foundational principles.

(c) The ijma’ [consensus]. The third source of Islamic Law is ijma’ which is, in my opinion, perhaps the most important legal notion in Islam. It is, however, strange that this important notion, while invoking great academic discussions in early Islam, remained practically a mere idea, and rarely assumed the form of a permanent institution in any Islamic country. Possibly its transformation into a permanent legislative institution was contrary to the political interests of the kind of absolute monarchy that grew up in Islam immediately after the fourth caliph. It was, I think, favorable to the interest of the Umayyad and the ‘Abbasid caliphs [reigned 661–750 and 750–1258, respectively] to leave the power of ijtihadto individual mujtahids [religious scholars] rather than encourage the formation of a permanent assembly which might become too powerful for them. It is, however, extremely satisfactory to note that the pressure of new world forces and the political experience of European nations are impressing on the mind of modern Islam the value and possibilities of the idea of ijma’. The growth of republican spirit and the gradual formation of legislative assemblies in Muslim lands constitute a great step in advance. The transfer of the power of ijtihad from individual representatives of schools to a Muslim legislative assembly which, in view of the growth of opposing sects, is the only possible form ijma’ can take in modern times, will secure contributions to legal discussion from laymen who happen to possess a keen insight into affairs. In this way alone we can stir into activity the dormant spirit of life in our legal system, and give it an evolutionary outlook. In India, however, difficulties are likely to arise; for it is doubtful whether a non-Muslim legislative assembly can exercise the power of ijtihad.

But there are one or two questions which must be raised and answered in regard to the ijma’. Can the ijma’ repeal the Qur’an? It is unnecessary to raise this question before a Muslim audience; but I consider it necessary to do so in view of a very misleading statement by a European critic in a book called Mohammedan Theories ofFinance—published by Columbia University. The author of this book says, without citing any authority, that according to some Hanafi and Mu’tazila writers the ijma’ can repeal the Qur’an. There is not the slightest justification for such a statement in the legal literature of Islam. Not even a tradition of the Prophet can have any such effect. It seems to me that the author is misled by the word naskh in the writings of our early doctors to whom, as Imam Shatibi points out in Al-Muwafiqat, volume 3, page 65, this word, when used in discussions relating to the ijma’ of the companions [of the Prophet], meant only the power to extend or limit the application of a Qur’anic rule of law, and not the power to repeal or supersede it by another rule of law. And even in the exercise of this power the legal theory, as [‘Ali ibn Abi ‘Ali] Amidi—a Shafi’i doctor of law who died about the middle of the seventh century [A.H., or 1233 A.D.], and whose work is recently published in Egypt—tells us, is that the companions must have been in possession of a shari’a value (hukm) entitling them to such a limitation or extension.

But supposing the companions have unanimously decided a certain point, the further question is whether later generations are bound by their decision. [Muhammad ibn ‘Ali] Shaukani [circa 1760–1839] has fully discussed this point, and cited the views held by writers belonging to different schools. I think it is necessary in this connection to discriminate between a decision relating to a question of fact and the one relating to a question of law. In the former case, as for instance, when the question arose whether the two small suras [chapters] known as “Mu ‘awwazatan “ formed part of the Qur’an or not, and the companions unanimously decided that they did, we are bound by their decision, obviously because the companions alone were in a position to know the fact. In the latter case the question is one of interpretation only, and I venture to think, on the authority of [Abu’l- Hasan] Karkhi [died 952], that later generations are not bound by the decision of the companions. Says Karkhi: “The sunna of the companions is binding in matters which cannot be cleared up by qiyas [analogical reasoning], but it is not so in matters which can be established by qiyas.”

One more question may be asked as to the legislative activity of a modern Muslim assembly which must consist, at least for the present, mostly of men possessing no knowledge of the subtleties of Islamic Law. Such an assembly may make grave mistakes in their interpretation of law. How can we exclude or at least reduce the possibilities of erroneous interpretation? The Persian constitution of 1906 provided a separate ecclesiastical committee of ‘ulama’—“conversant with the affairs of the world”—having power to supervise the legislative activity of the majlis [parliament]. This, in my opinion, dangerous arrangement is probably necessary in view of the Persian [Shi’i] constitutional theory.[463] According to that theory, I believe, the king is a mere custodian of the realm which really belongs to the Absent Imam. The ‘ulama’, as representatives of the Imam, consider themselves entitled to supervise the whole life of the community; though I fail to understand how, in the absence of an apostolic succession, they establish their claim to represent the Imam. But whatever may be the Persian constitutional theory, the arrangement is not free from danger, and may be tried, if at all, only as a temporary measure in Sunni countries. The ‘ularrni’ should form a vital part of a Muslim legislative assembly helping and guiding free discussion on questions relating to law. The only effective remedy for the possibilities of erroneous interpretations is to reform the present system of legal education in Islamic countries, to extend its sphere, and to combine it with an intelligent study of modern jurisprudence.

The qiyas. The fourth basis offiqh is qiyas, i.e., the use of analogical reasoning in legislation. In view of different social and agricultural conditions prevailing in the countries conquered by Islam, the school of Abu Hanifa seem to have found, on the whole, little or no guidance from the precedents recorded in the literature of traditions. The only alternative open to them was to resort to speculative reason in their interpretations. The application of Aristotelian logic, however, though suggested by the discovery of new conditions in Iraq, was likely to prove exceedingly harmful in the preliminary stages of legal development. The intricate behavior of life cannot be subjected to hard and fast rules logically deducible from certain general notions. Yet looked at through the spectacles of Aristotle’s logic it appears to be a mechanism pure and simple with no internal principle of movement. Thus the school of Abu Hanifa tended to ignore the creative freedom and arbitrariness of life, and hoped to build a logically perfect legal system on the lines of pure reason. The legists of Hijaz [Arabia], however, true to the practical genius of their race, raised strong protests against the scholastic subtleties of the legists of Iraq, and their tendency to imagine unreal cases which they rightly thought would turn the Law of Islam into a kind of lifeless mechanism. These bitter controversies among the early doctors of Islam led to a critical definition of the limitations, conditions, and correctives of qiyas which, though originally appeared as a mere disguise for the mujtahids personal opinion, eventually became a source of life and movement in the Law of Islam. The spirit of the acute criticism of Malik and [Abu ‘Abdallah Muhammad] Shafi’i [767–820] on Abu Hanifa’s principle of qiyas, as a source of law, constitutes really an effective Semitic restraint on the Aryan tendency to seize the abstract in preference to the concrete, to enjoy the idea rather than the event. This was really a controversy between the advocates of deductive and inductive methods in legal research. The legists of Iraq originally emphasized the eternal aspect of the “notion,” while those of Hijaz laid stress on its temporal aspect. The latter, however, did not see the full significance of their own position, and their instinctive partiality to the legal tradition of Hijaz narrowed their vision to the “precedents” that had actually happened in the days of the Prophet and his companions. No doubt they recognized the value of the concrete, but at the same time they eternalized it, rarely resorting to qiyas based on the study of the concrete as such. Their criticism of Abu Hanifa and his school, however, emancipated the concrete as it were, and brought out the necessity of observing the actual movement and variety of life in the interpretation ofjuristic principles. Thus the school of Abu Hanifa which fully assimilated the results of this controversy is absolutely free in its essential principle and possesses much greater power of creative adaptation than any other school of Islamic Law. But contrary to the spirit of his own school the modern Hanafi legist has eternalized the interpretations of the founder or his immediate followers much in the same way as the early critics of Abu Hanifa eternalized the decisions given on concrete cases. Properly understood and applied, the essential principle of this school, i.e., qiyas, as Shafi’i rightly says, is only another name for ijtihad which, within the limits of the revealed texts, is absolutely free; and its importance as a principle can be seen from the fact that, according to most of the doctors, as Qazi Shaukani tells us, it was permitted even in the lifetime of the Holy Prophet. The closing of the door of ijtihad is pure fiction suggested partly by the crystallization of legal thought in Islam, and partly by that intellectual laziness which, especially in the period of spiritual decay, turns great thinkers into idols. If some of the later doctors have upheld this fiction, modern Islam is not bound by this voluntary surrender of intellectual independence. Sarkashi writing in the 10th century of the Hijra[464] rightly observes:

<quote>

If the upholders of this fiction mean that the previous writers had more facilities, while the later writers had more difficulties in their way, it is nonsense; for it does not require much understanding to see that ijtihad for later doctors is easier than for the earlier doctors. Indeed the commentaries on the Qur’an and sunna have been compiled and multiplied to such an extent that the mujtahid of today has more material for interpretation than he needs.

</quote>

This brief discussion, I hope, will make it clear to you that neither in the foundational principles nor in the structure of our systems, as we find them today, is there anything to justify the present attitude. Equipped with penetrative thought and fresh experience the world of Islam should courageously proceed to the work of reconstruction before them. This work of reconstruction, however, has a far more serious aspect than mere adjustment to modern conditions of life. The Great European War bringing in its wake the awakening of Turkey—the element of stability in the world of Islam, as a French writer has recently described her—and the new economic experiment tried in the neighborhood of Muslim Asia, must open our eyes to the inner meaning and destiny of Islam. Humanity needs three things today —a spiritual interpretation of the universe, spiritual emancipation of the individual, and basic principles of a universal import directing the evolution of human society on a spiritual basis. Modern Europe has, no doubt, built idealistic systems on these lines, but experience shows that truth revealed through pure reason is incapable of bringing that fire of living conviction which personal revelation alone can bring. This is the reason why pure thought has so little influenced men, while religion has always elevated individuals, and transformed whole societies. The idealism of Europe never became a living factor in her life, and the result is a perverted ego seeking itself through mutually intolerant democracies whose sole function is to exploit the poor in the interest of the rich. Believe me, Europe today is the greatest hindrance in the way of man’s ethical advancement. The Muslim, on the other hand, is in possession of these ultimate ideas on the basis of a revelation, which, speaking from the inmost depths of life, internalizes its own apparent externality. With him the spiritual basis of life is a matter of conviction for which even the least enlightened man among us can easily lay down his life; and in view of the basic idea of Islam that there can be no further revelation binding on man, we ought to be spiritually one of the most emancipated peoples on earth. Early Muslims emerging out of the spiritual slavery of pre-Islamic Asia were not in a position to realize the true significance of this basic idea. Let the Muslim of today appreciate his position, reconstruct his social life in the light of ultimate principles, and evolve, out of the hitherto partially revealed purpose of Islam, that spiritual democracy which is the ultimate aim of Islam.

 28—The Second Message of Islam

Mahmoud Mohamed Taha

Mahmoud Mohamed Taha (Sudan, circa 1910–1985) received his university degree in Khartoum, Sudan, and worked for many years as a civil engineer, specializing in irrigation. At the same time, he was active in the Sudanese independence movement. In 1945, he helped to found the Republican Party and then spent several years in jail as a result of his activism. After independence, his followers founded the Republican Brothers, which Taha led until his execution in 1985. The founding document of this organization, first drafted in the early 1950s and published in 1967—excerpted here—presents Taha's unorthodox view that the earlier Qur'anic revelations (revealed in Mecca before the Prophet gained political power) should be granted greater importance than the later revelations, which refer more narrowly to the conditions of the Prophet's rule in Medina. This view brought Taha into conflict with the Sudanese government's implementation of more orthodox Islamic laws in the 1980s. His protest against these policies led to his arrest and execution.[465]

 Introduction to the Third Edition

This is the introduction to the third edition of The Second Message of Islam. The first edition was published in January 1967 A.D., in the revered month of Ramadan 1386 A.H. The second edition was published in April 1968 A.D., in the month of Muharram 1388 A.H. At the time of the second edition we were, however, preoccupied with other business and could not give that edition an introduction of its own.

This book, The Second Message of Islam, is new in every respect.... Besides being new, it is also totally “strange,” that is, unexpected, since it proclaims the return of a renewed Islam. Such “strangeness,” however, is to be expected, especially by informed Muslims. The Prophet is reported to have said: “Islam started as a stranger, and it shall return as a stranger in the same way it started. Blessed are the strangers! They asked: Who are the strangers, O Messenger of God? He replied: Those who revive my sunna [practice of the Prophet] after it had been abandoned.”

Thus, the return of a revived Islam is by nature strange, that is to say, mysterious and unexpected. Those who criticize this book for its “strangeness,” therefore, reveal both a lack of understanding and of patience. We need not concern ourselves here with those who oppose this book’s message out of misunderstanding and deliberate distortion out of bad faith. But we must emphasize that the apparent “strangeness” of this message is inherent in the nature of Islamic revival. Understanding this book requires patience, diligence, and close scrutiny. If the reader is able to persist, his mind shall be open to a new understanding of the Qur’an and Islam, and he shall be rewarded for his perseverance, God willing.

 Sunna and Shari’a

In the above quoted hadith [tradition of the Prophet], the Prophet referred to the strangers and said they were those who revive his sunna after it had been abandoned. Those who call for such a revival become strangers amongst their own people, because such a call involves a divergence from what people are accustomed to. They are strangers by virtue of their adherence to the truth amongst people for whom the truth is a stranger. If people have experienced falsehood for so long, then because of their long unfamiliarity with the truth, they come to accept falsehood as the truth.

It is mistakenly believed by some that the sunna consists of all the acts and words of the Prophet, as well as his approval of the action of others. This is not true, because his teachings to others and approval of their conduct relate to shari’a [Islamic law]. Only the Prophet’s personal deeds, and his utterances that reflect the state of his heart in its knowledge of God, constitute sunna. The Prophet’s statements which were designed to teach the people their religion are shari’a. The difference between shari’a and sunna is the difference between the Message and the Prophethood. In other words, it reflects the difference between the standard of the generality of Muslims of all levels, and the standard of the Prophet, which is a tremendous difference indeed.

Sunna relates to the personal practice of the Prophet, while in shari’a the Prophet descends from the level of his own personal practice to the level of his people in order to teach them according to their capabilities, thereby requiring them to act within their capacities. Sunna is his prophethood, while shari’a is his message. With respect to his message, the Prophet said: “We the prophets have been instructed to address people in accordance with the level of their understanding.”

 Al-Islam and Al-‘Iman

There is a common failure to appreciate the fine distinction between islam [submission to God] and ‘iman [faith]. ‘Iman is widely and mistakenly believed to be superior to islam. This mistaken belief is due to an inability to appreciate the circumstances of the time. The time when such belief sufficed is over, as we have now reached a point when the understanding of religion has developed and evolved from the level of ‘iman to the level of islam. The distinction can be explained as follows:

Islam is an intellectual process by which the diligent worshiper proceeds on a ladder of seven steps, the first being islam, secondly ‘mam. thirdly ihsan [beneficence], fourthly ‘llm al-yaqin, fifthly ‘ilm ‘ayn al-yaqin, sixthly ‘ilm haqq al-yaqin, and seventhly islam once more.[466] But islam at the higher stage differs in degree from islam at the initial stage. At the initial stage, islam is merely external or apparent submission, while in the final state it is both external and internal (genuine) submission. Islam at the initial stage concerns speech and action, while in the final stage it is intelligent surrender and submission and acceptance of God both in private and in public. At the initial stage islam is inferior to ‘iman, while at the final stage it is superior to ‘main. Many theologians whom we know today are unable to make this distinction.

Religious scholars have been confused by the hadith involving Gabriel, reported by ‘Umar ibn al-Khattab [Companion of the Prophet, 592–644], who said:

As we were seated with the Messenger of God, peace be upon him, there came a man wearing [clean] white clothes, with very dark hair. None of us knew him, yet he did not show the signs of travel. He sat near the Messenger of God, peace be upon him, and placed his knees next to his [the Prophet’s] knees, and placed his hands on his [the Prophet’s] thighs and said: O, Muhammad, tell me about islam. … He [the Prophet] said: islam is to declare that there is no god but God, and that Muhammad is the Messenger of God; to say the prayers; pay zakat taxes; fast the month of Ramadan, and do pilgrimage to the House [of God], if you can afford it. He said: You are right. We wondered how he could ask him and then confirm he was right. Then he [the man] said: Tell me about ‘iman. He [the Prophet] replied: ‘iman is to believe in God, His angels, His Books, Messengers, fate whether good or bad, and the hereafter. He [the man] said: you are right. Then he asked: tell me about ihsan. He [the Prophet] replied: ihsan is to worship God as if you see Him, and although you do not see Him, be certain that He can see you. He [the man] said: you are right. Then he said: Tell me when is the final hour? He [the Prophet] replied: the one being asked does not know of it more than the one who asks. He [the man] said: Tell me of its signs? He [the Prophet] replied: When the woman gives birth to her mistress, and when you see the bare-footed and naked shepherds practice extravagance. He said: You are right. Then he left. We stayed a while, then the Messenger, peace be upon him, said: O ‘Umar, do you know the one who was asking the questions? I replied, God and His Messenger know better. He said: This is Gabriel, who came to teach you your religion.

Many religious scholars interpreted this to mean that Islam proceeds in three stages: islam, ‘iman, and ihsan. Since it is said in the Qur’an, concerning the Bedouins, “The Bedouins said amanna (we believe); tell them you have not believed, but say aslamna (we submit) and ‘iman (true belief) did not enter your hearts yet” (Sura 49, Verse 14), it seems obvious to these scholars that ‘iman is higher in degree than islam. Those scholars failed to appreciate that the issue needs close consideration.

* The Truth of the Matter

The truth of the matter is that islam, as conveyed in the Qur’an, comes in two stages: the stage of dogma (‘aqicfa) and the stage of the truth (haqiqa) or knowledge. Each of these two stages has three levels.

The levels of dogma are islam, ‘mam, and ihsan, while the levels of knowledge are ‘ilm al-yaqin, ‘ilm ‘ayn al-yaqin, and ‘ilm haqq al-yaqin. Finally, there is a seventh stage in the ladder of evolution, which is islam, which completes the cycle. The end of religious evolution resembles the beginning, yet they are not identical. The beginning is islam and the end is islam, but there is a vast difference between islam at the beginning of religious evolution and islam at the end. The stage of ‘aquh is the stage of the nation ofMu’minin [Believers], which is the nation of the First Message of Islam.

The stage of knowledge is the stage of the nation ofMuslimin [Muslims, literally Those Who Submit], which is the nation of the Second Message of Islam. This nation has not come yet, although its vanguard have appeared individually throughout human history, in the form of prophets, with the final prophet being the Prophet Muhammad ibn Abdullahi, may he receive the highest blessing and utmost peace. It was Muhammad who prophesied the coming of the nation ofMuslimin and brought its message, as contained in general terms in the Qur'an, and detailed it in the sunna. When the nation of Muslimin comes, it shall begin at the same point as the nation ofMu'minin, namely at a stage of dogma or 'aqida But it shall not stop at the third step of the ladder, where Gabriel stopped in his questions. It shall continue to evolve to the end of the ladder, thereby combining both dogma as well as knowledge. In other words, the coming nation is a nation of both Muslimin as well as Mu'minin at one and the same time, while the first nation was one ofMu'minin (believers) and notMuslimin (submitters) in the final sense of islam [as total and intelligent surrender to God].

It must be noted that Gabriel stopped in his questions at the end of the level of dogma, 'aqida, because he had come to explain religion to the nation ofMu'minin, and not to the nation ofMuslimin, which had not yet come.

Muhammad is the Messenger of the First Message, and he is also the Messenger of the Second Message. While he explained the First Message in detail, he only outlined the Second Message. Its elaboration now requires a fresh understanding of the Qur'an. That is the purpose of this book.

Those who approach this book with an open mind will be guided along the right path. We ask God for rectification and success in our endeavor; He is the best Lord....

 The First Message of Islam

* Nation of Mu’Minin

We have said that the Qur’an was divided between ‘iman and islam, as well as being revealed in two parts as Meccan and Medinese. The Meccan Qur’an was revealed first. In other words, people were invited to adopt Islam [in the ultimate sense] first, and when they failed to do so, and it was practically demonstrated that they were below its standard, they were addressed in accordance with their abilities. This offer of the higher standard is the conclusive argument against people referred to in the verse: “And We will surely try you until We make manifest those among you who strive [for the cause of God] and those who are steadfast. And We will make known the truth about you.” (Sura 47, Verse 31) This experiment and consequent practical experience is for the benefit of mankind because God’s knowledge does not occur afresh (hadith).[467] The phrase “those who strive” means major jihad, namely, striving to control the self.[468] “And those who are steadfast” refers to endurance of the state of distance from God. “And We will make known the truth about you” means to extract thoughts that are repressed in your subconscious—your sir al-sir.

The verses which demonstrate descent from ultimate Islam to the level of ‘main are numerous—for example, the verse, “O believers (mu’minin), fear God as He ought to be feared, and become true submitters (muslimin) before you die.” (Sura 3, Verse 102) When the believers (mu’minin) said “which of us can fear God as He ought to be feared?” the Qur’an descended in another verse to the level of “Fear God as much as you can, listen and obey and pay alms, as that is good for yourselves, and those who are rid of their own selfishness are the truly successful ones.” (Sura 64, Verse 16)

When the verse, “Those who believe without obscuring their belief with unfairness have security, and they are truly guided” (Sura 6, Verse 82) was revealed, people found it too difficult to comply with, and they said: “O Messenger of God, which one of us is not unfair to himself?” He replied: “It is not what you mean. Did you not hear what God’s true slave (Luqman) said: O son, do not disbelieve in God, such disbelief is great unfairness. The verse means disbelief.” The believers were relieved because they knew that they had not disbelieved since the time they came to believe. In fact the Prophet explained the verse to them at the level of mu’minin, knowing that its explanation at the level of the muslimin was above their ability, because “unfairness” then means subtle polytheism in the sense mentioned in the verse of the sir al-sir. “All shall submit to the living and all-sustaining God. And he indeed has failed who holds iniquity.” (Sura 20, Verse 111)

It is reported about the verse, “Those who believe without obscuring their belief with unfairness have security, and they are truly guided,” that the Prophet said: “I was told that I am one of them.” The Prophet is not merely one of the believers (mu’minin), as he is the first of the true submitters to God (muslimin): “Say: ‘My prayer and my worship and my life and my death are [all] for God the Lord of all creation. He has no partner. And so am I commanded, and I am the first of those who submit (muslimin).’” (Sura 6, Verse 163)

We have said that the nation of the First Message are muslimin. While the Qur’an described muslimin at the time of Moses as the Jews, and at the time of Jesus as Christians, it describes them at the time of the First Muhammadan Message as mu’minin or “those who believed.” Listen to the Qur’an: “Surely, those who believe and the Jews and the Christians and the Sabians who so believe in God and the Last Day, and do good deeds shall have their reward with their Lord, and no fear [shall come] upon them, nor shall they grieve.” (Sura 2, Verse 62) Again, it says, “Surely, those who have believed, and the Jews, and the Sabians, and the Christians who so believe in God and the Last Day and do good deeds—on them [shall come] no fear, nor shall they grieve.” (Sura 5, Verse 69) Another instructive verse reads:

<quote>

O believers (mu’minin), believe in God, His Messenger, and the Book that He revealed to His Messenger, and the Book revealed previously.

He who disbelieves in God, His angels, books, messengers, and the Final Day, has grossly strayed from the path. (Sura 4, Verse 136)

</quote>

So He calls them mu’minin (believers) and yet invites them to further belief, more ‘iman.

The verses: “O believers (mu’minin), fear God as He ought to be feared, and become true submitters (muslimin) before you die,” and “Fear God as much as you can, and listen and obey and pay alms, as that is good for yourselves, and those who are rid of their own selfishness are the truly successful ones” clearly have two different meanings—one setting an original precept and the other a subsidiary one. It is also clear that the real objective is the achievement of the original precept. When it was shown that it was impracticable to do so, it was postponed and the intermediate objective of implementing the subsidiary precept was sought. When the conditions necessary for achieving the original objective, that is to say, when both individual as well as collective human capacities are sufficiently mature, the original precept shall be restored. This is the reason why the original precepts of religion were postponed, and the subsidiary precepts were implemented [as transitional measures] as shall be explained below.

 Jihad Is Not an Original Precept in Islam

Islam’s original view is that a person is free until it is shown, in practice, that he or she is unable to properly discharge the duty of such freedom. Freedom is a natural right corresponding to a duty, namely, its proper exercise. Once a free person is unable to fulfill the duty of his or her freedom, such freedom shall be withdrawn under a law which is consistent with the constitution, that is, a law which reconciles the need of the individual for absolute individual freedom, and the need of the community for total social justice. As already stated, this is the law of mu’awada (reciprocity).

This was Islam’s original and fundamental principle. The propagation of Islam began with the verses of persuasion in Mecca where the verse “Propagate the path of your Lord in wisdom and peaceable advice, and argue with them in a kind manner. Your Lord is more knowledgeable of those who stray from His path, and He is more knowledgeable of the guided ones” (Sura 16, Verse 125) and many other similar verses were revealed. This approach was continued for 13 years, during which time much of the miraculous Qur’an was revealed, and many men, women, and children were transformed under the guidance of the new discipline. The early Muslims curtailed their own aggression against the unbelievers, endured hurt, sacrificed their comforts sincerely and self-denyingly in the cause of spreading their religion, without weakening or submitting. Their lives were the supreme expression of their religion and consisted of sincere worship, kindness, and peaceful coexistence with all other people.

God says: “I have created jinn [spirits] and people for no reason except that they may worship Me.” (Sura 51, Verse 56) And He favored people with the mind, body, and comforts that enable them to worship Him and appreciate His Grace. He also says: “God enjoins ‘adl [justice], ihsan, the doing of good to others, and benevolence to the next of kin; and forbids indecency, lewdness, manifest evil, and transgression. He admonishes you that you may take heed.” (Sura 16, Verse 90) Again, God says:

<quote>

and that you slay not your children for fear of poverty—it is We who provide for you and for them—and that you approach not foul deeds, whether open or secret; and that you slay not the self, which God has forbidden save in accordance (with the demands of) justice. That is what He has enjoined upon you, that you may understand. (Sura 6, Verse 151)

</quote>

All this the Qur’an produced in the new religion, and the Prophet and his Companions delivered by their words and example, all to the best interest and advantage of their people.

Nevertheless, their people persisted in worshiping the stone they carved, severing relations with the next of kin, destroying life, and burying girls alive, [469] thereby abusing their freedom, and rendering it liable to be withdrawn. Since at that time there was no law except the sword, the sword was used to that effect [abridging freedom]. Thus, implementation shifted from the verse, “Then remind them, as you are only a reminder. You have no dominion over them” (Sura 8, Verses 21–22), to the verse, “except he who shuns and disbelieves, on whom God shall inflict the greatest suffering.” (Sura 88, Verses 23–24) It is as if God said, “We have granted you, Muhammad, dominion over anyone who shuns and disbelieves, so that God shall subject him to minor suffering at your hands through fighting, then God shall also subject him to the greatest suffering in hell.” “It is to Us that they shall return. Then We shall hold them to account.” (Sura 88, Verses 25–26) Thus the two first verses were abrogated or repealed by the two second verses. In this way, all the verses of persuasion, though they constitute the primary or original principle, were abrogated or repealed by the verses of compulsion (jihad). This exception was necessitated by the circumstances of the time and the inadequacy of the human capability to discharge properly the duty of freedom at that time. Hence the Prophet said:

<quote>

I have been instructed to fight people until they declare that “There is no god but God,” and that Muhammad is the Messenger of God (et cetera). Once they do, they will have secured their lives and property, unless they violate the law. And I leave their sincerity to be judged by God.

</quote>

Some Muslim scholars believe that Islamic wars were purely defensive wars, a mistaken belief prompted by their keenness to refute claims by the Orientalists that Islam spread by means of the sword. In fact, the sword was used to curtail the abuse of freedom.

Islam used persuasion for 13 years in propagating its clearly valid message for the individual and the community. When the addressees failed to discharge properly the duties of their freedom, they lost this freedom, and the Prophet was appointed as their guardian until they came of age. However, once they embraced the new religion and observed the sanctity of life and property, and the social claims of their kith and kin, as they had been instructed, the sword was suspended, and abuses of freedom were penalized according to new laws. Hence the development of Islamic shari’a law, and the establishment of a new type of government.

In justifying the use of the sword, we may describe it as a surgeon’s lancet and not a butcher’s knife. When used with sufficient wisdom, mercy, and knowledge, it uplifted the individual and purified society. God said to this effect:

<quote>

We have sent Our Messengers with the clear signs, and revealed with them the Book and the scales, so that people should maintain the fair balance, and decreed iron with much hardship and benefits to people, so that God may discover who supports Him and His Messengers sincerely. God is All-Powerful and Self-Sufficient. (Sura 57, Verse 25)

</quote>

“We have sent Our Messengers with the clear signs” indicates the conclusive proof of the validity of their messages; “and revealed with them the Book” refers to the principle that “There is no god but God.” “The scales” means the shari’a to adjudicate between slave [man] and the Lord on the one hand, and between one slave and another on the other hand, “so that people should maintain the fair balance,” that is to say, be fair in their dealings.

The part “and decreed iron with much hardship and benefits to People” signifies that God has enacted fighting with the sword in order to curtail the freedom of those who abuse it, so that the sword brings them to their senses, thereby allowing them to earn their freedom and benefit from their life. That is, of course, besides other benefits which may be derived from iron, which we need not enumerate here. The part “so that God may discover who supports Him and His Messengers sincerely” is to discover out of practical experience for man’s own benefit, because fighting is hateful and difficult. In other words, the object was to see who would endure the hardship of war for the sake of God and in support of the oppressed, by maintaining the fair balance between each individual and himself, and between himself and others. “God is All-Powerful and Self-Sufficient” implies that He is so Powerful that He needs no support from anyone else, and nothing can be gained from Him except through His own Grace.

What can be gained from Him in this context is victory. So the verse refers in a subtle way to another verse: “O believers, if you support [the cause of] God, He will help you and will make your steps firm.” (Sura 47, Verse 7) So if you support the cause of God by supporting His Prophet in order to maintain the balance, God shall help you and give you victory over your own lower selves. In other words, if you stand by the cause of God in minor jihad (fighting), He shall support You and give you victory in the major jihad (self-control) where one is helpless without God’s help, and no one can give you victory except Him. To “make your steps firm” means tranquillity and peace of mind, and includes, of course, physical courage in battle.

In treating ailments of the heart it is wise to begin with gentle means, and to resort to strict measures only when absolutely necessary, deferring drastic treatment to the very end. Suffering death by the sword in this life is really an aspect of suffering hell in the next life, since both are punishments for disbelief. Whoever adds to his own disbelief by inciting others to disbelief or to shun the path of God must be suppressed before he takes up arms in the cause of disbelief. God says:

<quote>

Those who spend their money in order to shun the path of God shall spend it, achieve only sorrow, and still be defeated. The infidels shall be gathered in hell, so that God may distinguish the bad from the good and set the bad apart and cast them all in hell. These indeed are the losers. Tell the infidels that if they repent, they shall be forgiven for what they have done, but if they persist, then they shall be dealt with as were similar people before them. Fight them to prevent chaos, and so that all religion is rendered unto God; if they give up, then God has insight in what they do. (Sura 8, Verses 36–39)

</quote>

When we consider God’s expression, “the infidels shall be gathered in hell, so that God may distinguish the bad from the good,” we can readily appreciate that the cause of suffering is disbelief. “God has no need for your suffering if you are thankful and believing, God is All-Thankful and All-Knowledgeable.” (Sura 4, Verse 147) The part of the above text, “Fight them to prevent chaos,” means so that there will be no disbelief, its propagation, or the shunning of the path of faith. “[S]o that all religion is rendered unto God” reflects the original purpose of fighting: “Your Lord commanded [that you] worship none but Him.” (Sura 17, Verse 23) This is the design which He shall accomplish regardless of the wishes of the infidels.

In another verse God says: “Fight them to prevent chaos, and in order to render religion unto God; if they desist, then there can be no hostility except against the wrongdoers.” (Sura 2, Verse 193) The wrongdoers are of two levels. On one level there are those who worship other than God, and persist in doing so, while on the other level there are those who appear to submit to God in obedience, but transgress upon the rights of other people and do them injustice. The verse decrees that freedom be withdrawn from those who abuse it, such withdrawal being proportionate to the degree of abuse: for the disbelievers the law of war, and hardship of iron, while to the transgressors, the law of peace and adjudication of rights. This is the meaning of the expression “then there can be no hostility except against the wrongdoers.”

Postponement from the original principles to the subsidiary principles signifies descent from the level of islam to the level of ‘imcm. This is referred to in the verse “And We have revealed to you the Reminder [the Qur’an] so that you may explain to mankind that which has been sent down to them, and that they may reflect.” (Sura 16, Verse 44) The phrase “we have revealed to you the Reminder” means the whole of the Qur’an including the original principle—islam—as well as the subsidiary (‘iman). “So that you may explain to mankind that which has been sent down to them” means to detail through legislation, and to explain, in various other ways, to the believers (mu’minin) what has been brought down to their level. “[T]hat they may reflect,” means that perhaps such reflection, while implementing the subsidiary principle, may lead them to the original principle they were unable to implement at the beginning. Here is a subtle reference to the ascent up the various levels of Islam, starting with initial Islam, and ascending by means of clear thinking, guided speech, and sincere action: “Unto Him ascends the pure words, being elevated by good deeds.” (Sura 35, Verse 10)

Thus we reach an extremely important conclusion: many aspects of the present Islamic shari’a are not the original principles or objectives of Islam. They merely reflect a descent in accordance with the circumstances of the time and the limitations of human ability.

* Slavery is Not an Original Precept in Islam

Islam’s original principle is freedom. But the Islamic religion was revealed to a society in which slavery was an integral part of the socioeconomic order. It was also a society that was shown in practice to be incapable of properly exercising its freedom, and therefore its individual members needed guidance; hence the consequent enactment ofjihad. In Islamic jihad, the Muslims first had to offer to the unbelievers the new religion. If they refused to accept it, they had the second option of paying jizya [tax] and living under Muslim government, while practicing their own religion and enjoying personal security. If they also refused the option of jizya, the Muslims would fight them and if victorious take some of them as slaves, thereby adding to the number of those already in slavery.

The rationale of such servitude is to be found in the principle of reciprocity (mu’awada). If an individual is invited to become the slave of God but refuses, such refusal is symptomatic of ignorance that calls for a period of training. The individual prepares to submit voluntarily to the servitude of God by becoming the slave of another person, thereby learning obedience and humility, which are becoming of a slave. Reciprocity (mu’awada) here rules that if a free person refuses to become the slave of God, he may be subjugated and made the slave of a slave of God, in fair and just retribution: “And whoso does an atom’s weight of evil will also see it” (Sura 99, Verse 8)....

 The Second Message of Islam

The Second Message is Islam. The Prophet himself imparted this Second Message without elaboration or detail, except for such overlaps between the First Message and the Second Message as ‘ibadat and hudud [worship practices and the specified penalties]. God says: “Today I have perfected your religion for you, completed My grace upon you, and sanctioned Islam as your religion.” (Sura 5, Verse 3) That day was the day of ‘arafa [ninth day of the month Dhu’l-Hijja] on hajat al-wada’ (the farewell pilgrimage) of the eighth year A.H., which was a Friday. This verse is the last verse of the Qur’an to be revealed, and is the ultimate word of the Divine Message.

God has accepted Islam for mankind so that we may accept it, because anything that is not initiated by Him cannot be undertaken by us. God says: “Then He forgave them in order that they may repent.” (Sura 9, Verse 118) [470]

Many people considered the phrase, “Today I have perfected your religion for you,” as implying that Islam itself has been fully achieved by mankind on earth on that day. The verse “And We have revealed to you the Reminder [the Qur’an] so that you may explain to mankind that which has been sent down to them” (Sura 16, Verse 44) was also taken to mean that the Qur’an has already been finally and conclusively explained. Nothing, however, is further from the truth than this view. “Explanation” of the Qur’an has been only in terms of [expedient] legislation, the shari’a, and interpretation to the extent appropriate for the time of such explanation and in accordance with the capacity of the audience and the abilities of the people.

The Qur’an can never be finally and conclusively explained. Islam, too, can never be concluded. Progress in it is eternal: “Surely, the [true] religion with God is Islam.” (Sura 3, Verse 19) “With God” [is eternal] beyond time and space. Progress into Islam by means of the Qur’an is progress towards God in infinitude (itlaq). As such it has not been, and can never be, fully and conclusively explained. It is its revelation into mashaf [Arabic text] as a Book that has been concluded, but its explanation has not.

This is how one should understand the difference between “revealed” and “explain” in the verse “And we have revealed to you the Reminder [the Qur’an] so that you may explain to mankind that which has been sent down to them, and they may reflect.” According to the prevailing understanding of Muslim scholars, the two notions are synonymous, while in fact they are not. The level of understanding in the phrase “that which has been sent down to them” does not refer to the whole of the Qur’an but only to the part subject to explanation, namely, the First Message, and sections where the First and the Second Messages overlap.

The Qur’an was revealed with dual meanings. God says in this connection:

<quote>

God has revealed the best speech in a Book of similar and dual meanings, from which the skin of those who fear their Lord creeps! Then their skin and hearts soften to dhikr [remembrance through worship of God]. That is the guidance of God with which He guides whomsoever He wishes, and he whom God misguided has no other guide. (Sura 30, Verse 23)

</quote>

The word “similar” implies that there is some similarity between the Qur’an at its base and at its peak, its front and back. Its zahir and batin, “dual meanings,” refer to its two levels of meaning: a distant meaning with the Lord, and a nearer meaning that has come down to the slave [of God].

The whole of the Qur’an is of dual meanings: every verse and word and even every letter has a dual meaning. The reason for this is that the Qur’an is the Lord’s speech to His slave. The similarity in the Qur’an is due to the similarity between the Lord and the slave, expressed by the Prophet in the hadith, “God has created Adam [man] after His Own image.” God expresses the same meaning in the verse: “O people, fear your Lord, Who has created you from a single Self.” (Sura 4, Verse 1) That “single Self’ means His Own Blessed and Exalted Self.

The word Islam, for example, has a near meaning exposed by the Qur’an in the verse, “The Bedouins said amanna [we believe]; tell them you have not believed, but say aslamna [we submit] and ‘mam [true belief] did not enter your hearts yet.” (Sura 49, Verse 14) This is what we termed initial Islam which, we said, is not taken by God as significant. Islam has a further meaning which lies with God in infinity. To this further meaning comes the reference in the verse: “Oh believers [mu’minin], fear God as He ought to be feared and become true submitters [muslimin] before you die.” (Sura 3, Verse 102)

It goes without saying that no one fears God as He ought to be feared except God Himself. This is, therefore, a methodology of ascent to God through many levels of servitude, humility, and submission. Servitude is infinite, just like Lordship. Absolute servitude to God requires absolute knowledge of God, and this only God can achieve. “Say no one knows what is in heaven and earth, the Unknown, except God.” (Sura 27, Verse 65) The Unknown here means God Himself so it is as if He said, “No one knows God except God Himself.” In our book Rasalat al-salah [The Message of Righteousness], which may be consulted in this context, we have shown how servitude [to God] is freedom.

Islam is a method of ascent to servitude, and the Qur’an is the Book which leads the way. This quality of the Qur’an is the reason it was revealed, as indicated in the verse, “And, indeed, We rendered the Qur’an for the sake of dhikr, remembrance through worship, is there anyone who would take heed?” (Sura 54, Verse 17) The Qur’an reminds us of servitude which we have accepted and then forgotten:

<quote>

And [remember] when thy Lord brought forth from Adam’s children—out of their loins—their offspring and made them bear witness against their own selves saying, “Am I not your Lord?” They said: “Yes, we admit this.” [This He did] lest you should say on the Day of Resurrection, “we were surely unaware of this.” Or [lest] you should say, [it was] only our fathers [who] associated co-partners [with God] in the past and we were merely a generation after them. Will Thou then destroy us for what those, who lied, did? And thus do We make clear the Signs, [that they may be admonished] and that they may return [to God]. (Sura 7, Verses 172–174)

</quote>

So that they may return to God in servitude and submission, through Islam.

As the Qur’an is the methodology of ascent to God, “We said: Go forth hence, all of you. And if there comes to you guidance from Me, then whoso shall follow My guidance, on them [shall come] no fear, nor shall they grieve.” (Sura 2, Verse 38) Since the Qur’an is that guidance, then it has its beginning with God, and its end with us. If we proceed properly through its levels, we shall recover the paradise we lost through the sin of Adam, and ascend into infinity (itlaq). God said of the Qur’an: “Alif lam min.[471] That is certainly the Book which contains guidance for the God fearing.” (Sura 2, Verses 1 -2) Of those who fear God who are guided by the Qur’an, He said: “Those who fear God are in paradise, and a river, on a seat of truth, with the Most Able King.” (Sura 54, Verse 54) These are levels or grades, beginning with paradise, then the river, then the seat of truth, and finally with the Most Able King in infinity. Such levels vary from physical paradise—which is the paradise lost through sin, to the Absolute in His itlaq. The Qur’an guides to all this, hence it is inexhaustible: “Say, if every sea became ink for the words of my Lord, surely, the sea would be exhausted before the words of my Lord were exhausted, even if a similar amount is brought as additional supply.” (Sura 18, Verse 109) For this reason it is false to assert that the Qur’an may be finally and conclusively explained. The Qur’an is God’s dhat [Self or Soul] which has descended, out of pure grace, to levels comprehensible by the slaves, thereby becoming the Qur’an in its various levels of descent: dhikr, Qur’an, and furqan.[472] Furqan was the most effective form of Arabic expression to indicate the two levels of Qur’an and dhikr. The Qur’an was rendered into the form of Arabic expression so that we might understand from God. God says in this respect: “We have rendered it into Arabic so that you may understand.” (Sura 43, Verse 3) This verse and other similar verses have misled many Muslim scholars into believing that the Qur’an itself is Arabic, in the sense that its meanings may be exhaustively understood through the Arabic language. It is not so, as we have explained when discussing Qur’anic chapters starting with letters of the alphabet, above.

Being so supreme, Islam has never been achieved by any nation up to the present day. The nation of muslimin has not yet come. It is expected to come, however, in the future of humanity. Its day of emergence shall be the day of the ultimate pilgrimage, the day when the Divine statement “Today I have perfected your religion for you, completed My grace upon you, and sanctioned Islam as your religion” (Sura 5, Verse 3) is realized in practice.

Muhammad, in his time, was the pioneer of the muslimin to come. It was as if he came to his nation, the nation of the mu’minin from the future. He was not one of them, as he was the only Muslim amongst them. “Say: My prayer and my worship and my life and my death are [all] for God the Lord of all creation. He has no partner. And so am I commanded, and I am the first of those who submit [muslimin].” (Sura 6, Verse 163) Abu Bakr [died 634], the second best man, was the most superior of all the believers (mu’minin), yet there was a huge gap between him and the Prophet. It was to future muslimin that the Prophet referred, when he said:

<quote>

“How I long for my brothers who have not come yet.” And Abu Bakr said: “Are we not your brothers, O Messenger of God?” He replied: “No, you are my Companions!” Then he said again: “How I long for my brothers who have not come yet!” Then Abu Bakr said: “Are we not your brothers, O Messenger for God?” He said: “No, you are my Companions!” Then He said for the third time: “How I long for my brothers who have not come yet!” They asked: “Who are your brothers, O Messenger of God?” He said: “A people who come at the end of time, of whom the active one shall have seventy times as much reward as you have.” They asked: “Seventy times as much as we have or they have?” He replied: “As you have.” They asked: “Why?” He replied: “Because you find assistance in doing good, and they find no assistance.”

</quote>

* The Muslims (Muslimin)

The Muslims, as a nation, have not yet come, but the Prophet prophesied their coming, towards the end of time, when circumstances are suitable, and God’s promise is fulfilled: “And he who seeks a religion other than Islam, it shall not be accepted of him and in the Hereafter he shall be among the losers.” (Sura 3, Verse 85) On that day all people shall embrace religion and find no alternative, because religion provides the only answers.

We believe that the earth is preparing for the emergence of the Islamic shari’a of the true submitters (muslimin), which shall establish the new civilization. In view of the bankruptcy of contemporary social philosophies, there is no alternative. As stated at the outset of this book, the whole of humanity today is in an ideological wilderness, with Western civilization lost and bankrupt,[473] and with issues of democracy, socialism, and individual freedom persistently demanding answers. Yet there is no answer except through the cross-fertilization of Western civilization, or to be more precise, Western material progress, with a new spirit, namely, the spirit of Islam. Islam appears to be the only ideology capable of resolving the existing conflict between the individual and the community and between the individual and the universe, as we have already demonstrated.

We should not confuse the name Muslims with the traditional name given to the present nation. We have already stated that the present nation derives its name from the initial Islam. Actually, present Muslim society is the nation of the mu’minin [believers]. No nation up to now has deserved the name muslimin. Any mention of Islam with respect to previous nations refers merely to initial Islam, except for the pioneers of humanity who achieved ultimate Islam, or rather a degree of the ultimate Islam, as the ultimate Islam can never be exhaustively achieved. Such pioneers are, therefore, the pioneers of the nation of muslimin which has not come yet. God says in this connection:

And [remember the time] when Abraham and Ishmael raised the foundations of the House [praying]: “Our Lord, accept [this] from us for Thou art the All-Hearing, the AllKnowing. Our Lord, make both of us submissive to Thee and make of our offspring a people submissive to Thee. And show us our ways of worship and turn to us with mercy; for Thou art Oft-Returning [with compassion, and art] Merciful. And, Our Lord, raise up among them a Messenger from among themselves, who may recite to them Thy Signs and teach them the Book and Wisdom and may purify them; surely, Thou art the Mighty, the Wise.” And who will turn away from the religion of Abraham but he who makes a fool of himself. Him did We choose in this world, and in the next he will surely be among the righteous. When his Lord said to him, “Submit,” he said, “I [hereby] submit to the Lord of the worlds.” The same did Abraham enjoin upon his sons—and Jacob [also—saying,] “O my sons, truly God has chosen this religion for you; so let not death overtake you except when you are in a state of complete submission.” Were you present when death came to Jacob, when he said to his sons, “What will you worship after me?” They answered, “We will worship thy God, the God of thy fathers, Abraham and Ishmael and Isaac, the One God; and to Him we submit ourselves.” (Sura 2, Verses 127–133)

The phrase “Our Lord, make both of us submissive to Thee” refers to ultimate Islam, and they [Abraham and Ishmael] were in fact muslimin [in this sense of ultimate Islam]. But the phrase “and make of our offspring a people submissive to Thee” indicates, in the short run, a Muslim nation in the sense of initial Islam, which shall evolve and develop into the ultimate Islam. Their prayers have been answered. Abraham advised his sons that there is no god except God, and so did Jacob: “O my sons, truly God has chosen this religion for you; so let not death overtake you except when you are in a state of complete submission”—that is to say, remain holding fast to the creed and maintain that “there is no god but God” until your death. Their answer, “we will worship thy God, the God of thy fathers Abraham and Ishmael and Isaac, the One God; and to Him we submit ourselves,” refers to the initial Islam.

God also said: “As I inspired the disciples [of Jesus] to believe in Me, and in My Messengers, they said: We do believe, and You shall bear witness that we have submitted (muslimin).” (Sura 5, Verse 111) Their Islam here is synonymous with ‘main [faith], as required in the revelation. God in the revelation required them to believe. When they did believe and declared this, they thought that their ‘mum was Islam, so they said: “You shall bear witness that we have submitted (muslimin).” A knowledgeable person can hear the Lord replying: “Do not say we have surrendered, but say we believe.” They had not surrendered in the sense of the ultimate Islam. They merely surrendered in the sense of the initial Islam.

The disciples were Muslims in the sense of initial Islam, since even the first stage of ultimate Islam requires moving out of the law for the community as a whole, and entering upon shari’afardiya, the law for the individual. Individuality is achieved only after perfect compliance with the law for the community, until one is able to properly exercise his absolute individual freedom. The ultimate Islam is the level of individualities.

Individuality cannot be achieved by anyone who is divided within himself. When the conscious mind is no longer in conflict with the subconscious, unity of being is attained, and this is characterized by wholesomeness of the heart, clarity of thought, and beauty of body, thereby realizing a full and comprehensive intellectual and emotional life. “The next life is the ultimate life if they only know.” (Sura 29, Verse 64) Ultimate life, free from defects, disease, and death, indeed the opposite of death.

To restore unity to one’s being is for an individual to think as he wishes, speak what he thinks, and act according to his speech. This is the objective of Islam: “O believers, why do you say what you do not do? It is most hateful to God that you say what you do not do.” (Sura 61, Verses 2–3)

* The Good Society

This superior state can only be reached through a two-fold method: first, the good society, and secondly, the scientific educational method to be adopted by the individual in order to liberate himself from inherited fear.

The good society is one that is based on three equalities: economic equality, today known as socialism, or the sharing of wealth; political equality or democracy, or sharing in political decisions which affect daily life; and social equality which, to some extent, results from socialism and democracy, and is characterized by a lack of social classes and discrimination based on color, faith, race, or sex. In the good society, people are judged according to their intellectual and moral character, as reflected in their public and private lives and demonstrated in the spirit of public service at all times and through every means. Social equality aims at removing social classes and differences between urban and rural life by providing equal opportunities for cultural refinement. The criterion of social equality is that marriage [the most fundamental and intimate relation] is possible between any man and any woman. This is the accurate test of social equality.

A good society also enjoys tolerant public opinion, permitting different life-styles and manners, as long as these are beneficial to society.

Public opinion has its own judgments over and above those of the law and may be more effective than legislation itself in deterring deviants and offenders. Public opinion may, of course, condemn any type of conduct it disapproves, but it must always do so only by nonviolent means, since violence usually results in one of two evil responses: counterviolence or hypocrisy. Sometimes public opinion can be enacted as legislation if this is consistent with the constitution as described above [that is, legislation that reconciles the individual need for absolute individual freedom and society’s need for complete social justice]....

* Political Equality: Democracy

Again, we will not discuss democracy in detail here, as it will be discussed in our book Islam Is Democratic and Socialist. Just as socialism is the product of the struggle between the “haves” and the “have nots” in the material sphere, democracy is the product of the struggle between those same extremes in the political sphere. Its purpose is the sharing of power. Democracy parallels socialism; they are as two wings of society. In the same way that a bird does not fly with one wing, so does society need the two wings of democracy and socialism.

Socialism, which requires greater social awareness, is preceded by democracy which, in the beginning, may be exercised by only a few enlightened individuals. Scientific socialism also needs, as a base, the riches of developed capitalism as well as the advances of modern technology. Primitive, native socialism, however, has its origins in ancient history.

Democracy was born in Athens, the most culturally advanced of the Greek city- states. Each of those cities had its own independent government. As the city- states were small, it was easy for the entire population to participate in government through public assemblies. Greek democracy was, therefore, direct democracy, with no need for an elected house of representatives or executives of modern democratic governments. In Greece officials were elected annually, and elections were often conducted by poll. The Athenians believed that participation in public affairs was the right and duty of every citizen. (However, they did not regard women and slaves as citizens). Pericles [circa 495–429 B.C.], their greatest orator, speaking on behalf of Athenian democracy in the funeral oration following the war against Sparta in the year 430 B.C., described Athenian democracy as follows:

<quote>

[Our government] favors the many instead of the few; this is why it is called a democracy. If we took to the laws, they afford equal justice to all in their private differences; if to social standing, advancement in public life falls to reputation for capacity, class considerations not being allowed to interfere with merit; nor again does poverty bar the way; if a man is able to serve the state, he is not hindered by the obscurity of his condition. The freedom which we enjoy in our government extends also to our ordinary life. There, far from exercising a jealous surveillance over each other, we do not feel called upon to be angry with our neighbor for doing what he likes, or even to indulge in those injurious looks which cannot fail to be offensive, although they inflict no positive penalty. But all this ease in our private relations does not make us lawless as citizens. Against this fear is our chief safeguard, teaching us to obey the magistrates and the laws, particularly such as regard the protection of the injured, whether they are actually on the statute book, or belong to that code which, although unwritten, yet cannot be broken without acknowledged disgrace.

Further, we provide plenty of means for the mind to refresh itself from business. We celebrate games and sacrifices all the year round, and the elegance of our private establishments forms a daily source of pleasure and helps to banish the spleen; while the magnitude of our city draws the produce of the world into our harbor, so that to the Athenian the fruits of other countries are as familiar a luxury as those of his own.

... We cultivate refinement without extravagance and knowledge without effeminacy; wealth we employ more for use than for show, and place the real disgrace of poverty not in owning to the fact but in declining the struggle against it. Our public men have, besides politics, their private affairs to attend to, and our ordinary citizens, though occupied with the pursuits of industry, are still fair judges of public matters, for, unlike any other nation we regard him who takes no part in these duties not as unambitious but as useless. We Athenians are able to judge at all events if we cannot originate, and instead of looking on discussion as a stumbling-block in the way of action, we think it an indispensable preliminary to any wise action at all.[474]

</quote>

Athenian democracy, as described by Pericles, continued to grow and develop in various parts of the world after the city’s demise. This type of democracy manifested certain principles and a distinctive approach to life—recognizing the dignity of man and attempting to manage human affairs in accordance with justice, truth, and popular acceptance. Modern democracy has established certain principles, the most important of which may be summarized as follows:

1. Recognition of basic equality between all individuals.

2. The value of the individual as above that of the state.

3. Government as the servant of the people.

4. The rule of law.

5. Appeal to reason, experiment, and experience.

6. The rule of the majority, with utmost respect for rights of the minority.

7. Democratic method and procedures used to achieve objectives.

Democratic methods and procedures are not an end in themselves, but rather means to an end that lies behind them. The object of democracy is not simply to establish legislative, executive, and judicial organs, since all these are but means to realize the dignity of man. Democracy is not merely a way of government; it is also a way of life. The individual human being is the end, and everything else is a means to that end. The respect and high regard which people have for the democratic approach to government are due to the fact that it is the best approach to achieving the dignity of the individual.

There remain, however, some inadequacies in the present democratic approach, although these are much less pronounced than the deficiencies of Marxism. We leave its detailed examination for our coming book, Islam Is Democratic and Socialist.

The dignity of man is derived from the fact that he is the most capable of all living things in learning and developing. The value of democracy is that it is the type of government most capable of providing opportunities for man to realize his dignity and honor. In a dictatorship, however, the government denies individuals the right to experiment and assume responsibility, thereby retarding their intellectual, emotional, and moral growth. In contrast to dictatorship, democracy is based on the right to make mistakes. This does not mean that individuals are encouraged to make mistakes for the sake of making mistakes, but rather it is recognition of the fact that freedom requires a choice between various modes of action. Democracy implies learning how to choose, choosing well, and correcting previous mistakes. In fact, all self-discipline and the true exercise of freedom are a series of individual actions in choice and implementation. In other words, freedom of thought, freedom of speech, and freedom of action all require that one accepts responsibility for mistakes in speech and action in accordance with law that is consistent with the constitution.

Democracy is therefore the right to make mistakes, as we learn from the hadith of the Prophet: “If you do not make mistakes, and then ask for forgiveness, God shall replace you by people who make mistakes, ask for forgiveness, and are forgiven.”

Human dignity is so dear to God that individual freedom is not subject to any guardianship, not even that of the Prophet, irrespective of his impeccable morality. God says: “Then remind them, as you are only a reminder. You have no dominion over them.” (Sura 88, Verses 21–22) Reference here is made to the polytheists who refused to worship God and tended the idols, worshipping them and sacrificing to them. Even the Messenger Muhammad, who was not seeking power for himself and whom God described in the Qur’an: “You are of great moral character” (Sura 68, Verse 4) [was not allowed to have dominion even over such a backward people]. This indicated that no man is perfect enough to be entrusted with the freedom of others, and that the price of freedom is continuous individual vigilance in safeguarding such freedom. In fact, individual freedom is a fundamental right with a corresponding duty, namely, the proper exercise of such freedom.

Since the society of mu’minin was incapable of exercising individual freedom in choice and action, the Prophet was appointed as a guardian to prepare them for the responsibility of absolute individual freedom. While exercising such guardianship, he insisted on giving them the right to make mistakes, whenever possible, without subjecting them to undue hardship or difficulty. In that way he was preparing them for democracy, for which they had to be sufficiently mature and intelligent. Such was the order of God when He said:

<quote>

And it is by the Great Mercy of God that you are kind towards them, and if you had been rough and hard-hearted, they would surely have dispersed from around you. So pardon them and ask forgiveness for them, and consult them; and when you are resolved, then put your trust in God. Surely, God loves those who put their trust [in Him]. (Sura 3, Verse 159)

</quote>

This is the verse of shura [consultation], and consultation, whenever mentioned, whether in this verse or in the following verse—“those who answered the call of their Lord, and perform the prayer, and their affairs are [decided] by shura [mutual consultation] and pay alms from what We have provided for them” (Sura 42, Verse 38)—does not refer to democracy. Shura, however, was a necessary stage in preparation for democracy, in due course.

Shura is not an original Islamic precept, but rather a subsidiary one. It is not democracy, but rather the rule of the mature individual who is preparing the nation to become democratic. The original precept of democracy is based on the verse, “Then remind them, as you are only a reminder. You have no dominion over them.” (Sura 88, Verses 21–22)

By the same token, zakat [Islamic taxation] is not a socialist practice; it is rather capitalist and is based on the verse, “Take alms out of their wealth, so that you may cleanse them and purify them thereby. And pray for them; your prayer indeed is [a source of] tranquillity for them. And God is All-Hearing, All-Knowing.” (Sura 9, Verse 103) Thus, zakat is not an original precept of Islam, but rather a subsidiary one. Its purpose is to prepare people psychologically and materially for socialism in due course. The original precept which the verse of zakat abrogated is that which reads, “When they ask you what to give away, say all that you do not need” (Sura 2, Verse 219), as explained above.

The Second Message calls for a return from the subsidiary verses to the original verses, which were temporarily abrogated because of circumstances and material and human limitations. We must now elevate legislation by evolving and basing it on the original Qur’anic verses. In this way we shall welcome the age of socialism and democracy and open the way to absolute individual freedom through worship and humane dealing with other people. This is the shari’a law of the nation of the Muslims (muslimin) that is yet to come, as the earth is now preparing to receive it. It is the duty of the people of the Qur’an [present- day Muslims] to pave the way for muslimin. And that is the purpose of this book....

 29—The Necessity of Renewing Islamic Thought and Reinvigorating Religious Understanding

Nurcholish Madjid

<quote>

A native of Java, educated through college level at Islamic schools, Nurcholish Madjid (Indonesia, born 1939) rose to national prominence in the late 1960s as leader of the Islamic Students Association. In a speech of January 2, 1970, the first of two translated here, Madjid called for deep-seated changes in Islam to keep pace with changes in the world, even using the controversial term secularism.[475] He had not intended for this speech to be circulated or published—indeed, he later called the talk's bluntness "a tactical blunder"—but he did not disavow the ideas expressed in the speech.[476] The second talk translated here, delivered in 1972, was an attempt to develop these ideas further, and his 1984 doctoral dissertation under Fazlur Rahman at the University of Chicago (see chapter 31)—on the thirteenth-to-fourteenth-century Islamic reformer Ibn Taymiyya—sought to "reexplain" his views with greater historical and philosophical sophistication.[477] Still an active and controversial figure in Indonesian Islamic debates, Madjid now heads a private Islamic research institute.[478]

</quote>

 The Necessity of Renewing Islamic Thought and the Problem of the Integration of the Umma

* 1. Introduction

The incentive to discuss the problem as reflected in the title stems from the established fact that Indonesian Muslims are again experiencing inertia in thought and development of Islamic teachings, and the loss of "psychological striking force!" in their struggle. The umma [Islamic community] is immediately confronted with a dilemma: should it choose to blaze the trail of regeneration within itself at the expense of long-coveted integration, or should it cling to the preservation of efforts toward integration even though it has to bear the consequences of inertia in thought and the loss of invulnerable moral forces? The incompatibility between the need for renovation and the need for integration is seen in the fact that when a section of the community takes the initiative in renewal, another section will react unfavorably towards it. History has repeatedly shown the truth of this phenomenon.

* 2. Islam Yes, Islamic Party No?

One of the encouraging facts about Islam in Indonesia at present is its rapid expansion, particularly in terms of its (formal) adherents. Areas which previously had not known the religion are now accepting it; in fact (in some areas) they are making it the principal religion of the inhabitants alongside the other religions which already existed there. A greater interest in Islam is being shown by people in the higher social classes; even if they do not practice it themselves they at least show such an interest in their official attitudes. But we have a question that still needs to be answered, that is, to what extent is that development a result of genuine attraction to the ideas of Islam as presented by its leaders, verbally or in written form?

Or can this Islamic quantitative growth be regarded as nothing more than a phenomenon of social adaptation because of recent political developments in the country, namely, the defeat of the communists which gave the impression of Muslim victory? (Such social adaptation occurred in the period of Orde lama [Old Order, 19451965] as well, because at that time President Sukarno was always demonstrating, with great enthusiasm, his interest in Islam and, similarly, toward Marxism— whatever people might have speculated about the motives behind this.)

The answer to the above questions might be found by putting down the next question: to what extent were they attracted to Islamic parties and organizations? Except for a few, it is clear that they were not attracted to Islamic parties or organizations. Their attitude might be formulated thus, more or less: “Islam yes, Islamic party no!” So if Islamic parties constitute a receptacle of ideas which are going to be fought for on the basis of Islam, then it is obvious that those ideas are now unattractive. In other words, those ideas and Islamic thinking are now becoming fossilized and obsolete, devoid of dynamism. Moreover these Islamic parties have failed to build a positive and sympathetic image; in fact they have an image that is just the opposite. (The reputation of a section of the umma with respect to corruption, for example, is, as time passes, mounting.)

* 3. Quantity Versus Quality

It is usually regarded as a truism that quality is more important than quantity. But what the umma is now doing in Indonesia is precisely the opposite: giving more importance to quantity than quality. It cannot be denied that unity gives a greater guarantee of achieving the aims, of a struggle than disunity. But can that unity exist in a dynamic form and become a dynamic force if it is not based on dynamic ideas? (“There cannot be revolutionary actions without revolutionary theories,” said [Vladimir Ilich] Lenin [Russian socialist, 1870–1924].) Dynamism is, at any rate, more decisive than a static state, even though the latter means a greater number of people. The paralysis of the umma these days is due, among other things, to the fact that it is closing tight its eyes to the defects on its body. This necessitates the existence of a movement aimed at the renovation of ideas so that the defects may be removed.

* 4. Liberalization of Outlook Towards the Present “Teachings of Islam”

If we have reached the decision to undertake renovation within the umma, then where do we start? In connection with this problem we might quote the statement of Andre Beaufre [French military strategist, 1902–1975]: “Our traditional lines of thought must go overboard, for it is now far more important to be able to look ahead than to have large scale of force whose effectiveness is problematical.” The reminder that a small group can triumph over a larger group shows the importance of dynamics in comparison with quantity. No doubt what is still better is a combination of both. But if this is not possible, then the choice has to be between the two of them, and that choice has to be “dynamics.” We would like to deduce from the above quotation the meaning that renewal has to start with two closely related actions, that is, freeing oneself from traditional values and seeking values which are oriented toward the future. The orientation to the past and excessive nostalgia have to be replaced by a forward-looking attitude. To that end we need a process which, for the sake of simplicity, we shall call the liberalization process. That process will be applied to the “teachings and views of Islam” which exist today. It involves other processes:

 a—Secularization.

By “secularization” is not meant the application of secularism, because “secularism” is the name for an ideology, a new closed worldview which functions very much like a new religion. What is meant here is all forms of “liberating development.” This liberating process is particularly needed because the umma, as a result of its own historical growth, is no longer capable of distinguishing—among the values which they consider Islamic—those that are transcendental from those that are temporal. In fact the hierarchy of values is often the reverse; the transcendental becomes temporal and vice versa, or everything becomes transcendental and valued as ukhrawi [pertaining to the hereafter] without exception. Even though they (the Muslims) perhaps do not express it in words, or may even deny it, still that attitude is reflected in their day-to-day activity. The consequences of this, as we already know, are most injurious: Islam assumes the same value as tradition, and to be Islamic is the same in degree as being traditionalist. Since the defense of Islam has come to be the same as the defense of tradition, an impression is created whereby Islamic strength is seen as the reactionary strength of tradition. The glasses through which Muslims see the scale of values have made them unable to respond properly to the development of thought in the world today.

So, by “secularization” one does not mean the application of secularism and the transformation of Muslims into secularists. What is intended is the “temporalizing” of values which are in fact worldly, and the freeing of the umma from the tendency to spiritualize them. In this manner the mental readiness to always test and retest the truth of a value in the face of material, moral or historical facts [may] become a characteristic of Muslims.

Further, it is intended by “secularization” that the temporal role of man as God’s “vicegerent” (caliph) on earth be fully consummated. Acting as vicegerent of God provides man with enough space for his freedom to choose and decide for himself, in the context of improving his life on this earth, whatever steps and measures [he deems fit], and at the same time it acknowledges man’s responsibility for those actions before God.

But what has happened now is that the umma has lost its creativity in this temporal life to the extent that it leaves the impression that it has decided not to act rather than [risk making a] mistake. In other words it has lost the spirit of ijtihad [Islamic interpretation].

In fact, as a logical consequence of towhid [belief in the unity of God], Muslims should automatically possess an attitude that is realistic and in accordance with what is towards the world and its problems. The fact that absolute transcendence pertains solely to God should actually give rise to an attitude of “desacralization” towards that which is other than God, namely, the world, its problems and values which are related to it. For to sacralize anything other than God is, in reality, shirk [polytheism], the opposite of towhid. So now secularization acquires its concrete meaning, that is, desacralization of everything other than that which truly possesses divine attributes, in other words, the world.

The object of the process of desacralization is everything pertaining to the world, both moral and material. Values are included among moral worldly objects, while matter constitutes the material objects. Now, if one hears the statement that “Islam is Bolshevism plus God” (Muhammad Iqbal [1877–1938]), one of its meanings is that the outlook of Islam regarding the world and its problems is the same as that of the communists (realistic, in accordance with what is, and without giving a value to the object more than that which it actually possesses). The only difference is that Islam postulates the existence of a transcendental being—God. The Islamic Weltanschauung [worldview] regarding the relationship between the universe and God is like that of the body, with the head above and the legs below (terms used by [Karl] Marx [German socialist, 1818–1883]). This means that [for Muslims] faith in God forms the basis of [their] outlook towards the universe, and not the reverse as in dialectical materialism.

 b—Intellectual Freedom.

One liberal Islamic institution of higher learning, Balai Pendidikan “Darussalam” at Gontor, Ponorogo (East Java), has as its motto, “Freedom of Thought”—following “Lofty Character,” “Healthy Body,” and “Broad Knowledge.” Among the freedoms of the individual, the freedom to think and to express opinions are the most valuable. We must have a firm conviction that all ideas and forms of thought, however strange they may sound, should be accorded means of expression. It is by no means rare that such ideas and thoughts, initially regarded as generally wrong, are [later] found to be right. This has been the experience of every reform movement, whether individual or organizational, everywhere in the world. Furthermore, in the confrontation of ideas and thoughts, even error can be of considerable benefit, because it will induce truth to express itself and grow as a strong force.

Perhaps it was not entirely small talk when our Prophet said that differences of opinion among his umma were a mercy [from God]. Freedom of thought was very well explained by Oliver Wendell Holmes [U.S. judge, 1809–1894] when he said: “The ultimate good desired is better reached by free trade in ideas—that the best test of truth is the power of thought to get itself accepted [in the] competition of the market, and that truth is the only ground upon which their wishes can safely be carried out.”

Because of the absence of fresh ideas we have lost what we described above as “psychological striking force.” This is due to the fact that there is not a single freethinking body which focuses its attention on the immediate needs of continuously developing social conditions, whether in the economic, political or social arenas. Be that as it may, we still have to admit that our Islamically based ideas can best solve those problems if they are adjusted, refreshed, renewed and organized (coordinated) in such a way that they are in step with the realities of the present age. For example, the [Islamic] teaching concerning shura or mushawara [consultation] has been generally accepted by the umma as almost if not exactly identical with the concept of democracy that originated in the West. But on the other hand, the principal teachings of Islam on social justice and the care and protection of the weak, the poor, and the oppressed, as contained in many passages of the Qur’an, has yet to find expression in ideas formulated for practical application in dynamic and progressive terms. This is so because the umma, it appears, still views with horror the word “socialism,” which like “democracy” originated in the West, and has a meaning which is quite similar to the corresponding Islamic concepts.

If this is not due to the absence of freedom of thought, then what psychological impediment is there within the umma? It has also made the umma incapable of taking initiatives in the development of this worldly society. Initiatives are always taken by others first, and as a result strategic positions that have to do with concepts and ideas fall into their hands. Islam is then excluded from those [strategic positions]. It is indeed important to realize that just as in military operations, wherein one vies for a vantage position on the battlefield and by capturing it prevents the enemy from occupying it, so also in the psychological game of politics one may capture positions of intellectual influence and hold on to them only to prevent them from falling into the hands of the enemy or other people. It is in this aspect that we see the main weakness of the umma. All of this is, once again, the consequence of the absence of freedom of thought, confusion in the hierarchy of values as to what constitutes the transcendental and what the temporal, the mode of thinking which is too encrusted with taboos, presumptions, and so on.

 c—The “Idea of Progress” and Open Attitudes.

In point of fact, if a Muslim is truly consistent with the teachings [of Islam], then the value of the “idea of Progress,” like all other values of truth, need not be stated, because it is, in fact, already part of these teachings.

The idea of progress springs from the concept that man is intrinsically good, pure, and yearns for truth and progress (man was created by God withfitra [natural disposition to the good] and endowed with the hanif quality [that is, inclined to truth]).

Because of this, one of the manifestations of the existence of the idea of progress is the belief in the future of man throughout his history. So there is no need to be afraid of the changes which always occur in the temporal value system of man. A reactionary attitude and a closed mentality in fact stem from a pessimistic view of history.

Therefore, consistent with the idea of progress is an open mental attitude, in the form of a readiness to accept and to take (temporal) values from whatever source as long as they contain truth. In accordance with the intellectual freedom mentioned above we have to be ready to observe the development of ideas concerning man across the widest possible spectrum, and then choose among them those which, according to objective criteria, contain truth. It is very difficult to comprehend why, in spite of the fact that their Holy Book clearly lays down that they “should give their ears to ideas and follow the best of them” (Sura 39, Verse 18), the umma today is more closed in its mental attitude. It is also stated that an open attitude is an indication that the person possessing it has received guidance from God, while the “closed” mentality described as “… bosom close and narrow as if he were engaged in sheer ascent” (Sura 6, Verse 126)[479] is one of the signs of being in error. If Islam is indeed neither a culture nor a civilization but a foundation for both, then where will Islamic culture and civilization find the materials to build themselves up if not from the entire surface of the earth, in the form of the universal human heritage. History provides unquestionable testimony to this fact. The Muslims came out of the Arabian peninsula having only a strong faith derived from the Qur’an and the sunna [practice of the Prophet]. Then from the newly conquered regions they discovered the legacies of humanity both from the West (Greek and Roman) and from the East (Persian). They later developed those legacies on the basis of principles which they brought from the desert of the Arabian peninsula and made them as their own. Was it not this creation of theirs that eventually gave birth to what we now know as the culture and civilization of Islam, of which we are so proud?

* 5. A “Liberal” Group of Renovators is Needed

Reform movements have been emerging on the stage of history, both in Indonesia and in the world at large. We have now, in Indonesia, organizations with the renovatory aspirations such as the Muhammadiya [The Muhammadiya Association, founded 1912], Al-Irshad [Society for Reform and Guidance, founded 1920s], and Persis [Islamic Union, founded 1926]. But history also records—and we must frankly admit—that they have now ceased to be renovators. Why?

The reason is that, in the long run, they have become rigid, probably as a result of not being able to capture the spirit of dynamism and progressiveness from the idea of renovation itself. On the other hand, organizations which history records as counter- reformist such as Nahdlatul Ulama [Renaissance of the Religious Scholars, founded 1926], Al-Washliya [Unshakeable Association, founded 1930], Persatuan Ulama Indonesia [Union of Indonesian Religious Scholars, founded 1917], and others, have now acted on their own, and have accepted values that previously were the monopoly of the renovators, although this attitude of theirs is due to the pressure of unavoidable historical laws. Moreover, they did not adopt those values with the requisite degree of seriousness or accept them formally as a principal view-point. The consequence of this is that a general state of stagnancy has now struck the umma: Islamic organizations that, at the time of their inception, were antitraditional and opposed to sectarianism have become traditionalist and schismatic, while other organizations, which originally rejected new values but have now accepted them, at no time intended to adopt the new values as principal attitudes in life. Hence a new and liberal group of Islamic renovators is required. As for the meaning of the word liberal, we have already given it above. But the term has further implications, as a logical consequence, namely, nontraditionalism and nonsectarianism.

What is further demanded here is that there has to be the capability and the courage constantly to review the group’s (sect’s) own values. Those values need not be brought forth again if only the Islamic community is consistent with its own teachings. For nontraditionalism is nothing more than the converse of the attitude: “We found our fathers subscribing to a particular set of values, and we receive guidance from their legacies” (Sura 43, Verse 22), while nonsectarianism is the converse of the attitude: “each group prides itself with what it has.” (Sura 30, Verse 32) Both attitudes are condemned in the Holy Book. To return to what we referred to earlier, the values of Islam are in fact dynamic, not static. Apart from the articles of faith (the most important of which is belief in God) and the fundamentals of worship coupled with some of the most fundamental social values which are deemed not likely to undergo change, Islam does not provide definitive formulations so far as temporal actions are concerned. Except for the fundamental value of taqwa [fear of God], which grows out of faith in God and worship of Him, there are no fixed values. [Most] values are cultural values which have, of necessity, to develop continuously in accordance with the laws of change and development (everything other than God undergoes destruction or change) (Sura 28, Verse 88).

Therefore the values of Islam are those that conform to humanity's true nature or to universal truths and are supported by taqwa towards God. Those values are Islamic if they basically do not contradict 'iman [faith] or taqwa, and are good according to humanity and its development.

Today, the struggle to improve the welfare of mankind is not the monopoly of the umma. The whole of mankind, by relying on reason and the mind, has become involved in the attempts to discover the best ways of improving collective human life. In this modern age such expressions of human thought are encountered in those terms now heard so often, such as democracy, socialism, citizenship, communism and so forth.

However erroneous these ideas may later be proved by history, they nevertheless represent the summit of human intelligence concerning our own social life, as a result of the realistic and intellectually stimulating observation of social and historical phenomena. Now we have to learn to employ the best of these ideas according to Islamic yardsticks and endeavor to develop them further with the same realism and the same diligence in thinking. This is the essence of the meaning of the ijtihad or renewal which we desire. Therefore ijtihad or renewal ought to be a continuous process of original thinking based on the evaluation of social and historical phenomena which, from time to time, need to be reviewed in order to determine whether they are really erroneous. Ijtihad is a process such that misunderstanding or its problems will result in a bitter fruit—failure. Nevertheless it is still much lighter than the burden of social and historical stagnation brought about by absence of renewal. Hence it is not possible for ijtihad and a meaningful renovation to take place if we do not have research organizations with strong foundations; if we do not have a first-rate method of analyzing all kinds of situations; and if we do not have accurate knowledge of the developments of human discoveries in the social or natural spheres. It appears that we are still far away from that comforting situation.

To sum up, the renewal effort is the task of those who come from that section of society that has the greatest capability to understand and to think. In other words it is the task of the educated. So the responsibility of educated people is indeed heavy—before mankind in history and before God in the hereafter. It is hoped that the major knowledge- and education-oriented organizations within the Islamic community ... can act as pioneers in promoting and carrying out this stupendous task through a kind of relationship which is more solid and better coordinated, without forgetting other liberal elements among existing Islamic associations.

With God alone are success and guidance.

 Reinvigorating Religious Understanding in the Indonesian Muslim Community

* Preface

The opportunity given to me by the Dewan Kesenian Jakarta [Jakarta Arts Council] to take part in the present literary program is indeed a great honor. For this honor I should like to thank the D.K.J., especially the Daily Activities Council.

This opportunity must be put to use in the best possible way. I shall use it to restate my thesis. I have earlier presented that thesis under the heading, “The Necessity of Renewing Islamic Thought and the Problem of the Integration of the Umma” [see previous section] on January 13, 1970. Now I shall present it again under a slightly different title, as may be seen above.

It is felt necessary to restate that thesis so that the misconceptions which then developed may be minimized. The thesis is being presented here with a simplification in the use of terms in addition to improvement—wherever possible—in the arrangement of words.

Hopefully that aim is still in keeping with the theme decided by the D.K.J. for this program, namely, “The Younger Generation and Religious Thinking in Islam,” as is printed in the Calendar of Events, October 1972.

* Introduction

The reinvigoration of religious understanding is presently felt to be extremely important by those who are aware of it, particularly within the Indonesian Muslim community. The conceptions which are available at present are somewhat crippled. In the face of the criticisms of the younger generation, those crippled ideas have become unattractive and “withered.”

Every conception or idea will determine the shape of the social character of its adherents. That social character will then color their actions and life behavior, and will consequently direct the course of their life’s destiny. So if a change in their lot is desired, then there has to be first and foremost a transformation in the conceptions and ideas which rule over their community.

In the case of Islam, the sources of its teachings are in our hands. Those sources, particularly the Qur’an, have been preserved, in terms of sounds and pronunciation, from the beginning. But (Muslim) man’s understanding of the principal teachings contained in them is always growing. This happens because of developments in human civilization which regularly provide new inputs to the world of ideas.

But not all this growing understanding is creative and correct. Sometimes it is extremely vulgar or coarse, to the extent that it renders religious concepts superficial. Examples of this are the ideas of modern apologetics. The apology came about as a means of defending Islam against the invasion of modern Western culture. In that situation Muslims confronted the invasion from a position of weakness. This apology, originating from a weaker position, sometimes revealed an inferiority complex. This is the reason why all apologetic ideas, in their essence, do not contain original creativeness.

Not every apologetic idea, however, was a failure. Some of them have, in fact, been so influential that they have given satisfaction to the Muslim community, calmed its restlessness and restored its spirit to endure and fight against the influence of foreign culture. But precisely because they were basically no more than apology, their potentialities were limited.

It is ironical that these apologetic tendencies are found at their strongest among modern Muslims, or—to be more exact—pseudomodern Muslims. These are precisely the people who know of and have enjoyed the blessings of Western civilization—both moral and material—but they do not possess within themselves the inner certitude of being Muslim. This is either due to their background or, more important, to their inability to make the adjustment between modern civilization and the religion they desire to believe in so firmly.

* The Principle of ‘Iman

To begin with, Islam is obviously a religion. As a religion its kernel is conviction. There is no need to dwell here on the necessity of having a conviction, whatever its form and content may be. It is a fact that life is impossible without conviction at all.

Right conviction, in Islam, is called “’ iman.” Literally this means belief. In this matter belief in God stands first and above everything else. This is not a mere belief in God’s existence. What is more important is the believing attitude, or having faith in God.

‘Iman is more of a product of an inner spiritual response than rational deduction. It is the state of the soul which is full of appreciation of

God. This appreciation develops through a complete assimilation of God’s qualities as contained in His “beautiful Names” (Arabic al-asma’ al-husna).

The attitude which is appreciative of God constitutes the core of human religious experience. This attitude is also known as “taqwa.” It is the spirit of Godconsciousness in a faithful man. It represents one of the highest forms of spiritual life....

And now we note a point which is pertinent to this discussion; that is, that ‘iman, taqwa, and the religious experience of the appreciation of divinity, as explained above, are spiritual in nature. This means that these values are connected to something that is entirely intrinsic in a person, namely, sincerity. Hence they have to grow out of free and independent choice. For this reason, these religious values are highly individual in nature. They may vary [in quality], especially if there is external pressure. They are man’s most personal and most deep-rooted possessions. They are perfectly preserved in the innermost chambers of the heart or moral conscience. Such religiosity is so perfectly hidden and preserved in the breast that only God knows of it and only He can evaluate it. The person concerned can only feel it, but is not able to explain or reveal it to others properly because of the limitations of the mind and language.

* The Principle of ‘Amal Salih

We mentioned earlier that when someone has the consciousness of God, it will become a strong and stable guiding principle and foundation of life. The reason for this is that when taqwa takes possession of the inner self and its attitudes, it will determine, out of the state of spiritual purity, the form and value of motivation for all acts in life or culture. This cannot but come from the desire to achieve a higher level of divine appreciation, toward the ultimate completion of the sense of purity—the “consent” or rida of God Himself.

Indeed the motivation, desire, and inclination to attain the good, the pure, and the true are qualities intrinsic to man because of his humanity. In accordance with his fitra or “original nature” which is pure, man is intrinsically inclined to that which is holy (hanif). He is further inclined, naturally, to yearn for the ultimate and absolute purity, namely, God, who is absolutely Pure, True, Good, and Absolute in all His qualities.

But it is precisely because God is the Ultimate Absolute, that He is beyond the ken of human comprehension. Man can only reach toward Him by following a way that channels his innate yearning and longing. Although man cannot hope, in this life, to reach God, he can, however, obtain God’s consent or rida, which would be felt by him spiritually in the form of divine appreciation. Indeed the highest stage of a spiritual life is that inner attitude which is wholly appreciative of God, coupled with the feeling of being contented with and resignation in God. This experience is a sign that God too is pleased and has given His assent. It should be borne in mind, however, that the forms of religious experience are highly individual in nature, and carry with them the implications we described earlier.

Since God, the goal of life and object of appreciation, is the Ultimate Absolute, and as such His essence is beyond comprehension, then what can be done—and should be done—is continuously to approach Him by following a way that leads to Him. This means that man should always strive to develop and expand his religious appreciation through “exploration” which will yield new experiences. This process cannot stop even for one moment, for each stop means finalization and absolutization, and this would mean, indirectly, laying claim to having attained and comprehended God, the Absolute. This would imply that God was being brought into the area of human comprehension, in which He becomes relative, loses His Absoluteness and assumes the relativity of nature and man himself with all its limitations. So it is in this process that knows no surcease that we Muslims are taught to make supplication to God every moment, particularly in our moments of formal communication (especially the canonical prayers) with God so that He may always guide them on the straight and right path.

Let us return to the question of man and humanity. It is already explained that man possesses an intrinsic inclination to that which is holy in accordance with his pure original self. Now this spiritual tendency expresses itself outwardly in the form of character. Man is basically a moral creature and when taqwa or appreciation of God is in accord with one's humanity orfitra then it also means strengthening this humanity orfitra and sharpening its innate inclination to the holy. Hence religion and religiosity function as the perfecter of man's noble character which intrinsically resides in him.

What then is the tangible form of that sublime character? None other than actions (or 'amal) and deeds that are harmonious and consonant or salih [appropriate] in their comprehensive relationship with the living environment, especially in interpersonal relationships....

But how does man understand and know the God-created laws that control the domain of life, whose vastness is unlimited? Since the universe is limitless, the laws which govern it must also be limitless. Such indeed is the case: God's laws repose in His knowledge, which embraces the whole universe. [So vast is God's knowledge that] "if every piece of wood on this earth were to become a pen in order to write down God's knowledge, and all the seas became ink, added to by seas seven times over, it would still not be possible to finish writing down the knowledge of God." Such is the picture given in the Qur'an (Sura 30, Verse 27).

It is inconceivable that God would teach man all His knowledge. Neither man nor any other creature has the capacity to understand it all at once. But man still needs to know and understand to some degree the scheme of God in order to assist himself somewhat in creating a life that is coherent, harmonious, and happy. Out of His mercy, God gave man an instrument by which he could come to some understanding of these laws. That instrument is the specifically human faculty called "mind," "reason," or "intellect." With that instrument the opportunity to undertake the task of developing this world opens up for man. This intellectual faculty truly constitutes man's superiority over other creatures, including angels, to such an extent that he is honored as God's vicegerent on earth.

So, with that faculty man is given the opportunity to understand the domain of his life, both the natural and the social aspects. If his understanding is correct and he follows it conscientiously, then he will be able, to some extent, to shape the good earthly life. That ability is, no doubt, limited. The knowledge that he can acquire is likewise meager. But even that limited amount of knowledge is highly beneficial to man, because it is useful in his life. It is only by marshalling his rational capacity that man can, to some degree, develop his earthly existence in a better way....

Let us return to the aspect of material life mentioned above. Unlike the aspect of spiritual life which is inward and personal, the aspect of rational life is not personal in nature, at least not all of it. For it can be tackled together with others. In fact, in many respects it certainly depends on others. All the more so when it is realized that the rational faculty is limited in such a way that its findings in the form of knowledge are relative in nature, that is, they may be wrong. So a cooperative effort among men is necessary to counter-balance these weaknesses or reduce them. That cooperation expresses itself in openness of attitude toward criticisms, evaluations or improvements, in keeping with the development of overall human knowledge. So there are two principles, ‘iman and ‘amal salih, and a subprinciple, that ofjoint effort in search of truth and progress.

Owing to its relativity as a rational product of limited capacity, knowledge is always developing from moment to moment. One who closes himself to the development of his knowledge is really denying the relativity and limitations of his reason. This means that he is making his knowledge and reason absolute. In truth he becomes an absolutist man. And since only God is absolute, he is thereby competing with God. It has already been explained that this is an extraordinarily grave evil against man’s true nature. The sin of shirk is unpardonable. We realize that absolutism is damaging to the human race, since it closes all doors to progress and development, whereas all things change. Only the Absolute, God, does not undergo change. Certainly there is no greater evil than to block the historical development of the human race, for that means destroying it totally.

So the dimension of material earthly life pertains to knowledge (‘ilm) while that of spiritual transcendental life pertains to faith

(‘iman). For that reason their respective approaches have to be differentiated. As we have argued at great length, obviously these two aspects of life cannot be separated. The acts of every individual are, first of all, inseparable from the inner self, the spirit. The forms of their relationship do have influence and consequence; in fact they determine the nature of his life in the hereafter. Nevertheless, their respective approaches must be differentiated on account of the differences in dimension.

The dimensional differences between these two types of life correspond with the dimensional difference between ‘iman and ‘ilm. The former grows and develops on the basis of revelation (belief), while the latter owes its growth to rationality. Because of this difference in dimension, the approach to either could be made in abeyance of the other. For example, in the approach to worldly existence, or knowledge, there is nothing to hinder two persons of different faiths working together. Or a man may achieve a low or high level of achievement without the influence of the spiritual aspect.... But, of course, man has to strive for the highest possible status in both aspects of life. Hence although the Qur’an, for example, contains many references to the transitoriness and deceptions of worldly life, it enjoins, nevertheless, that man should work for “the good in this world and the good in the hereafter.” (Sura 2, Verse 201) Since the two dimensions and approaches are different, the two kinds of happiness cannot be achieved simultaneously by means of one method. Whoever aims for the dimensions of earthly life will attain [the good of that life] and whoever aims for the dimensions of transcendental life will attain [the good thereof]. Pursuing either one does not automatically result in getting the other as well. One is reminded that anyone who strives only for the worldly life will not receive any returns in the hereafter. Similarly, those who strive only for happiness in the hereafter are reminded not to forget their portion in this world (Sura 28, Verse 77).... It is putting faith and knowledge together that enables man to perform ‘amal salih, thereby attaining the highest degree of his humanity....

* Apologia Concerning the Islamic State

This is an additional discussion, by way of an observation on one of the forms of religious concept within the umma. It is necessary to discuss this because of the urgent need to undertake some clarification concerning it.

The idea of the “Islamic state” has been in the habit of emerging with great force within the Muslim community at certain periods in the past. We are grateful that it does not exist now—at least, so it seems outwardly, although remnants of it still linger.

Viewed from the perspective of the history and development of thought, the emergence of the idea of the Islamic state represents, in reality, a kind of apologetic tendency, as indicated in the heading. That apology arose from at least two bases:

The first was an apology in relation to modern Western ideologies such as democracy, socialism, communism and others. These ideologies are often totalitarian in character, in the sense that they are comprehensive in scope and cover every sphere of life in detail, particularly the political, social, economic, and cultural spheres, and others besides. The apology in relation to modern ideologies gave rise to an ideological-political understanding of Islam which then led to the ideal of an “Islamic state” just as there existed democratic states, socialist states, communist states, and so forth. This totalitarian ideological-political apperception led to the emergence of apologetic thinking which declared that Islam was not merely a religion, such as Buddhism, Hinduism, Christianity, and others, whose domains of efficacy are the spiritual, wherein is arranged the relationship between God and man. Islam, it was claimed, is “din “ [religion]. With the word “din “ it was hoped and intended that a totalitarian meaning would be conveyed, which would include all aspects of life—political, economic, social, cultural, and so on. The apology, it seems, was deemed necessary because in modern life, dominated by Western patterns, the most important aspects of life are the political, economic, social, and the rest, other than- spiritual. It is understandable that this dangerous cultural invasion destroyed the self-esteem of the umma, which was backward in precisely those abovementioned aspects, and brought about a sense of inferiority. Thus the apology was a compensation for an inferiority complex. The reason for this was that the umma (through its apologists) tried, with apologia that produced the totalitarian ideological-political appreciation, to prove that Islam was actually superior to or at least on par with Western civilization, whose modern ideologies embraced the economic, political, social, and other domains—precisely those in which the Muslims failed.

As an apology, these ideas had only a brief span of life. After having temporarily satisfied the Muslims and restored their self-respect, the ideas were finally proved to be false. Like a boomerang they struck back at the umma. Its condition now is probably more pathetic than at the beginning. Such is the fate of ideas resulting from apology, whether they have been put down in writing or not.

The apology that Islam is “din, “ that it is not merely political appreciation—is untenable from several points of view. First of all, from the linguistic point of view, there is obvious inconsistency. The word “din “ in the Qur’an is used also to designate other religions, including the polytheism of the Meccan Quraish tribe. So the word simply means religion; Islam is therefore a religion.

Secondly, there is the question of point of departure. Although it is not realized or, more exactly, not admitted, it can be clearly seen that the motive force behind the apology is an inferiority complex. This is the feeling that unless Islam, in addition to dealing as a religion with the spiritual domain, also embraces other spheres of life, it does not stand on a par with Western ideologies. This means indirectly admitting the superiority of the political, economic, social, and other aspects of material life over the spiritual or religious. This mode of thinking clearly represents a Muslim’s total defeat before the onslaught of the Western materialistic way of thinking. Actually, if a Muslim truly realizes the position of the religious or spiritual aspect of life and is really cognizant and convinced of the superiority of Islam, he will not experience this sense of inferiority. On the contrary, he will have a sense of self-respect in facing anyone. Fortified by a firm conviction in himself and in his religion, he would then become creative in other fields, and with his mind freed from any sense of inferiority, he would readily learn from others who are superior in these fields. Another point is that it can be proved that in the sources of Islamic teaching—particularly the Qur’an—the domain of efficiency in which Islam is most emphatic and most lucid is the spiritual, the domain of religious matters.

Legalism represents the second factor which led some sections of the Muslim community to the apologetic concept of an “Islamic state.” This legalism produced an understanding of Islam which was wholly legalistic, in the form of an Islamic perspective which portrayed Islam as a structure and compendium of law. This legalism is an extension of “fiqh-ism.” Fiqh is the codification of [Islamic] law resulting from the labors of Muslim savants in the second and third centuries of the Muslim era [eighth and ninth centuries A.D.]. The codification was undertaken to fulfill the needs of a legal system which regulated the government and the state which, at that time, embraced a very large region and a huge populace. This “fiqh-ism” is so dominant in the Muslim community that even reformist movements for the most part still concentrate their objectives in that domain. This legal composition is sometimes also called shari’a [Islamic law]. The “Islamic state” is likewise an apology by which the Muslim umma hopes to be able to manifest laws and regulations, Islamic shari’a, that are superior to other laws. But it is already clear that, despite the renovations of the reformists, fiqh has lost its relevance to the present mode of living. Its complete renovation, however, such that it might become suitable for modern life, would require a comprehensive knowledge of modern life in all its aspects, so that this does not become an interest and a [matter of the] competency of the Muslim umma alone, but also of others. Its result, then, does not have to be in the form of Islamic law per se, but a law which embraces everybody for the regulation of a life shared by all.

From a more fundamental point of view, the concept of “Islamic state” is a distortion of the [properly] proportioned relationship between state and religion. The state is one of the aspects of worldly life whose dimension is rational and collective, while religion is an aspect of another kind of life whose dimension is spiritual and personal.

Of course, it is not possible, as explained earlier, to separate state and religion. Through the individual citizen an inseparable connection exists between motivation (or inner attitude derived from being part of a state) and action (or outward stance derived from being part of a state).

 30. Islam and Humanism

Mamadiou Dia

Mamadiou Dia (Senegal, born 1911) was a schoolteacher, a headmaster, and a journalist before turning to politics in the mid-1940s. He served as a senator of the French Republic, representing Senegal; then after independence, he was prime minister of Senegal for four years. Dia's long collaboration with President Leopold Sedar Senghor, a non-Muslim, symbolized the relative absence of religious strife in Senegal, where the population is more than four-fifths Muslim. Nonetheless, Dia broke with Senghor in 1962 and was jailed for a dozen years. During his incarceration, Dia turned from politics to religion, integrating his fervent socialism into a theory of "Islamic humanism."[480]$$$ In a series of books on Islam published after his release from prison, Dia argues that interpretation of Islam must respond positively to the modern world, as Christianity has. Dia refers frequently to recent French theology for inspiration and methodological guidance—the effect being an opacity somewhat different from the Qur'anic exegesis of other works in this book.

 Theological Bases of Islamic Humanism

All projects of Islamic renovation, in order to survive, must be based on solidly established theoretical foundations that call for a reflection on [the original] sources. The Islamic humanism that is being sought cannot forget this lesson, which results from the history of modernist reformism itself. In order to face the problems of the day, Islam needs first to affirm itself as ethical and religious value as much as spiritual personality. To resolve its own problems and confront the modern ideologies, it requires an adequate ideological apparatus built on an authentic Islamic philosophy. Islamic authenticity requires a return to the sources, that is, to the Qur'an and to the [sunna], not to take shelter there, to drown current cares there, but to draw from thence elements for the renovation and revitalization of Islamic philosophy. It is thus to a confrontation with the sources which we must submit any reformism, in order to know if there exist or not, in Islam, the ideological bases of a humanism integrating reason, the person, history; and if so, to try to determine in what measure the ideology of Islam lends itself to an enlargement to the dimensions of a universal humanism....

 Islam and History

* Historicity and Qur'anic Exegesis

A correct exegesis of the Qur'an, as we have already indicated, leads to a consideration of Islam as both esoteric and exoteric, haqiqa [truth] and shari'a [Islamic law], meta-history and history. Man, in accepting the burden of the amana [faith] on the day of the Covenant, has affirmed his Promethean character before God. It matters little that this event cannot be dated, since it is situated in pre-existence: the Muslim retains the symbol of it; he knows that he is the inheritor of this celestial being that had the crazy audacity to designate him for conquest. This spiritual filiation leaves him no doubt about his Promethean vocation and exempts him from asking God to descend to earth in order to make history. If he tried to forget this vocation, the shahada [acceptance of Islam][481] and the shari'aremind him of it at all times. First, the shahada—which, as we already know, is not pure contemplation, pure spiritualization, but Promethean effort to be faithful to the pact concluded with God. The history which was in virtuality in the celestial sojourn of man, begins, not with Islam, nor with Christianity or Judaism, but well before, with Adam descended to earth, less to expiate a sin than to accomplish the promise made to God: the promise to witness out of benevolence and out of his creative power through imitation of the creation, on a human scale. The continuity of destiny born of meta-history obliges the Muslim to adopt a conquering and creative attitude towards the world. In inviting him to meditate on the beauties of creation, on universal harmony, in exciting his curiosity, the Qur'an engages him—one cannot deny this—in the path of discovery and creativity which leads to salvation. But if the shahada appears thus as the source of the Islamic philosophy of history, as the ontological foundation of the Promethean vocation of Islam, if it is historic conscience, it is through the shari'a that it becomes praxis, concrete history, lived experience, acted faith. Through the shari'a the Muslim descends from the peaks of spirituality, installs himself in temporality, takes possession of the world, not to transform it into an eternal dwelling, but to set it up as a way station necessary for the pursuit of his transhistorical voyage. With the shari'a are born the written event, dated, the countability of time passing from qualitative to quantitative, the organization of a living community, the edification of a culture of totality responding to the needs of the totality which is man. It is the Muslim response, on the temporal plane, to the appeal of the shahada which invites us to remain faithful to the totality, to reject any dualist worldview, and to realize the earthly vocation of man in a trans-historical perspective.

* The Islamic Response to History

It is thus a positive response to history that the sources prescribe, and in fact the Islamic response is marked by positivity. It appears in the dynamism of Islam which, scarcely 15 years after the death of the prophet, extends its influence over three continents, contributing thereafter to the origin of the modern international economy; in the glory of the experimental sciences of the 'Abbasids [reigned 750–1258], which introduced "the foreign themes of Greek aesthetic statistics" with the utilization "of singular numbers, irrationals, trigonometry and algebra" (Louis Massignon). It is written in the vitality and liberalism of the political institutions that inspired democratic constitutions while remaining faithful to theocracy, giving birth sometimes to secular regimes such as the Socialist Republic of Lahsa [presumably al-Ahsa', capital of the Qarmati state in eastern Arabia, tenth to eleventh centuries], whose revolutionary zeal bordered on heresy; [and the] the caliphate of Baghdad [762–1258], during the same epoch, whose caliphs remained content to be no more than "president of Islam," renouncing theocratic privileges, including the Friday sermon.[482] It bursts through "this gushing of creative power" (Wilfred Cantwell Smith) of medieval Islam, which not only built new empires, doubling by its conquest the geographic sphere of influence of classical Islam, but favored the blossoming of the cultures of the converted peoples: Persians, Turks, Indonesians. It is that Islam becomes very quickly— alas!—the faith and the raison d'etre of a ruling class, overflowing with dynamism and entrepreneurial spirit. From a religion of adversity, of salvation in defeat, it transformed into a "religion of triumph in success, of salvation in victory, accomplishment, and power," a religion of effectiveness, of the creation of the project whereby history confirms faith. During this conquering period ... the "shahid, that is, the martyr who fights and dies in the path of God," gives his life, "not against history but with it, for the historic and earthly success of Islam, for the triumph of its cause, for the expansion of its domination in the world."[483] It is significant that a pious theologian as classical as ['Ali ibn Muhammad] al-Mawardi [Iraq, circa 974–1058] comes to construct an abad [eternity; here, utopia] of the world based on the fecundity of the soil as the source of ease and riches; on hope as a grace "placed in the heart of man," so that civilization extends itself over the world, and to prefigure, even before [Henri de] Saint-Simon [French social theorist, 1760–1825], the common exploitation of the natural resources unequally distributed throughout the earth, on the basis of mutual aid. But for our purpose, the positive character of the response of Islam manifests itself above all in the idea of progress that Islamic thinkers and philosophers have brought to light. These are, above all, secular thinkers and philosophers. It is the physician [Abu Bakr Muhammad] Razi [Persia, 864–925], whose philosophy is founded on the notions of "demiurge," of "materia prima," of "space and time," who distinguishes between absolute time and limited time, who proclaims the mission of the philosophers "to awaken souls." It is the mathematician [Abu Rayhan] Biruni [Persia, 973-circa 1050] who professes a philosophy of history based, in imitation of the yogas of India, on the cycles corresponding to the periods of universal cataclysms. It is [Abu Yusuf Ya'qub] Al-Kindi [Arabia, circa 801–866] who, rallying to the idea of a creation ex nihilo, established the distinction between the divine world and the world of nature, the world of becoming and that of change, between the revealed truth and the philosophical truth. It is Averroes (Ibn Rushd) [Spain-Morocco, died 1198] who by his Aristotelian rationalism—that in reality never abandoned the dialectic of esoteric ta'wil [interpretation]—will give rise after the live curiosity of Middle Age Christianity, to the enthusiasm of Ernest Renan [French Orientalist, 1823–1892], who will make a free thinker out of him, when he was never anything but an Islamic free thinker. But, at least as much as secular thought, it is religious thought itself that is affected by the philosophical idea of progress. It is that which attests to the audacious enterprise of the Isma'ili gnosis, which, after Al- Kindi, allows itself to calculate the cycle of the revelation, throws itself into the science of balance, "quantitative science," who proposes to measure "the intelligence, the soul of the world, nature, forms, stars," without forgetting "the animal, the vegetable, the mineral" and above all the letters (Henry Corbin, p. 186), which presents itself as an anticipation of "the energy of the soul," manifesting even the ambition to "build robots, artificial humans" (Louis Massignon).

One may also say that it is this Islam which, with pan-divine Averroism, is at the root of the "scientism" that has contaminated the West through the mediation of medieval Christianity. The fact that Islamic orthodoxy does not repudiate Averroism, nor Averroes, nor even the Isma'ili quantitatism, is the proof that in Islam, philosophical progress is not necessarily a heresy. On the contrary, through the richness of its philosophical culture, the result of a synthesis of diverse elements, autochthonous and foreign, Islam shows that it is open to cross-fertilization, that it can make itself "woman" and become the matrix of a historic, progressive, original culture, which is something else than the product of syncretism....

 Islam Confronts Contemporary Humanism

* Elements for an Islamic Humanism of the Twentieth Century

Islam has not, truly, remained indifferent in the face of the problem of its adaptation to the modern world. Reformism represents a praiseworthy effort, both of secular elites and progressive ‘uhmai’ [religious scholars], to elaborate a constructive and dynamic version of Islam. Unfortunately, the responses of reformism are false responses to the problems which it confronts. The effort of the ‘ulama’ is shackled by the vision of the past from which they do not succeed in detaching themselves; reform is conceived in relation to the past and not as a function of the present. It is the institutions of the past that are asked to respond to the needs of the present; it is the past which they wish to revive in the present, or, in other words, the present is viewed as past, as attested to by the attitude of modernist exegesis which exhausts itself demonstrating the Qur’anic origin of the most modern discoveries. The reformism of the ‘ulamf far from situating itself in our world, cannot respond to its challenges.

The modernists of Western inspiration, in sacrificing the unitary character of Islam to a dualist point of view which is totally foreign to it, propose less a reform than a dissolution and, in the greatest of their hypotheses, a Christianization of Islam. They do not believe, nor renew; they destroy in servile imitation. This “reformism” poses more problems than it resolves. In its more moderate form, it puts fidelity to institutions before fidelity to faith. Its modernism is nothing more than a facade of modernism which pastes modern ideas on a foundation of archaism. The paradox of Islamic modernism is that it totally ignores modern problems, which are confused with ancient themes dressed up as modernity. Thus, traditional theology remains at the center of modernist thought, with the old debate on free will which has lost none of its formal character since the Mu’tazilites,[484] the old debate on power, on imamat [leadership], which is modernized by the name secularity. No doubt reformism has sensed the necessity of reopening ijtihad [Islamic interpretation] as preliminary to the development of all free thought and all philosophical progress. But the fact even of posing this demand that it must satisfy bears witness to a fidelity to established hierarchy and institutions, taking precedence over fidelity to God and to authentic Islam, which excludes all authority. What reformism lacks is the spirit of reform: the debate over ijtihad in a world where free discussion poses no theoretical problem is the clear proof of the subordination of modernism to the traditional. Modernist Islam is more attuned to the Ancients than to the Moderns, more attached to written and fixed witness than to the living word of God, more concerned about material identity than about creative originality. Its responses concern our world less than the world of the past: they are worth less for our history than for the history of previous Islamic generations.

* For a New Signification of Islam Founded on a Creative Vision of God

Islam the creator is founded not on a God cut off from the world and from men, imposing His Law from outside, instituting His Justice externally, but on the contrary, on a living God, present in heaven and on earth. Islam is a gift of God, a guide- book, a light on behalf of man. It is God going towards His creature, responding to its anguish; it is word, message of benevolence directed towards all of humanity. Fidelity to Islam is thus, first of all, fidelity to the word of God, fidelity to the Messages which must be attested to by the institutions, the rules of life conforming to His directive. That is to say, by its temporal and spiritual manifestation on earth, Islam cannot be anything but the creation of the Muslims, both response to God, response to their own problems and to the problems of the world. It is, for the Muslims, the place where history is made, according to the designs of God, under His protective gaze and his benevolent guidance: “the straight path.” Institutional Islam— manifestation of the faith to the Message—is thus a human product, a product of successive generations of Muslims, carrying necessarily the imprint of the epochs, obeying the dynamics of evolution, in order to be a worthwhile response for the different ages of humanity. Faithfulness to God cannot be, therefore, a loyalism with regard to the institutions of the brilliant Islamic Middle Ages, which accomplished its mission with the means of its time, but the will to create for the Islam of the 20th century efficacious institutions in conformity with the spirit of the Message, that is, institutions introducing the Justice of God in a dehumanized universe, institutions endowed with the power to make heard the message of fraternity in a world where a mechanical and irresponsible human order tends to be substituted for a rational, fraternal human order. To witness God in such a world is to restore His living reality, to rediscover the sense of divine engagement, the sentiment of the divine presence among us, to respond to divine grace with an active piety which is the only thing we can offer of ourselves. We must restore the idea of a personal God, without anthropomorphism, in affirming as against modernism that in a desacralized world where God is banished, man cannot recognize man, but his shadow, and as against Mu’tazilite rationalism and its survivors that transcendentalism well understood cannot suppress that which makes God a living reality for man in this world. The new humanism calls for a theology which, renewing the authentic spirit of Islam, which is a philosophy before being a juridical construct, defines God not as a given, but as a giver, “an absolute demand on the heart of the subject,” implying at all moments a liaison with God, reclaiming a continuous effort to invent a solution to the problem, to discover the truth.[485] Only an Islamic theology that gives God the image of a modern Divinity, a theology which is founded on a God “nearby, progressive, universal” (Pierre Teilhard de Chardin [French philosopher-anthropologist, 1881–1955]), which humanizes faith, which aids us in discovering a supernatural accorded to our century, which makes Islam and human coincide, can become the source of a real renewal, capable of avoiding “the schism” which threatens us. The shock which the rise of the great modern myths of socialization, progress, alienation have provoked among the Muslim masses and in the consciences of the elites, tends to constitute, in the wise remark of Teilhard de Chardin, “a veritable religion not ofjoyous adoration but of disinterested conquest, undoubtedly generating high spiritual forces,” substituting in people’s consciences “the sense of the world” for God, makes urgent the elaboration of a new signification of religion which incorporates in its perspectives the sense of progress, the sense of humanity, the sense of the earth. Contemporary Islam clearly has more need of theological purpose, of philosophical creation, than ofjuridical erudition.

The elaboration even of this new theology calls for a renewed conceptual apparatus. Neither utilitarian and superficial rationalism, the Mu’tazilite inspiration that the most liberal juridical schools have not managed to break free of, nor the modernist doctrines, so poor in the scheme of thought, can serve as a foundation for such an enterprise. It is a matter of forging a new conceptual apparatus. First, with properly Islamic elements, in making an appeal to the Islamic gnosis, particularly to Shi’i gnosis.[486] This school has given us the notion ofPlenome, “the mysterious synthesis of the Uncreated and the Created,” which Sunni prudence has put at the bottom of the barrel, a fertile development capable of constituting the base of a theology of the dynamic relations of God to the Universe, worthy of our times; the Ismaili notion of hadd [limitation], which expresses a metaphysical hierarchy, interpreted in the same sense as transcendence, allows one to understand, without heresy, how God can reveal Himself as a Person, with which becomes possible a relation of knowing and love.

But to be adaptable to the needs of a modern theology, the conceptual apparatus must borrow from outside. Only a vigorous Muslim thought, endowed with sophisticated conceptual tools, can respond to the questions that the modern conscience poses. Contemporary Islam cannot content itself with the science of hadith [traditions of the Prophet] andfiqh [Islamic jurisprudence]: it must add to the traditional knowledge the knowledge of the great modern philosophies: religious philosophies and secular philosophies. It must integrate modern knowledge into its ancestral knowledge. To this end, it must reserve a place of honor for the study of contemporary Christianity, instruct itself better in its dogmas, including that of Incarnation, study systematically its thinkers: first, its theologians whose thought is no less an enrichment of all humanity for being of the Church; next, its lay writers who are nourished at its maternal breast and whose works, so profoundly convergent, resound in our universe of violence like a veritable Gospel of new times. Modern Islamic humanism cannot ignore the philosophy of the new Church, for lack of a more complete knowledge of Christian philosophy: it cannot ignore Saint-Simonian thought, Teilhardian thought, Samaritan thought, that of Emmanuel Mounier [French social philosopher, 1905–1950], that of Francois Perroux [French economist, born 1903], the thoughts of visionaries who, in the Christian world, respond to the anguish and to the interrogations of a world that wishes to be total in order to survive. In particular, Islamic theology must lean on the recent aspects of Christian theology, on the sacralization and dynamization of dogmas such as the cult of the heart of Jesus, which, responding to the prayer of Teilhard de Chardin, seems to evolve from Christ the King, “external power that could not be but juridical and static,” to Christ the Universal, “Saving Mover, Master and End of evolution,” binding to the reality of his human nature “the personality of elements which it reunites, though without the danger of pantheism, without pagan naturalism leading to the materialist conquest of the Earth.” It is the living example of a theology which poses itself “as savior of the most current hopes of the Earth,” which associates “the spirit of detachment and the spirit of conquest; the spirit of tradition and the spirit of adventurous research; the spirit of the Earth and the spirit of God.” In this line of thought, the works of the last Council appear to carry elements of meditation richer for Islam than the declaration on the Jews.

Islamic theology must also be open to secular thought, to contemporary human sciences: philosophy, history, sociology, economics, even when they are of materialist and atheist inspiration. First, because to refute atheism and materialism, one must know them. Next, because atheist materialism—as we have just shown—is far from eliminating all spirituality and all cosmicity; on the contrary, it demands a positive humanism, a new religion, all the more formidable in that it responds concretely to the aspirations of man today. Its critique of traditional religions has more than a negative aspect: it has a purifying and methodological role that is not foreign to the progress of the observed doctrines, where one is sensitive to its influence. As Jean Lacroix notes, “The negative dialectic is an essential element of the knowledge of God.” But what makes atheism a force to contend with at this time is that it is no longer a critique, but constructive. It is no longer materialist, but spiritualist. It has become a place for the formation of universalizing human values which no modern religion can allow itself to ignore. Islamic humanism cannot ignore either the contribution of Marxism or the contribution of contemporary existentialisms, the new concepts with which they have enriched dialectical analysis and thought, the forces of humanization that they have worked up and which are far from contradicting their theoretical foundations. Without a doubt, it is often a matter of formulas that translate metaphysical intentions which the materialist language hardly seizes on for their communicative value, the propulsive force necessary for any modern theology. In insisting on the complex totality of being, on participation as a condition of existence, in refusing the Aristotelian dualism for a dialectic of unity that “reestablishes in its continuity the living tissue that an imprudent analysis has disjoined (Gabriel Marcel [French philosopher, 1889–1973]), the contemporary existential formulas open the path to a fertile meditation on ontological mystery and give a new foundation to a theory of metaphysical knowledge, which integrates Cartesian thought in order to surpass it, in reconstituting the destroyed totality, the link with existence, in correcting the discussion through love” (Jeanne Delhomme). Let us take care that it is not a matter of a syncretism, but of a re-creation demanding immense work, both critical and constructive, in order to reconcile all this with our specific experience. It is in speaking the language of the 20th century, in using the conceptual tools of modern man, in making theology an original synthesis of spiritual and intellectual elements equal to the needs of our time, emerging in a philosophy both of truth and of reality that is reconciled with objectivity and allows [us]—no longer to look at the world from outside as a spectacle, but to participate in the drama that is being played. By assuming both cosmic and new earthly responsibilities, Islam will have a real significance for the men of our world.

* For an Islamic Praxis Founded on the Renewal of Historic Reality

To live in the world is to think and act together, it is to think in order to act, it is to act in thinking.[487] To be of this world, Islam must—at the same time that it elaborates a new theory of knowledge—construct a praxis based on the total renewal of historic reality.

History has proved [Islam's] capacity for adaptation to sociological and human realities, but here too, one should not be content with a reference to the past. In a world transformed by science and technology, such as never before, it must respond to new challenges with bold and constructive innovations such as never before. Let us repeat once more: the golden age of Islamic civilization that was the Middle Ages, knew how to confront its problems of the scientific and technological revolution. It knew how to generate economic and social institutions and structures adapted to its level, as demonstrated by its model of socialization founded on a structure of work which was not embarrassed to appeal to servile labor. Ancient Islam, of the age of economic and financial take-off, was able to pass from a primitive economy of plunder to a modern economy by resolving the problem of capital formation, contrary to Islamic law, through the official practice of shifting the sin of usury onto its Jewish and Christian compatriots. Contemporary Islam finds itself confronted with an economic and social structure that excludes the recourse to slavery, even for utilization towards collective ends, the recourse to the pernicious process of the shifting of sin onto the Other: the modern economy is an entirely different economy, with a new employment structure and a new capital structure that put [even] the best prepared secular organizations to a harsh test. To witness God in the 20th century is to make history with the tools and the organizational structures of our times. God is neither anachronistic nor archaic: He is eternal Life, the Life whose complexion is that of the times. To bear witness to His presence is to render possible the reading of His Signs in a universe of machines that strips away all signs. To bear witness with the means of the epoch, that is, to adopt modern science and technology, not as new divinities but as means of realization of an efficacious human praxis, as means of liberation and disalienation as much as instruments of conquest. It is to make the world of believers not a universe of pariahs, of the powerless and the resigned, but an efficacious world, dynamic, enterprising, responsive to the challenges of hunger, poverty, illness, and ignorance, which the promises of a better in the beyond cannot satisfy for so many of the human masses who suffer in the world, where the faith of the faithful, instead of confining [them] to hopelessness, gives the right to share in the hopes which science and technology bring. To make Islam significant in a world … whose rationality informs all men, which "judges others and judges itself according to quantifiable results in its struggle with external nature, according to their wealth in the means of production" (Eric Weil)—this forms a vital and concrete element of the new humanism by rendering it capable of making dams rise up from the ground, atomic energy plants, modern working cities, no longer of course with the rod of Moses or the sword of 'Ali [son-in-law of the Prophet and fourth caliph, circa 596–661], but with this modern grace of God that is contemporary technology. It is no longer a matter of being assisted, but of being initiated, of being introduced to the sanctuary of the secrets of modernity, of becoming a demiurge both without idolatry and without perverse vanity, in drinking at the source of the new knowledges, in entering in direct relation with Prometheus, jeering the divinities but giving grace to God. It involves, in a word, inaugurating the era of true cooperation in rising to the level of scientific and technological creator, for "the inherited cultural objects that were not made by us, are not, strictly speaking, ever made by us: they only become ours in the form that we invent [them] and by the new meanings that we give them."[488] A progressive Islam that moves deliberately and resolutely towards science, in the shadow of which it has grown, nourishing itself from its sap, armed with a renovated conceptual tool lofty enough to serve as an "animating revelation" for research. By incorporating science and technology, Islam gives itself the means to contribute to the restoration of the reign of the Spirit on earth, the means of maintaining theology at the side of anthropology, of making their meanings coincide, and of rescuing the Islamic world from the temptation of a new metaphysics. By incorporating modern science—which is essentially "open," disinterested, relativist, endowed with a power of acceleration that communicates to spirits, to technologies and to industries—Islam binds itself to universal dialogue, ties itself to contacts and communications between men and their groups, enables itself to assure the extension and deepening of the “existence together” that is characteristic of our historic epoch, to favor “the opening of closed doctrines, closed institutions, and closed groups,”[489] to help to liberate itself from the excesses of subjectivism and of traditional dogmatisms. The accomplishment of the new responsibilities of Islam demands reconciliation with a science once again modest and comprehensive....

* For a New Islamic Culture

Any Islamic renovation worthy of the name must make Islamic culture more than a “culture-ornament,” but an operative culture which allies production and belief in being; more than a culture-affirmation, better than a culture-heritage, but a “culture-opening on the whole of the real of the becoming”; a culture which turns towards reconciliation, which becomes a place where each has the possibility of “meeting the man” in the other; a culture which would be in accord with a world in evolution where man knows how to live for something other than what he makes, for other beings who he is[490]; a culture, finally, which would have the will to center the new society on man and his double vocation, historic and transhistoric, which returns, in sum, to a theory of man as the inevitable philosophical immediacy.

To pose the problem of a culture of creation and of metaphysical fidelity, that is to say, the whole problem of humanism, in the face of classical humanism, is to pose the problem of means, the problem of new men, the emergence of new structures and mentalities, the reestablishment of equilibrium between the new culture and the new nature, between the historic conscience and the semantic conscience, the junction between “a certain modernity” and “a certain tradition”: it is the instrument, the technology of the awaited revolution. It presupposes a new pedagogy, a new spirit, appealing to innovation, generating curiosity and disagreement, developing the taste for research, drawing its themes from history and elaborating them; a pedagogy freed from criticism considered as an end in itself, freed from this sort of “hierotropism” that polarizes thought, invests it wholly in religious sciences, which disparages the natural world to exalt only the supernatural world; a pedagogy that puts an end to the dichotomy of Islamic culture in order to create a unified culture thanks to cultural values, unified, notably in the domain of language, of literature, and of art, where the two worlds coexist, ignoring one another. The new education—essentially unifying, formative, permanent, creative—will have as its home the school: the school open to all; the University: the University open to all; but also the workshop, the factory, the fields, the cooperatives; penetrating in all milieux, everywhere introducing progress, that is to say, the spirit of invention and the spirit of truth, thus rendering the entire society educational, pedagogical. It will be the education of the teacher as much as the student, education of the teacher himself, who must make for himself a new mentality in order to be in a position to renovate his teaching, to invent a new dialect of teacher to student, transforming this teaching in a “possibility of future teachings and diverse communications,”[491] to accept, by means of inevitable ruptures, the innovations that permit survival while modifying the system. If it [education] remains committed to tolerance, it will not proclaim itself neutral for long, it will be openly normative in order to be faithful to the wager implied by the culture that it has a mission to dispense: it will teach, along with the sense of the historic, the sense of the technological, the living tradition, confronting it with life in order to make it bear fruit, the language of signs and symbols. When necessary, it will defend the social semantic, both against the excesses of contemporary formalist exegesis and against “the historicizing or idealist references of the traditional modes of thought” (Jacques Berque [1910–1995]). It will make Islamic culture a fertile and original synthesis in realizing the reconciliation of man’s being and nature’s being, that violated and disfigured nature which must become “the garden of causes and effects” but also grace, communion, “the proximity of the cosmic.” The new education, in order to be the instrument of a culture-opening on the world, will teach, finally, worldliness, universality, but not without attending to the creation of a distinct personality, to the affirmation of the specificity that makes sense of the response of Islamic society to history. Insofar as it is revealed as capable of accommodating all of human existence, of founding a personality that is flexible and available in a “mobile world,” the new education will accomplish its creative and universalizing mission.

To win the combat of the new humanism, that is, the real combat of history, contemporary Islam definitely has nothing to lose at the level of fundamentals: at the level of the infrastructure which in this dialectic is nothing but metaphysics. But if words have meaning, if to restore is something other than adding block to block, superimposing superstructures, but making anew that which is at the same time authentic, then, it will have to resolve to replace the ancient edifice by a new, reconstructed elaboration on the fundamentals. It is more than a reform, it is a revolution in the structures of the Islamic world that the triumph of humanism, and the pursuit by Islam of its earthly responsibilities, demand. After the revolution against the Other, which was nothing but a revolt, a negation, the revolution against the Self, the real revolution: that of the positivity of the second birth, which has a constructive mission. To design itself less for desacralization than for demanding that the sacred integrate the human and the new; to renounce the transformation of Islam into a fundamentalist (integree) religion in favor of re-making an integrating religion, companion of man and world; to propose to Islam, mobilizing the creative power of the Qur'an, a new finality on the scale of our universe, instead of absolving it of its temporal mission, which is inseparable from its spiritual mission. To make of the world of Islam (dar al-Islam) an immense people and a vast chorus, a Temple where each servant of the Cult is also a creator, a Promethean hero; to make a world of objectification and adoration at the same time, a land of having and being where each act of production is an act of surpassing which returns to a dialect of verticality, significance, and creativity—such is the profound sense of the new challenge that Islam must face in order to respond to the hopes of400 million men and women. Through the boiling that is agitating the Islamic world, through the proliferation of experiences and attempts, even aborted ones, something is giving a sign that, though it be still a stammer, is unmistakable in its meaning: a "yes," poorly articulated, but absolute and definitive.

 31. Islam and Modernity

Fazlur Rahman

Fazlur Rahman (Pakistan-United States, 1919–1988) was born and raised in the British colonies that would later become Pakistan. He embarked on an academic career that took him to graduate degrees at Punjab University and Oxford and teaching positions in Islamic philosophy in England and Canada. He returned to Pakistan in 1961 to lead the Central Institute of Islamic Research in Karachi, a state-sponsored organization that Rahman mobilized to battle religious traditionalists and radicals. Rahman's modernist views were controversial: "his detractors referred to him as 'the destroyer of hadiths [traditions of the Prophet] because of his insistence on judging the weight of hadith reports in light of the overall spirit of the Qur'an."[492] Rahman returned to academia in 1968 as a professor at the University of Chicago, where he continued to argue for a modern reinterpretation of Islam.[493] "A measure of this leading thinker's impact," a colleague wrote after Rahman's death in 1988, "is that wherever I have traveled in the world ... I have never met a Muslim scholar or other specialist on Islam who has not heard of Fazlur Rahman or who is neutral about his contributions."[494]

Muhammad Shibli Nu'mani [Islamic reformer, India, died 1914] wrote in his Safarnama [Travelogue] (his own account of his visit to the Middle East, May-October 1892), after talking about the potential benefits of the Dar al-'Ulum [university] at Cairo, "But those people who have been once as much as touched by traditional education, remain forever irreconcilably estranged from modern learning."[495] In the same work he quotes Muhammad 'Abduh [Egyptian modernist, 1849–1905] as saying to him, after bemoaning the plight of al-Azhar [University in Cairo], about the Egyptian products of Western education, "These are even more misguided."[496] This dilemma that characterized education in the days of Shibli and 'Abduh in the "forward" lands of Islam—lands that had a highly developed traditional education as well as a recently adopted modern Western-style education—is, as the preceding pages have demonstrated, still as real today. The reason is that, despite a widespread and sometimes deep consciousness of the dichotomy of education, all efforts at a genuine integration have so far been largely unfruitful.

Let us first analyze more closely the basic features of the attempts at reforming education insofar as Islam is concerned. There are basically two aspects of this reformist orientation. One approach is to accept modern secular education as it has developed generally speaking in the West and to attempt to “Islamize” it—that is, to inform it with certain key concepts of Islam. This approach has had two distinct goals, although they are not always distinguished from one another: first, to mold the character of students with Islamic values for individual and collective life, and, second, to enable the adepts of modern education to imbue their respective fields of learning at higher levels, using an Islamic perspective to transform, where necessary, both the content and the orientation of these fields. The two goals are closely connected in the sense that molding character with Islamic values is naturally undertaken basically at the primary level of education when students are young and impressionable. However, if nothing is done to imbue fields of higher learning with an Islamic orientation, or if attempts to do so are unsuccessful, when young boys and girls reach the higher stages of education their outlook is bound to be secularized, or they are very likely to shed whatever Islamic orientation they have had— which has been happening on a large scale.

“Imbuing higher fields of learning with Islamic values” is a phrase whose meaning must be made more precise. All human knowledge may be divided into what are called “natural” or exact sciences, whose generalizations are called “laws of nature,” and the fields of learning that have been called “humanities” and “social sciences.” Although the content of physical or exact sciences cannot by definition be interfered with—else they will be falsified—their orientation can be given a value character. Sometimes certain mistaken ideological attitudes try to interfere with the content of these sciences as well, as, for example, when Stalin ordered Russian biologists to emphasize the influence of environment at the expense of heredity. Under such influences or pressures, science must become a mockery, but it is possible and highly desirable for a scientist to know the consequences his investigations have for mankind. It is also equally and, indeed, urgently important for scientific knowledge to be a unity and to give an overall picture of the universe in order to answer the all-important questions, “Does it mean anything? Does it point to a higher will and purpose?” Or is it, to use Whitehead’s famous words, “a mere hurrying of material endlessly, meaninglessly”? The first is a practical question, the second a “theoretical” one but with obvious practical implications.

Social sciences and humanities are obviously relevant to values, and values are relevant to them. This is of course not to say that they are subjective, although subjectivism often does enter into them, sometimes palpably. But to be value-oriented is certainly not by itself to be subjective, provided values do not remain mere assumptions but are “objectified.” Although metaphysical speculation is the area of human intellectual endeavor that is perhaps the remotest from factual objectivity, yet it need not be, as [F.H.] Bradley [English philosopher, 1846–1924] put it, “the finding of bad reasons for what we already believe on instinct.” If metaphysics enjoys the least freedom from assumed premises, man enjoys the least freedom from metaphysics in that metaphysical beliefs are the most ultimate and pervasively relevant to human attitudes; it is consciously or unconsciously the source of all values and of the meaning we attach to life itself. It is therefore all-important that this very ground of formation of our attitudes be as much informed as possible. Positivism may be negative enough to dismiss it as “meaningless”; yet positivism had rendered great service to a genuine metaphysics by exploding the empty thought shell in which the greatest human minds used to incarcerate themselves. Metaphysics, in my understanding, is the unity of knowledge and the meaning and orientation this unity gives to life. If this unity is the unity of knowledge, how can it be all that subjective? It is a faith grounded in knowledge.

There has not been much by way of an Islamic metaphysics, at least in modern times. In the medieval centuries there were Muslim metaphysicians, some of them brilliant, original, and influential; but the primary basis of their entire Weltanschauung [worldview] was Hellenic thought, not the Qur’an. Some of their doctrines were repugnant to the orthodoxy, which took such fright that down the centuries all metaphysical thought became anathema to it. Among the orthodox there has not been a lack of men of deep insight, but there has been no systematic and coherent body of metaphysical thought fully informed by the Qur’anic Weltanschauung, which is itself remarkably coherent. In modern times, Muhammad Iqbal’s Reconstruction of Religious Thought in Islam[497] is the only systematic attempt. But, despite the fact that Iqbal had certain basic and rare insights into the nature of Islam as an attitude to life, this work cannot be said to be based on Qur’anic teaching: the structural elements of its thought are too contemporary to be an adequate basis for an ongoing Islamic metaphysical endeavor (although I certainly disagree with H.A.R. Gibb’s assessment according to which Ash’arite theology, for example, is more faithful to the Qur’anic matrix of ideas than Iqbal’s thought). What is true is that Iqbal’s thought, like all modern liberal thought, is essentially a personal effort, while [Abu’l-Hasan] Ash’ari’s [873–935] theology, as a credal system, consisted of certain formal principles that he claimed to have drawn from the Qur’an and on the basis of which he elaborated a full- fledged theological system. But, besides the question whether a modern outlook can have room for hard-and-fast and cut-and-dried formal creeds, this does not mean that Ash’arite theology represented Islam more faithfully than did Iqbal; on the contrary, that theology represents, in my view, an almost total distortion of Islam and was, in fact, a one-sided and extreme reaction to the Mu’tazilite rationalist theology.

However, to resume what I was saying about the Muslims’ aim of Islamizing the several fields of learning, this aim cannot be really fulfilled unless Muslims effectively perform the intellectual task of elaborating an Islamic metaphysics on the basis of the Qur’an. An overall worldview of Islam has to be first, if provisionally, attempted if various specific fields of intellectual endeavor are to cohere as informed by Islam. In medieval Islam, even if Ash’arite theology was Islamically wayward, it certainly tried—sometimes with remarkable efficiency—to permeate the intellectual disciplines of Islam, like law, Sufism, and even the outlook on history. In modern times, however, although many Muslims are conscious of the desirability and even necessity of investing factual knowledge with Islamic values, the result is so far perhaps less than negligible—although there is no dearth of booklets and pamphlets on “Islam and this” and “Islam and that,” which occasionally do contain valuable insights and often a good deal of ingenuity but are essentially marred by an apologetic attitude. More recently, a number of conferences and seminars have been held in Saudi Arabia and Pakistan (the former’s latter-day spiritual client) on such topics as “Islam and Education,” “Islam and Economics,” or “Islam and Psychology.” I have not seen any publications so far, if any have resulted from this feverish activity. One cannot, of course, expect any spectacular results as yet, but the effort is worth continuing.

I said earlier that the effort to inculcate an Islamic character in young students is not likely to succeed if the higher fields of learning remain completely secular, that is, unpurposeful with regard to their effect on the future of mankind. Indeed, even in the West, attempts at molding young students' character have failed because when these boys and girls grow up they find all life around them practically secular, and they become disillusioned with their childhood orientation, which comes to seem a kind of "pious fraud." In fact, they often grow up with a vengeance and, barring other factors to the contrary, become more secular-minded than their parents. The same is very much true of Muslim children, although in Muslim society the social temper still plays a major role in curbing open deviations and utter secularization. But if moral values are to be observed or at least not flouted under social pressure, this hardly goes altogether to the credit of the efficacy of the Islamic spirit. We shall have to come back later to this all-important issue; in the meantime, we must discuss the problem of what is meant by reforming Islamic education itself since, unless some solution to this is forthcoming, it is futile even to raise the question of the Islamization of knowledge: it is the upholders of Islamic learning who have to bear the primary responsibility of Islamizing secular knowledge by their creative intellectual efforts.

In essence, then, the whole problem of "modernizing" Islamic education, that is, rendering it capable of creative Islamic intellectual productivity in all fields of intellectual endeavor together with the serious commitment to Islam that the madrasa system has generally been able to impart, is the problem of expanding the Muslim's intellectual vision by raising his intellectual standards. For expansion of vision is a function of rising to heights; the lower down you come the less space you can see, and the more you think yourself master of that little space under your narrow vision. And here appears the stark contrast between the actual Muslim attitudes and the demands of the Qur'an. The Qur'an sets a very high value on knowledge, and the Prophet himself is ordered to pray to God: "O Lord! increase my knowledge." (Sura 20, Verse 114) Indeed, the Qur'an itself is firmly of the view that the more knowledge one has, the more capable of faith and commitment one will be. There is absolutely no other view of the relationship of faith and knowledge that one can legitimately derive from the Qur'an. It is true that the Qur'an is highly critical, for example, of Meccan tradesmen who “know well the externalities of the lower (that is, material) life but are heedless of its ends.” (Sura 30, Verse 7) But this is precisely the point I am making here—that a knowledge that does not expand the horizons of one’s vision and action is truncated and injurious knowledge. But how can one have knowledge of the “ends” of life—that is, of higher values—without knowing actual reality? If the Muslim modernist has done nothing else, he has adduced such formidable evidence from the Qur’an for the absolute necessity to faith of a knowledge of the universe, of man, and of history, that all Muslims today at least pay lip service to it.

But, by contrast, the Muslim attitude to knowledge in the later medieval centuries is so negative that if one puts it beside the Qur’an one cannot help being appalled. According to this attitude, higher knowledge and faith are mutually dysfunctional and increase at each other’s expense. Knowledge thus appears to be purely secular, as is basically the case with all “modern” positive knowledge—indeed, even modern “religious” knowledge is secular, or else it is considered positively injurious to faith. Sometimes an arbitrary distinction is drawn between “religious” and “nonreligious” sciences; the former have, of course, to be acquired at the expense of the latter. Sometimes a distinction is drawn between the “more urgent” knowledge—that of law and/or theological propositions—and “the less urgent or less important” positive sciences. And often enough, indeed, a distinction is drawn between “good” knowledge and “bad” knowledge, for example, of philosophy or music, while a third category is posited of more or less “useless” knowledge such as mathematics. There are several causes of these pernicious distinctions. One of these I have already pointed out, namely, the fear of philosophy and of intellectualism in general. Another important reason certainly was, as I indicated in chapter 2 [not included in this excerpt], that a knowledge of orthodox disciplines, particularly of law, was an almost sure passport to employment, whereas mathematics or astronomy brought little by way of a livelihood, let alone of fame, and medicine was accepted as a necessary though inferior endeavor. [Abu Hamid Muhammad] Al-Ghazzali [10581111], in his criticism of a slogan of medical men—“First [attend to] your body and then [to] your religion [or soul]”—typifies the medieval orthodox attitude to medicine when he says that by such catchy slogans these people want to deceive the simpleminded public as to the real order of priorities.

Whatever the reason, the stark contrast between the Qur’an and the medieval Muslim pursuits of knowledge is obvious. During approximately the past one hundred years ... Muslims have displayed an increasing awareness of reforming traditional education and integrating the old knowledge with the modern. But this development has been marred by certain important, indeed, fundamental weaknesses that it is essential to elucidate before we can look at the future with greater clarity and a more constructive outlook. The first important block to any reform is the phenomenon I have called neorevivalism or neofundamentalism. Before the advent of classical modernism, there had existed a revivalism or fundamentalism since the 18th century. The “Wahhabi” movement [in Arabia] and other kindred or parallel reform phenomena wanted to reconstruct Islamic spirituality and morality on the basis of a return to the pristine “purity” of Islam. The current post-modernist fundamentalism, in an important way, is novel because its basic elan is anti-Western (and, by implication of course, anti-Westernism). Hence its condemnation of classical modernism as a purely Westernizing force. Classical modernists were, of course, not all of a piece, and it is true that some of these modernists went to extremes in their espousal of Western thought, morality, society, and so on. Such phenomena are neither unexpected nor unnatural when rapid change occurs, particularly when it derives from a living source like the West. But just as the classical modernist had picked upon certain specific issues to be considered and modernist positions to be adopted thereupon—democracy, science, status of women, and such—so now the neofundamentalist, after—as I said before—borrowing certain things from classical modernism, largely rejected its content and, in turn, picked upon certain specific issues as “Islamic” par excellence and accused the classical modernist of having succumbed to the West and having sold Islam cheaply there. The pet issues with the neofundamentalist are the ban on bank interest, the ban on family planning, the status of women (contra the modernist), collection of zakat taxes, and so forth—things that will most distinguish Muslims from the West. Thus, while the modernist was engaged by the West through attraction, the neorevivalist is equally haunted by the West through repulsion. The most important and urgent thing to do from this point of view is to “disengage” mentally from the West and to cultivate an independent but understanding attitude toward it, as toward any other civilization, though more particularly to the West because it is the source of much of the social change occurring throughout the world. So long as Muslims remain mentally locked with the West in one way or the other, they will not be able to act independently and autonomously.

The neorevivalist has undoubtedly served as a corrective not only for several types of excesses in classical modernism but, above all, for secularist trends that would otherwise have spread much faster in Muslim societies. That is to say, neorevivalism has reoriented the modern-educated lay Muslim emotionally toward Islam. But the greatest weakness of neorevivalism, and the greatest disservice it has done to Islam, is an almost total lack of positive effective Islamic thinking and scholarship within its ranks, its intellectual bankruptcy, and its substitution of cliche mongering for serious intellectual endeavor. It has often contended, with a real point, that the learning of the conservative traditional ‘ulama’, instead of turning Muslims toward the Qur’an, has turned them away from it. But its own way of turning to the Qur’an has been no more than, as I said above, picking upon certain selected issues whereby it could crown itself by “distinguishing” Muslims from the rest of the world, particularly from the West. The traditionalist ‘ulama’, if their education has suffered from a disorientation toward the purposes of the Qur’an, have nevertheless built up an imposing edifice of learning that invests their personalities with a certain depth; the neorevivalist is, by contrast, a shallow and superficial person—really rooted neither in the Qur’an nor in traditional intellectual culture, of which he knows practically nothing. Because he has no serious intellectual depth or breadth, his consolation and pride both are to chant ceaselessly the song that Islam is “very simple” and “straightforward,” without knowing what these words mean. In a sense, of course, the Qur’an is simple and uncomplicated, as is all genuine religion—in contradistinction to theology—but in another and more meaningful sense a book like the Qur’an, which gradually appeared over almost twenty-three years, is highly complicated—as complicated as life itself. The essence of the matter is that the neorevivalist has produced no Islamic educational system worthy of the name, and this is primarily because, having become rightly dissatisfied with much of the traditional learning of the ‘ulama’, he himself has been unable to devise any methodology, any structural strategy, for understanding Islam or for interpreting the Qur’an.

Second, the reform efforts that have taken place so far have been in two directions. In one direction, this reform has occurred almost entirely within the framework of traditional education itself. Generated largely by the premodernist reform phenomena whose impetus still continues to some extent, this reform has tended to “simplify” the traditional syllabus, which it finds heavily loaded with “extraneous” materials such as medieval theology, certain branches of philosophy (such as logic), and a plethora of works on Islamic law. This simplification consists in dropping most or all works in these medieval disciplines and accentuating hadith [traditions of the Prophet], occasionally Arabic language and literature, and, in certain cases, principles of Qur’anic interpretation (but not the Qur’an—that is, its text—as such), in consistency with the religious ideology of these premodernist reformist movements that aimed to “purify” Islam from later accretions. This is confirmed by the developments concerning the subcontinent that I sketched out toward the end of chapter 1 [not included in this excerpt].

In the second direction, a variety of developments have occurred that can be summed up by saying that they all represent an effort to combine and integrate the modern branches of learning with the old ones. In such cases, the years of curriculum have been extended and brought in line with the curricular span of modern schools and colleges, or, as I noted for Indonesia, supplemented by afternoon classes held after the modern lay education of the present-day schools—thus lengthening the day rather than increasing the number of curricular years. At the college level, however, even in the Indonesian experiment, the effort is directed at combining modern subjects with the old.

The most important of these experiments are undoubtedly those of al-Azhar of Egypt and the new system of Islamic education introduced in Turkey since the late 1940s. Al-Azhar has behind it a long tradition of medieval Islamic learning, and therefore, understandably, its conservatism in the field of religious studies is still very strong. Consequently, the modern subjects like philosophy, sociology, and psychology do not seem to have a deep impact, since they essentially trail behind the medieval learning. In Turkey, on the other hand, where traditional education had been completely destroyed, it is being reintroduced afresh, while the modern disciplines are almost at the same level as in the lay schools—indeed, all over in the developing countries. Turkey is fortunate in having to make a fresh start because it has the opportunity to interpret the medieval intellectual heritage and give it a new shape—which, as we shall see presently, is a basic desideratum in all current attempts to integrate the modern and the traditional and which has been satisfied only to a limited degree at al-Azhar in the fields of theology and law.

At present, the “integration” I spoke of above is basically absent because of the largely mechanical character of instruction and because ofjuxtaposition of the old with the new. It is true that all these reforms are confronted with a vicious circle in that, on the one hand, unless adequate teachers are available with minds already integrated and creative, instruction will remain sterile even given goodwill and talent on the part of students, while, on the other, such teachers cannot be produced on a sufficient scale unless, substantively speaking, an integrated curriculum is made available. This vicious circle can be broken only at the first point—if there come into being some first- class minds who can interpret the old in terms of the new as regards substance and turn the new into the service of the old as regards ideals. This, then, must be followed by the writing of new textbooks on theology, ethics, and so forth. Such minds cannot be produced at will, but something can certainly be done in this respect—namely, to recruit from the best talent available and to provide the necessary incentives for a committed intellectual career in this field. Today, most of the students who are attracted to this field are those who have failed to gain entrance to more lucrative careers. This shows how little awareness there is that creating minds is both more difficult and, in the last analysis, more urgent than constructing bridges. There is little doubt that most Eastern societies have been laboring under the false and totally self-deceptive impression that they suffer from an over-plenitude of spirituality and spiritual insights while the West, barren in this respect, has outstripped them in material technology and that now they need only get the latter. That the West has outstripped the East in science and technology is correct; what seems to be a fiction is that the East is replete with spirituality, for, if this were so, why should the East—or the Muslim societies—suffer from the mental and spiritual dichotomy of which I have mainly been speaking here?

Second, an important problem that has plagued Muslim societies since the dawn of democracy in them is the peculiar relationship of religion and politics and the pitiable subjugation of the former to the latter. Indeed, it was this pernicious phenomenon that forced Kemal Ataturk [founder of modern Turkey, 1881–1938] to opt for secularism. Secularism is not the answer—quite the opposite. But the politics being waged most of the time in these countries is hardly less pernicious in its effects than secularism itself. For, instead of setting themselves to genuinely interpret Islamic goals to be realized through political and government channels—which would subjugate politics to interpreted Islamic values (whether these values or goals turn out to be conservative or liberal, fundamentalist or modern for different parties) — what happens most of the time is a ruthless exploitation of Islam for party politics and group interests that subjects Islam not only to politics but to day-to-day politics; Islam thus becomes sheer demagoguery. Unfortunately, the so-called Islamic parties in several countries are the most blatantly guilty of such systematic political manipulation of religion. The slogan “in Islam religion and politics are inseparable” is employed to dupe the common man into accepting that, instead of politics or the state serving the long-range objectives of Islam, Islam should come to serve the immediate and myopic objectives of party politics. Reform and reconstruction of that powerful instrument for the shaping of minds—education—is inconceivable in these circumstances. The secularist, who is in any case already alienated from Islam, becomes all the more confirmed in his cynicism about men of religion, the dislocation between their aims and their claims, even though secularism itself may be a child of incurable cynicism about man’s real nature.

And yet the most important single channel of both these latter reforms—the correct envisioning of priorities and the saving of religion from the vagaries of day-to-day politics—is education itself. I must therefore turn to a consideration of the possible solution to the problems I have raised in the field of the reform of Islamic education itself: how it can become meaningful in the modern intellectual and spiritual setting, not so much to save religion from modernity—which is, after all, only a partisan interest—but to save modern man from himself through religion.

 Some Considerations Toward a Solution

* Toward an Understanding of Islam

The first essential step to relieve the vicious circle just mentioned is, for the Muslim, to distinguish clearly between normative Islam and historical Islam. Unless effective and sustained efforts are made in this direction, there is no way visible for the creation of the kind of Islamic mind I have been speaking ofjust now. No amount of mechanical juxtaposition of old and new subjects and disciplines can produce this kind of mind. If the spark for the modernization of old Islamic learning and for the Islamization of the new is to arise, then the original thrust of Islam—of the Qur'an and Muhammad—must be clearly resurrected so that the conformities and deformities of historical Islam may be clearly judged by it. In the first chapter I indicated by what process this normative Islam had understandably, perhaps inevitably, but often by no means justifiably passed into its historical forms. In that chapter I also indicated how this resurrection may be accomplished—namely, by studying the Qur'an's social pronouncements and legal enactments in the light of its general moral teaching and particularly under the impact of its stated objectives (or principles, if one prefers this expression) on the one hand and against the background of their historical-social milieu on the other. Since this method has been made fairly clear in that chapter and particularly in the Introduction, there is no need to repeat it here, but certain other questions concerning it must be answered.

Is this method not yet another form of fundamentalism that will once again, in a new and more "scientific" way, create another idol to arrest Muslims' forward progress? After all, all fundamentalists, like the Wahhabis and subsequently their neofundamentalist successors such as the Ikhwan [Muslim Brotherhood], have just said this, namely, that Muslims must go back to the original and pristine Islam; yet they have been arrested at a certain point. Again, the Muslim modernist has also explicitly held that Muslims must go back to the original and pristine Islam; yet they have come up with certain doctrines that both the fundamentalist and the conservative have failed to recognize as Islamic—indeed, as anything but Western, that is, un-Islamic! What is, then the guarantee, or at least the likelihood, that the pursuit of the new solution will not be arrested at a certain point, or that the results reached will not be so bewilderingly chaotic and contradictory?

The answer is that neither the fundamentalist nor the modernist had a clear enough method. That fundamentalist movements in Islam have been arrested is not due to their claims, for they claimed ijtihad, that is, new thinking in Islam. How can anyone arrest new thought, particularly when it is claimed that the essence of the Islamic thought process rests on ijtihad? Actually it is even something of a misnomer to call such phenomena in Islam "fundamentalist" except insofar as they emphasize the basis of Islam as being the two original sources: the Qur’an and the sunna [practice] of the Prophet Muhammad. Otherwise they emphasize ijtihad, original thought, which is something forbidden by Western fundamentalists who, while emphasizing the Bible as the “fundament,” reject original or new thought. It is also something of an irony to pit the so-called Muslim fundamentalists against the Muslim modernists, since, so far as their acclaimed procedure goes, the Muslim modernists say exactly the same thing as the so-called Muslim fundamentalists say: that Muslims must go back to the original and definitive sources of Islam and perform ijtihad on that basis.

To resume my answer to this important question: the so-called fundamentalists and modernists have come up with radically different answers to some basic issues according to their respective environments, but neither has had a clear enough method of interpreting the Qur’an and the sunna. As I pointed out in the previous section, the neorevivalist has no method worthy of the name except to react, on certain important social issues, to the classical modernist. I also pointed out earlier that the classical modernist had no method except to treat ad hoc issues that seemed to him to require solution for Muslim society but that were historically of Western inspiration and that he attempted to solve, often with remarkable plausibility, in the light of Qur’anic teaching. As for the premodernist revivalist, he had certainly worked within the traditional perimeters of Islam and had found that Muslim individual and collective life had become permeated with degrading superstitions that, according to the Qur’anic monotheism, were a form of shirk [polytheism] and must therefore be eradicated. This was undoubtedly sound, but for the rest the premodernist revivalist neither had nor bothered to seek a methodology of Qur’anic interpretation that would be sound in scholarship, rationally reliable, and faithful to the Qur’an itself.

Although the method I have advocated here is new in form, nevertheless its elements are all traditional. It is the biographers of the Prophet, the hadith collectors, the historians, and the Qur’an commentators who have preserved for us the general social-historical background of the Qur’an and the Prophet’s activity and in particular the background (sha’n alnuzul) of the particular passages of the Qur’an—despite the divergence of accounts about the latter in some cases. This would surely not have been done but for their strong belief that this background is necessary for our understanding of the Qur’an. It is strange, however, that no systematic attempt has ever been made to understand the Qur’an in the order in which it was revealed, that is, by setting the specific cases of the shu’un al-nuzul, or “occasions of revelation,” in some order in the general background that is no other than the activity of the Prophet (the sunna in the proper sense) and its social environment. If this method is pursued, most arbitrary and fanciful interpretations will at once be ruled out, since a definite enough anchoring point will be available. It is only because the Qur’an was not treated as a coherent whole by many Muslim thinkers that the metaphysical part, which should form the necessary backdrop to a coherent elaboration of the moral, social, and legal message of the Qur’an, in particular received the wildest interpretations at the hands of the so-called esoteric school, be they Sufis, Batinis, philosophers, or even some mutakallimun (theologians), while the majority of the orthodox became dusty-dry literalists far removed from any genuine insight into the depths of the Qur’an. The Qur’an, despite its distinction within its own body of “firm” and “ambiguous” verses (Sura 3, Verse 7)—which has been made so much of by several speculative minds, but which seems to refer to verses of specific and general import—categorically states in numerous places that it is coherent and that it is free from inconsistencies—a claim that is well attested by any closer study of it, which is not vitiated by extravagant preconceived notions (for example, Sura 11, Verse 11; Sura 22, Verse 52; Sura 4, Verse 82; and all such verses where the Qur’an speaks of itself as tafsil, that is, a “firm exposition”). Indeed, Sura 3, Verse 7 itself strongly suggests—and it has very often been so interpreted—that the “ambiguous” verses are to be taken in the light of, although in turn as being matricial to, the “firm” ones.

Yet none of this means that any significant interpretation of the Qur’an can be absolutely monolithic. Nothing could be further from the truth. For one thing, we know from numerous reports that the Prophet’s Companions themselves sometimes understood certain Qur’anic verses differently, and this was within his knowledge. Further, the Qur’an, as I have often reiterated, is a document that grew within a background, from the flesh and blood of actual history; it is therefore both as “straightforward” and as organically coherent as life itself. Any attempt to take it with a literalist, partialist superficiality and lifeless rigidity will, to use A.J. Arberry’s phrase, “crush its gossamer wings to powder.” For example, on the question of murder, the Qur’an essentially confirms the pre-Islamic Arab forms of settlement either by blood money or by “life for life,” adding that forgiveness is better. From this, all our lawyers deduced the principle that murder is a private crime against the bereaved family, which has therefore to decide whether the murderer will be forgiven, whether he should pay for the murder in money, or whether he should be killed in revenge. However, the Qur’an also enunciates a more general principle stating that “whosoever kills a person unrightfully or without a mischief (that is, a war) on the earth, it is as though he has killed all humanity; while he who saves one person, it is as though he has saved all humanity” (Sura 5, Verse 32), which obviously makes murder a crime against society rather than a private crime against a family. But our lawyers never brought this verse to bear on the issue of murder.

To insist on absolute uniformity of interpretation is therefore neither possible nor desirable. What is important is first of all to use the kind of method I am advocating to eliminate vagrant interpretations. For the rest, every interpreter must explicitly state his general assumptions with regard to Qur’anic interpretation in general and specific assumptions and premises with regard to specific issues or passages. Once his assumptions are made explicit, then discussion among differing interpreters is possible and subjectivity is further reduced. But the kinds of differences about the conception of God—whether he is the ground of the being that manifests itself through every existent and is therefore to be contemplated, or whether he is the ultimate and transcendent principle that has simply to be established and “proved” like a mathematical formula, or whether he is the creator-commander who has to be worshipped and obeyed, and so forth—should surely be capable of being sorted out for public and collective life at least, leaving scope for private idiosyncrasies, which in any case cannot cease.

Such interpretive attempts can be made by individual scholars, but they can obviously be made by teamwork as well. What is certain is that there have to be several attempts so that, through discussion and debate, the community at large can accept some interpretations and discard others. It is obviously not necessary that a certain interpretation once accepted must continue to be accepted; there is always both room and necessity for new interpretations, for this is, in truth, an ongoing process. But such bona fide attempts by competent scholars are, as I said before, the only way to break the vicious circle of “where to start” the process of reform in Islamic education. For the first logical step now is the creation of new intellectual materials, since the mechanical part of the process of reform in terms of combining old and new subjects in new reformed schools or setting up afternoon Islamic schools to supplement the morning “regular schools” is by now well underway in virtually all Muslim lands.

Nor is this first step impossible to achieve. The greatest difficulty that will be experienced is not the new step itself but extricating one’s feet from the stagnant waters of the old Qur’anic exegesis, which may contain many pearls but which, on the whole, impedes rather than promotes a real understanding of the Qur’an. Qur’an commentaries are, of course, not all of the same value, some being purely subjective distortions, others of real importance in providing both insight and historical information; but the approach being advocated herein is new—although, as I said before, its elements are all in the tradition itself. The new step simply consists in studying the Qur’an in its total and specific background (and doing this study systematically in a historical order), not just studying it verse by verse or passage by passage with an isolated “occasion of revelation” (sha’n al-nuzul).

 Reconstruction of the Islamic Sciences

 The Historical Period

The proposition that the shari’a [Islamic] law and institutions have to be derived methodically and systematically from the Qur’an and the example of the Prophet (i.e., his total performance) in the manner described above does not mean that Islamic sciences, as they have originated and developed historically, have to be ignored or discarded. Indeed, they cannot be ignored or discarded for certain basic reasons. First of all, it is historic Islam that gives continuity to the intellectual and spiritual being of the community. No community can annul its past and hope to create a future being for itself—as that community. A basic fallacy of an Ataturkish kind of “reform” consists precisely in an effort to shed the historical being of the community and to seek a future without it. It is important, however, to understand precisely the meaning of what I am saying, which is not that we should necessarily go slow with reform through gradual steps by a process of partial and ad hoc adjustments. My argument has been, in fact, against an ad hoc policy, because, whatever its practical wisdom (which is dubious), it necessarily distorts vision by making it myopic. And it is, in any case, a policy Muslims can ill afford at the present juncture, since the gap between what is and what ought to be is much too great. It must also constantly be borne in mind that the Muslim community has developed over the centuries (say, since the tenth/eleventh) a temper whereby it can swallow small changes without perceptibly moving forward. The factor that has produced this tremendous digestive power can be called conservatism or the spirit of ijma’ (consensus), depending upon the point of view one chooses to adopt, but the fact remains that it is extremely difficult to move the community as a whole. If one studies the vast and rich juristic and speculative literature of Islam (even leaving out the protean Sufism), one finds startling, indeed, revolutionary ideas in the writings of men who were high “orthodox” authorities, but none of these have left any trace on the being of the community. Changes in the community have always occurred when the cumulative process has reached a stage of outburst that literally re-forms orthodoxy. For this reason also, I am against a partialist, patchy, slow adjustment approach.

The meaning of my proposition that historic formulations of Islam—juristic, theological, spiritual—can be neither ignored nor discarded consists of two parts. The first, as I just hinted above, is that if we took the Qur’an at this point of history, as though it had been revealed just now—for that is what discarding historical Islam would mean (from this perspective, the sunna or the performance of the Prophet himself serves, in part, as historical Islam for an understanding of the Qur’an)—we would not be able even to understand it. Religiously speaking, no doubt, the Qur’an has to be taken as though it were revealed to the conscience of every believer—and Sufis have sometimes taken this to an extreme—but it can be so revealed to the conscience of a believer only after it has been properly understood, which requires putting its legal and social enunciations in their historical setting. Besides, within historical Islam differences in religious attitude can be discerned, for, as I pointed out early in chapter 1, the Companions of the Prophet—his immediate audience—understood the Qur’an and the Prophet’s own performance more pragmatically than did the later generations, who increasingly became prisoners of their own principles, on the basis of which they elaborated the Qur’anic teaching. Such early history is also involved in our understanding of Islam, not in terms of accepting all of its content but as a general pragmatic guide.

The second part of the meaning of this proposition is that we must make a thorough study, a historically systematic study, of the development of Islamic disciplines. This has to be primarily a critical study that will show us on the screen, as it were, the career of Islam at the hands of Muslims. But in religious terms it will be finally judged by the criterion of the Qur’an itself—the Qur’an as we will have understood it by the procedure described above. The need for a critical study of our intellectual Islamic past is ever more urgent because, owing to a peculiar psychological complex we have developed vis-a-vis the West, we have come to defend that past as though it were our God. Our sensitivities to the various parts or aspects of this past, of course, differ, although almost all of it has become generally sacred to us. The greatest sensitivity surrounds the hadith, although it is generally accepted that, except the Qur’an, all else is liable to the corrupting hand of history. Indeed, a critique of hadith should not only remove a big mental block but should promote fresh thinking about Islam. Further, if a certain hadith is shown to be historically unsound, it need not be discarded, for it may contain a good principle, and a good principle, no matter where it comes from, should be adopted. This is not the place to go into details, which I have elaborated in chapter 2 ofmy Islamic Methodology in History (Karachi, 1965)....

* Systematic Reconstruction

 Theology.

A historical critique of theological developments in Islam is the first step toward a reconstruction of Islamic theology. This critique, as I said before, should reveal the extent of the dislocation between the worldview of the Qur’an and various schools of theological speculation in Islam and point the way toward a new theology. Leaving aside the various extravagant speculative theological doctrines of the Batinis (Muslim esotericists) and many Sufis, the opposing schools of “rational” (Mu’tazilite) and “traditionalist” (the Ash’arite) theology teach a student an effective lesson on this highly sensitive issue. While admitting that all theological formulations necessarily carry on their brows the dust of time, one still must demand that such formulations be faithful at least to the basic structure of ideas of the religion they claim to represent. But who would claim that the Mu’tazilite doctrines of the negation of attributes of God, of the necessity of excluding God’s power from the sphere of human actions and limiting it to the realm of nature, of denial of God’s forgiveness of sins, are faithful to the teaching of the Qur’an? And, even more so, who can claim that the Ash’arite reaction in terms of the doctrines of the omnipotence of God at the expense of all human power and will, of the purposelessness of divine commands and prohibitions, of making works essentially irrelevant to faith, of the denial of cause and effect, and, consequently, the elevation of atomism to the position of a cardinal principle of the Islamic creed was representative of the Qur’anic teaching on God, man, or nature? A system of theology may be logically coherent yet totally false to the religion it claims to formulate, for what can one say of a theological system that reigned supreme in the greater part of the Islamic world for the best part of a millennium and whose votaries—some of them august names in the history of Islamic thought like al-Ghazzali and [Fakhr al-Din] al-Razi [1149–1209]—vied with one another in producing ever fresh arguments to prove that man can be said “to act” only metaphysically, not really, since the only real “actor” is God?

It is to the credit of premodernist revivalism and modernism that they tried to undermine this thousand-year-old sacred folly and to invite Muslims back to the refreshing fountain of the Qur’an. But whereas premodernist fundamentalism was good at demolishing the choking prison and letting in fresh air, it refused to build any new edifice. Rather, it believed that all edifices are really prisons, or inevitably become so, and that religion is better off without a theology, which in its eyes amounted to a crime against religion. As for modernism, it has, for the most part, dealt with matters social and political issue by issue, not as a social or political philosophy. Democracy is Islamic, but concepts like human rights and social justice (which are certainly declared to be Islamic) are not much discussed; egalitarianism is emphasized, but its nature and limits, if any, do not come up as problems;

Islam has given women rights, but why and what kinds of rights and by what rationale are not clear. Most modernists are very reticent about a theology, a philosophy, a worldview. In Muhammad ‘Abduh’s work theology is minimal, although he did much to resurrect Mu’tazila-type rationalism; Sayyid Ahmad Khan [Indian modernist, 1817–1898] called desperately for a new kalam (theology) consonant with the requirements of the age and felt sure that, unless theology was reformulated afresh, Islam would be in real and grave danger—like all other religions. At his instance, Muhammad Shibli wrote two books in Urdu—a history of theology in Islam called ‘Ilm al-Kalam and a systematic theology called Kalam—wherein he attempted to restate arguments for God’s existence, prophethood, revelation, and such, relying heavily, like Sayyid Ahmad Khan himself, upon medieval Muslim philosophers like [Abu ‘All al-Husayn] Ibn Sina [1908–1037].

It was the philosopher-poet Muhammad Iqbal who essayed a new approach to Islamic theology in his Reconstruction of Religious Thought in Islam. Iqbal was a keen student of modern Western philosophy as well as of Islamic mysticism (essentially in Persian), but he was not a scholar of the Islamic theological tradition or of the Qur’an (which, however, he read a great deal for inspiration). Iqbal appears to me to have very rightly perceived that the basic impulse of the Qur’an was dynamic and action oriented—seeking to direct history on a spiritual value pattern and attempting to create a world order. As I said earlier, I do not accept the judgment of the late H.A.R. Gibb that one cannot consider Iqbal’s work even as a point of departure for building a new Islamic theology; it seems to me that Gibb was probably thinking in terms of a new system of Islamic credalformulae. It is, however, correct to say that Iqbal’s attempt is very much dated, since he took seriously his contemporary scientists who tried to prove a dynamic free will in man on the basis of the new subatomic scientific data, which they interpreted as meaning that the physical world was “free” of the chain of cause and effect! It is true too that Iqbal did not carry out any systematic inquiry into the teaching of the Qur’an but picked and chose from its verses—as he did with other traditional material—to prove certain theses at least some of which were the result of his general insight into the Qur’an but which, above all, seemed to him to suit most the contemporary needs of a stagnant Muslim society. He then expressed these theses in terms of such contemporary evolutionary theories as those of [Henri] Bergson [1859–1941] and [Alfred North] Whitehead [1861–1947]. My disagreement with Iqbal is therefore not over his concept of God—as the ultimate source of creative energy that can be appropriated by individuals and societies in certain ways—but with his formulation of this concept and the method by which he attempts to deduce it from the Qur’an.

This account further demonstrates the necessity of the procedure I have advocated for a systematic interpretation of the Qur’an. For the theological or metaphysical statements of the Qur’an, the specific revelational background is not necessary, as it is for its social-legal pronouncements, nor do the commentators usually give it, but certainly without a systematic study the Qur’anic worldview cannot emerge. It cannot be denied that any such interpretation will necessarily be influenced by contemporary modes of thought; this is also required in the sense that only in this way can the message of the Qur’an become relevant to the contemporary situation. But it is quite another thing to couch the Qur’anic message in terms of a particular theory, no matter how attractive, sensational, or popular it may seem—in fact, the more topical a theory is, the less suitable it is as a vehicle of expression of an eternal message. It is also possible that this is what Gibb meant by his critique of Iqbal, but then it is possible to separate Iqbal’s basic insights into the nature of Islam from the doctrines in terms of which he has formulated them.

 Law and ethics.

Muslim scholars have never attempted an ethics of the Qur’an, systematically or otherwise. Yet no one who has done any careful study of the Qur’an can fail to be impressed by its ethical fervor. Its ethics, indeed, is its essence, and it is also the necessary link between theology and law. It is true that the Qur’an tends to concretize the ethical, to clothe the general in a particular paradigm, and to translate the ethical into legal or quasi-legal commands. But it is precisely a sign of its moral fervor that it is not content only with generalizable ethical propositions but is keen on translating them into actual paradigms. However, as I have repeatedly pointed out, the Qur’an always explicates the objectives or principles that are the essence of its laws.

The Muslims’ failure to make a clear distinction between Qur’anic ethics and law has resulted in a contusion between the two. Neither ethics nor law ever became a discipline in itself. Islamic law, in fact, is not law in a modern sense; it is a treasure of legal materials thrown up during long centuries of endless discussions, upon which modern Islamic legal systems can certainly be built, but only a part of which could ever be enforced in court. No doubt the mixing together of law and morality gave a certain character to Islamic law that is uniquely precious—namely, it kept the moral motivation, without which any law must become a plaything of legal tricksters and manipulators, alive within the law. However, to keep law permeated with a living moral sense it is not necessary to ignore the distinction between the two, only to keep law organically related to morality, that is, to keep law Islamic and prevent its secularization.

The Qur’an calls itself “guidance for mankind” (hudan li’l-nas) and by the same term designates earlier revealed documents. Its central moral concept for man is taqwa, which is usually translated as “piety” or “God-fearingness” but which in the various Qur’anic contexts may be defined as “a mental state of responsibility from which an agent’s actions proceed but which recognizes that the criterion ofjudgment upon them lies outside him.” The whole business of the Qur’an appears to be centered on the attempt to induce such a state in man. The idea of a secular law, insofar as it makes this state indifferent to its obedience, which is consequently conceived in mechanical terms, is the very abnegation of taqwa. The increasingly chaotic state of affairs in Western societies and the gradual erosion of an inner sense of responsibility represent a complex situation, but this situation is undoubtedly linked with a process through which law ceased to maintain any organic relation to morality.

Nor is Islamic theology, for that matter, a case of pure intellectualism, unaffective and ineffective, a pure artificial construct that tries to vie with philosophy, which at least claims to start from assumptions of natural reason rather than from given dogmatic beliefs that it claims “to prove.” Islamic theology is certainly an intellectual endeavor, but it is so in the sense that it gives a coherent and faithful account of what is there in the Qur’an so that a believing person or a person prone to believe can give consent both from the mind and from the heart and make this world view his or her mental and spiritual home. Insofar as it provides that intellectual home for the mind, it can be taught; insofar as it provides a spiritual haven for the heart, it can be preached. A theology that can perform neither of these two functions is the stark bone of religion. Al-Ghazzali had long ago condemned the official “science of theology” because it was neither spiritually satisfying nor intellectually satisfactory—he called it the game of intellectual children! Yet this seems to be the fate of most historical theologies.

Just as preaching is an expression of theology for the heart, even so must it give rise to morality or an ethical value system to guide man and to instill in him the sense of moral responsibility that the Qur’an calls taqwa. A God that speaks neither to the intellect of man nor to his heart, nor yet can generate a system of values for man, is considerably worse than nothing and is better off dead. The moral values are the crucial pivot of the entire overall system, and from them flows the law. The law is therefore the last part in this chain and governs all the “religious,” social, political, and economic institutions of the society. Because law is to be formulated on the basis of the moral values, it will necessarily be organically related to the latter. But because it governs the day-to-day life of the society, with necessary social change it has to be reinterpreted. Should the process of reinterpretation stop, obviously the society must either stagnate or else rebel and take the road of secularism. In either case the whole structure of theology, morality, and law will eventually collapse.

The question of who should interpret law has been acute in Islamic societies because of the historical accident that the so-called law (fiqh) has been the result of the work of private lawyers, while in the later medieval centuries governments—particularly the Ottoman government—had to promulgate laws on issues not covered by the shari’a law. Although the state-made law was basically sanctioned by certain general principles in the shari’a law itself, nevertheless a dichotomy of the sources of law was unavoidable, and this process paved the way for the secularization of law in several Muslim countries—most systematically in Turkey. With the introduction of parliamentary institutions, law-making has become the business of lay parliamentarians, but there are large-scale protests from the ‘ulama’ and their supporters that law-making must be vested in the ‘ulama’ institutions. For centuries, however, law-making in the ‘ularmi’ institutions has been stagnant, and it is no longer feasible to reverse the new arrangements. The only way to produce genuine Islamic law is to enlighten public conscience, particularly that of the educated classes, with Islamic values. This, in fact, underlines the necessity of working out Islamic ethics systematically from the Qur’an and making such works accessible to the general reader. There is no shortcut to this process for the production of Islamic law. There is no doubt that a wider study of earlier works of Islamic jurisprudence and law will help. If first-rate works on the history of Islamic law and jurisprudence are written—as I have argued must be done—these should be made required reading in the schools of law as part of the normal curriculum. In this way, key Islamic legal and moral concepts would gradually come to inform the legal profession. In many Muslim countries the lawyers themselves are keen to learn more about Islamic law. Perhaps an international committee of Muslim jurists could be organized with first-rate traditionalist scholars of law and jurisprudence of various medieval schools to undertake major works in the field. At present, al-Azhar happens to be the most hopeful center for such a development.

 Philosophy.

In medieval Islam, a series of brilliant and original men had built, on the basis of Greek philosophical thought, a comprehensive and systematic view of the universe and of man, which they were able to synthesize with certain key concepts and doctrines of Islam to the satisfaction of themselves and many of the sophisticated Muslim intelligentsia. As I said earlier, this body of thought, called philosophy (falsafa), gave violent affront to the orthodoxy on several issues, and since then philosophy has been a discipline non grata in the Muslim educational system throughout a large part of the Muslim world. As I pointed out earlier, this was only one type of philosophy, with which nevertheless the fate of all philosophy was bound up in the eyes of the orthodox, and this circumstance caused a great deal of harm both to the orthodoxy (which suffered from a lack of ideas and their challenge) and to philosophy. Philosophy did continue to be cultivated at a high level in Iran, but this was done away from the orthodox fold—and even the Shi’i orthodox fold—and therefore the two hardly ever met. Philosophy is, however, a perennial intellectual need and has to be allowed to flourish both for its own sake and for the sake of other disciplines, since it inculcates a much-needed analytical-critical spirit and generates new ideas that become important intellectual tools for other sciences, not least for religion and theology.

Therefore a people that deprives itself of philosophy necessarily exposes itself to starvation in terms of fresh ideas—in fact, it commits intellectual suicide.

The generation of ideas by philosophy is basically a function of its critical-analytical activity. This activity has to be free. Most probably, philosophy as such cannot create any beliefs about reality and its nature, since its function is to analyze data of experience—sense experience, aesthetic experience, or religious experience. Philosophy, therefore, is not a rival of theology but should be helpful to it, for the object of the latter is to build a worldview on the basis of the Qur'an with the help of the intellectual tools provided, in part, by philosophy. Certain philosophical views may create tensions with certain theological doctrines; in this case either that particular philosophical view may be Islamically questionable or it may be that a particular theological doctrine is questionable. In any case, possible or actual tensions are not an excuse for banning philosophy in the name of a self- righteous theology, or vice versa: I have said already, and my argument has assumed all along in this work, that difference of opinion, provided it is meaningful, has to be assigned a high positive value, for it is only through confrontation of different and opposing views that truth gradually emerges. In fact, there is no privileged point in the process of human thought where the Truth can be said to have dawned.

Because medieval Muslim philosophy was a particular type of philosophical system, one must ask whether it is correct or wise to ban all philosophy falsafa) as such. There can be any number of philosophies depending on point of view, the assumptions a particular philosopher makes, and the problems he starts out to solve, namely, those that seem to him to be most important, whether in the field of metaphysics, or ethics, or epistemology, or logic, or whatever. To say that all philosophy must of necessity contradict theology or its suppositions is to play not only a naive game but a dangerous one. I can say without fear of contradiction that, for the Qur'an, knowledge—that is, the creation of ideas—is an activity of the highest possible value. Otherwise why did it ask the Prophet to continue to pray for "increase in knowledge"? Why did it untiringly emphasize delving into the universe, into history, and into man's own inner life? Is the banning or discouragement of pure thought compatible with this kind of demand? What does Islam have to fear from human thought and why? These are questions that must be answered by those “friends of religion” who want to keep their religion in a hothouse, secluded from the open air.

 The social sciences.

Social sciences, as systematized bodies of knowledge, that is, as disciplines, are a modern phenomenon. They are undoubtedly a very important development, since, the object of their study being man in society, they can they tell us so much about how collectivities actually behave in various fields of human belief and action. At the beginning of this chapter I said something about Muslims’ desire to Islamize these sciences or bodies of knowledge. There is no doubt that here again the vicious circle I have repeatedly spoken of can be broken only at the level of an intellectual activity where works are produced not only to inform how societies actually behave but to show how they can be imbued with Islamic values conducive to the establishment of an ethical social order in the world.

As a system of values, Islam naturally cannot favor a laissez-faire society. On the other hand, Islam knows well that coercion does not pay or even work. As for indoctrination in the sense of brainwashing, I have already pointed out that this technique of creating future generations of the faithful in fact ultimately backfires. If in the past social pressures helped indoctrination in the sense that people rarely rebelled openly, this situation is increasingly changing, since social pressures are weakening and, owing to a number of apparently irreversible factors, are bound to continue to weaken. In fact, an intense and irrational faith in a subjective humanism among several present-day “liberated” circles has led many to “leave our children alone when they are young so that they can choose their own way of life when they are adults” and the like. Such statements, often made in good faith (although at least as often they are merely a cheap cover for disowning parental responsibility), in fact betray a lack of concern for the future of humanity. For, if humans could grow by themselves, highly sophisticated religious and educational systems would not have developed in the first place. And what we are seeing develop in societies whose liberals think they are the first secular liberals in human history is that, instead of growing into humans, many of the new generation are in fact growing into animals. To remedy the crudity and even cruelty of a self-righteous traditional system is one thing. To throw out the baby with the bath water is quite another.

Indoctrination, however, necessarily occurs only where dogmas come in: the greater the dogma content, the greater the need for indoctrination; the greater the ethical content, the less the need for indoctrination. It is a pity of pities that the ethical content of societies is being washed out because of a general rebellion against dogmas. Dogmas, again, are not all of the same level, for there are relatively “rational” dogmas, that is, such as are tied to the ethical content of a system. In any case, universal ethical values are the crux of the being of a society: the debate about the relativity of moral values in societies is born of a liberalism that in the process of liberalization has become so perverted as to destroy those very moral values it set out to liberate from the constraints of dogma. From my point of view, which is confessedly and necessarily normative, therefore, the best of social sciences is history—if done well and objectively. This is because history, being long range, contains lessons in a way that a study of the contemporary aborigines of Australia, for example, does not. Macrohistory, if done really well, is the best service a social scientist can do for mankind. This is the reason the Qur’an invites us again and again “to travel on the earth and see the end of nations.” Microhistory—for example, a study of the postal service in the United States in the 1850s—is of use only insofar as it contributes to our knowledge of the behavior of man and its consequences; otherwise it is pure curiosity or a means to securing an academic post in a modern institution of learning.

Modern societies have acquired far more complexity than ancient and medieval societies. Particularly in the fields of economics, politics, communication, and education, modern societies have evolved thought, institutions, and structures incomparably more complex and sophisticated than those of any society within human experience. Yet we must not be deluded into thinking that because of their sophistication and complexity modern societies are any less subject to the basic laws of right and wrong. Part of modern sophistication, in fact, means that these societies have become more aware, or at least have the means to become more aware, of the possible sources of such social dislocations as might threaten to derange it. All such dislocations are finally rooted in the sense of right and wrong that is the conscience of the social mind. But it is always touch and go whether the conscience of a given social mind does in fact manage to reflect right and wrong with adequate objectivity. Since modern societies are, then, subject to the laws of rights and wrong just as were earlier, and in many ways simpler, societies, the lessons of history are as relevant to them as they were to the earlier ones. But, despite the increasingly sophisticated warning systems of today, the ethical impulse in certain important respects seems to have become, if anything, weaker. It is true that earlier societies were much more dogmatic in certain respects and therefore exposed themselves to dangers, while modern sophistication means less dogmatism, overtly at least. But this competence of modern societies to adjust to necessary change is often like a doctor who treats symptoms rather than the disease. No matter how much a doctor gains competence in treating symptoms while ignoring or being ignorant of the underlying disease, the life of his patient cannot be much prolonged. It is to be feared that modern civilization, while sophisticating means and methods to almost no end, has developed cardinal deficiencies in basic insights into human nature.

It is therefore essential that social scientists who study contemporary societies be exposed to the sobering lessons of history, for the history of mankind, whether earlier societies were aware of this or not, is indivisible in the sense that the basic human forces—and it is the human forces that are basic to history—are the same all over the globe. This is certainly the view of the Qur’an, which is singularly free of genetics and genes. If Muslim social scientists are to be involved in social engineering, this is all the more necessary. There is a considerable body of what may be called social thought in the Qur’an, which talks incessantly about the rise and fall of societies and civilizations, of the moral decrepitude of nations, of the succession of civilizations or “the inheritance of the earth,” of the function of leadership, of prosperity and peace and their opposites, and especially of “those who sow corruption on the earth but think they are reformers.” This body of thought should be organized next to the pure moral thought of the Qur’an and the lessons from history upon which the Qur’an is so insistent. Unless the material of the Qur’an is well systematized, it can be dangerously misleading to apply individual and isolated verses to situations, as most Muslim preachers and even many intellectuals tend to do.

The views of the Qur’an will also remain at the level of pure abstraction unless a thorough factual survey is made of the relevant social data. It is of the greatest importance to determine exactly where society is at present before deciding where it can go. To talk about reforming society without scientifically determining where the society is, is certainly like a doctor treating a patient without taking his case history or examining him. In fact, there is a sense in which even a meaningful formulation of Qur’anic thought will be dependent upon such a factual study and a proper method for interpreting facts; the converse, as I underlined in the Introduction, is also true. In other words, as with other fields discussed above, the study of the social sciences is a process, not something that is established once and for all. In fact, it is more so than any other field, for its subject matter—social behavior—is constantly in the process of creation.

 32. Islam and the Challenge of the Modern World

Shabbir Akhtar

Shabbir Akhtar (Pakistan-England, born 1960) attended college in England and received his doctorate in the philosophy of religion in Canada. He worked for a time as a local community relations officer in England, but his calling appears to be broader in scope. Since the late 1980s, Akhtar has published a series of books that aim to speak for the Islamic community of England. At the same time, Akhtar has also taken on the role of religious reformer within this community. One of his primary themes is the need to confront and learn from modernity—a challenge that contemporary Islamic theology has shied away from, he argues.[498] In A Faith for All Seasons, excerpted here, Akhtar is so successful at representing secular perspectives that “a number of Muslims felt he had lost his faith, and he was heavily criticised in the Muslim press.”[499]

“There are two ways of getting home,” wrote G.K. Chesterton [English author, 1874–1936], “and one of them is to stay there.”[500] No doubt that is the safer option; for some it is the only option. But there is another itinerary too. In this book I have urged Muslims to leave, if temporarily, the House of Islam, to venture through the alien world of rejection and rival patterns of religious conviction: to venture beyond dogma and unargued assumption, in the larger attempt to become acquainted not only with the a priori theologies of scripture but also with the sometimes recalcitrant realities of a world and human nature under their usual tuition.

The journey thus far has not been easy; and the rest is harder still. For we must now make our way back to the household of faith, back on the road to Mecca. And yet we have, of course, traversed the forbidden ground; we have seen the vast disarray of conflicting beliefs and ideologies vying with one another for our allegiance. An untested faith that prefers the security of unargued assumption, a faith whose votaries never lift their heads above the dogmatic parapet—that is no longer for us. “Thou shalt think!” is the first commandment of a characteristically modern piety. For in seeking to come to terms with modernity, we must develop a new rationalism, one that must reverently and conscientiously refuse to cherish the unempirical or otherwise questionable assumptions still so innocently enjoyed by a traditional piety. Can we, then, find a way back to the House of Islam and take our place in it as authentic members and genuine adherents?

 I

Perceptive Western listeners to Arab radio services relaying the Qur’an in the month of Ramadan can sense the competing noise and impact of more powerful neighboring stations as these intermittently drown out the reciter’s voice. A somewhat fanciful observation; but it may well serve to symbolize Islam seeking an audience in the contemporary world of profane leisure, irreligious confidences, opposed values, and most characteristically, louder voices.

The voice of God in the daily life of Muslims is often only faintly and intermittently heard. But it is, at least within the range of transmission, still heard. It is rare that the noisy turbulence of the vicinity drowns out the entire recited sequence; the partial segment reaches the alert ear. But it has to be an attentive intelligence, given to what the Qur’an calls reflection (tadabbur).

Equally, one might say, it has to be a message worthy of our attention, couched in a relevant idiom, voiced in an appropriately attractive way. The Qur’an, like proper Christian preaching, has an exceptionally intelligent earnestness at its core. The art of beautiful recitation of the Qur’an is a mature and extensively cultivated one in Islam, especially Arab Islam, giving Qur’an reciters the same kind of kudos in Muslim society as opera singers have in Western culture. The concern with achieving a dramatic impact upon contemporary audiences is utterly central to any attempt to repossess the legacy of Muhammad for the needs of the age of reason. Yet the message seems increasingly irrelevant. Even its intelligent earnestness these days is often mistaken, particularly by outsiders, as being at one remove from, if not identical with, unworthy passion: in a word, fanaticism.

Yet the need for the preacher and the reciter has rarely been greater. For religions are not saved or even best served by intellectual efforts alone. If the thinker has a word in this affair, the preacher has the decisive one. It is the preacher who is forever exhorting, warning, advising in the accents of scripture—thereby creating disciples who are, by God’s grace, inwardly repentant and outwardly concerned to effect social righteousness.

The scripture of Islam aims to persuade and educate us and thereby motivate right conduct. In its striking Arabic eloquence, it registers powerfully even on the rejecting and uncomprehending mind. But the full force of its compassionate coercion, if we may so term it, is felt only by the thoughtful listener.

The Qur’an frequently calls upon its audiences to give heed to its sequences. And much is done to facilitate its reception in the wayward human constituency. Thus, for example, the Qur’an weaves backwards and forwards into the fabric of the present a concern with the past—a past that is dead as history yet alive as a source of guidance. The text is sprinkled with heart-searching meditations that serve to give the reader pause—and the text, too, as it were—in midstream for deliberation. The result is the concise argumentativeness of prosaic literature but the charmingly incongruous effect of poetry in the dramatic impact of the sentences. In fine, the author has found the right tone of “voice” for preaching to the unconverted.

The voice from the radio conveys the word of God, received as proclamation and directive, delivered as sermon and imperative. It is piety and devotion in the highest sense, a reminder of mission and vocation. Through it breathe the allied ethical accents of demands unfulfilled, the intimations of nemesis, and the urgency of repentance, both individual and collective. The interval between birth and death—life itself—is to be properly punctuated by reflection on its elemental seriousness. Reminder is needed here constantly. Profane distraction must be subdued; the voice of mission must speak even when the listeners refuse to listen or when pressures, external or internal, conspire to silence, absorb or deflect it.

 II

“Don’t bother about being modern. Unfortunately it is the one thing that, whatever you do, you cannot avoid.” Can’t you? This remark of the late Salvador Dali [Spanish artist, 1904–1989], in his rather pretentious autobiography, The Diary of a Genius,[501] is oddly thoughtful, even discerning, especially if we may borrow it for our purposes here as a comment on modern religious conviction. For even “traditional” believers are far more secularized today than they themselves might imagine. Modernity, the circumstance of being “modern,” is, in a central sense, inescapable. It is the necessary context for every tolerably well-informed life-journey undertaken in the contemporary world.

Yet there is a choice. One need not be too eager to catch up on the facts; one can cultivate a kind of deliberate and bloody-minded will to obscurantism. Indeed even that is unnecessary once innate security of mind strikes alliance with laziness. The results, in the case of Islam, are well known. At least since the end of the 19th century, the entire House of Islam has been surviving on an intellectual overdraft.

A signal hindrance to the development of Islamic thought in the West in the coming years is what may be called “the problem of temperament.” An ideology, especially one aiming at the common good, must avoid reactionary and polemical impulses as the chief sources of its motivation. Unless Muslim reflection is actuated by motives nobler than an undifferentiated dislike of the West and all things Western, it has no chance of a hearing. (Remember that “the West” is no longer some amorphous realm, some abstract foe, out there in some distant land: Muslims are in the West.) We are all in search of an audience these days; and it is not easy to get anyone to listen, let alone to listen for long. A modern preacher either captures or loses an urbanized audience within the first three minutes of his sermon.

To cultivate “rejectionist” and isolationist attitudes is to invite accusations of apology. Moreover, such attitudes severely sap the energy of the faithful intellect. In any case, a shrill voice is an unworthy accompaniment of truth.

Many Muslims believe that contempt for our current situation of secularity and religious pluralism is an adequate substitute for an intellectual reckoning with it. Throughout this work, I have excoriated such a conceit. Here it is sufficient to pass summary judgment and pass on. That Muslim believers have always placed a sturdy trust in the ultimate truth of the Islamic scripture is all well and good. But such security of conviction must itself reckon, if it is intellectually aware and morally honest, with the facts of post-Enlightenment culture. Modern faith should properly allow room for a pertinent variety of anxiety: an anxiety free from contempt for hostile challenge, an anxiety devoid of hatred of alien belief. For there are secular and religious groups whose members sometimes reject Islamic presuppositions for reasons that cannot be dismissed as shallow or trivial.

The reason for this “new” style in Islamic religiosity is itself specifically Islamic in complexion. The didactic element in Islam is least properly presented in a shrill and unreflective tone precisely because it is then deracinated from the Islamic scripture’s own deeply meditative context with all its constant calls for reverent reflection (tadabbur). The current Muslim tendency to discuss narrowly dogmatic issues in an unrelievedly authoritarian mood is the best way of imprisoning latently massive scriptural powers. A cramped and degradingly minor Muslim intellectual ambition today effectively gives the lie to the Islamic claim that the Qur’an is a “miracle of reason and speech” vouchsafed to “the best community ever brought forth among mankind.” There is work to be done; and, notwithstanding Dali, there is merit in being modern, for it is possible to continue to live in the past—a past that is both a fetter and a release.

 III

Is contemporary man then indeed the measure of all things? Should he be? I have argued that the starting point of our modern attempt to achieve an eternal perspective—a modern theology—must be an attempt to take the full measure of man. We begin with men and women under an empty sky. Such an emphasis is categorically foreign to a traditional Islamic piety that both begins and ends with God. But there is, as I argued in part 2, some Qur’anic warrant for taking the human condition seriously, if only as an index to God and the transcendent. Within the Qur’an of course any attempt to give man his due necessarily involves giving God his due, so to speak.

This new style of religiosity may strike one as entailing an unduly large concession to modern thought. But there is no real cause for alarm in the Muslim theological camp. Wherever we may begin, we religious thinkers can safely be trusted (as Marxists well know) to arrive finally at God. Naturally, one supposes; for that is our job. And, more seriously, because a correct theology must contain in its premises (and hence in its conclusion) a true statement about man and hence about God. There is a really good conceptual mix here: if theological conclusions about deity are false, the implied theological statements about humanity must also have been untrue. If theological statements about the nature of God are true, a valid anthropology must already have been implicit in the premises.

To understand the nature of God is not equivalent to providing a sound anthropology. But any full understanding of the nature of God will involve some understanding of the created order placed under a divine sovereignty. The theist will argue that any full understanding of man would imply some fundamental if implicit reference to God. For the consciousness of the divine alone constitutes the authentically human.

The starting point is of great importance. But, as in the formation of some systems of mathematics, we should begin where we need to begin. Thus, for example, if we are engaged in the development of Muslim theology and expounding it for the needs of the traditional pious mind confident of faith's claims, there is no harm in beginning—and even ending—with God. For many deeply religious people, man is, at every level, tributary to the divine Creator. However, in other areas, the starting point may well have to be different. For example, in Christian-Muslim dialogue, it is preferable, though not necessary, to begin at the level of the human condition and then explore as to which of the two faiths gives the most "satisfying" characterization of the human and hence of God. God can enter the picture indirectly or, if you like, as an inference from the premises implied or stated. When it comes to the non-theistic faiths and atheistic humanism, God cannot be the starting point of responsible exchange with the rejector. There, man is necessarily, in the first instance at least, the measure of all faiths. We must begin with man; the theist hopes, naturally, that we need not end there. But that must be the hope of a valid epistemology, not the presumption of a dogmatic temper.

Wherever we may begin, we must end with God. Modern Protestant thought, of a reductionist and revisionist vintage, has sometimes lost God in the intricate procedures of theology. Fortunately the supernatural emphasis remains integral to Islam; the human and natural remain tributary and derivative.

A due recognition of the importance of man is likely to be misunderstood in many ways. For example, to say, with Christian thinkers like the Reverend Kenneth Cragg, "Let God be God," is to endow man with an excessive significance and thereby misunderstand Islam or, for that matter, any theism.[502] For God is God— independent of our recognition or acceptance. Even if God's truth can, at worst, fail to be accepted in a sinful human constituency, it remains truth none the less. On every score, this is the Qur’an’s message. “Let man be man” is the true creed of Islam. For man is debased, denatured, disfigured, devalued by kufr (disbelief) and idolatry; man attains authentically human stature via Islam. It is man, not God, who must submit his will. God is not a Muslim; he does not need anything and certainly not anything from us in order to be truly divine. He is, in a manner of speaking, necessarily Himself.

To come to terms with modernity is one thing; changing a revealed Islam to suit human whim shaped by passing fashion is quite another. It is a rarely noted tribute to the authentic conviction of the religious intelligentsia of Islam that they suppressed the very conditions in which a neo-Islamic belief could take root. Islam is Islam and remains so. An Islam molded under the concentrated pressures of secularity and interreligious encounter must nevertheless be recognizably a faith bearing a family resemblance to traditional Islam. My attempt at a reverent skepticism in these pages is in the service of rediscovering the old Islam, not of inventing a new heresy. The only dogmatism which is charming and profound, in religions as in individuals, is the one at once aware both of itself as well as of alternative patterns of belief. To learn to face fully the skeptical gaze of modernity is not a license for any wholesale disowning of authentically Muslim dogmas in the tradition. It is only because we today still wish to retain Islam as a complete vision that we need to identify, record and religiously contend with various new theological puzzles. Once we simply sacrifice the problematic parts of revealed scripture—as some Protestant Christians do—we either alter altogether the grounds of our puzzlement or else feel no need to be puzzled at all.

 IV

A true Muslim is never a man of many dogmas. For, at the end of the chapter, there is only one dogma, concerning which he has no option: Allah-u-akbar [God is great]. This confession of the greatness of God is central to the Muslim imagination. It punctuates the prayer and, when sincerely confessed, transforms the heart and mind. Indeed, even the most obscure and flickering recognition of its worth adds dignity to a life being lived in a complex industrial-commercial society that sets great store by worthless ephemera.

The confession of the overwhelming greatness of God is by no means distinctive to Islam. Every theism is grounded in such a recognition. But it is the manner in which such a conviction continues to leaven the whole of an authentic Muslim life which seems to set Islam apart today as a pre-eminently practical faith.

There is no necessary triumphalism about such a claim. For one can state the strength of Islamic conviction as a fact rather than as a boast. In any case, the Qur'an is concerned with both sides of the idolatrous coin: if the profane is to be repudiated as profane, the sacred is to be worshipped as sacred. If we should categorically refuse to worship forces unworthy of it, we must equally categorically embrace worship of forces worthy of it. "There is no God but God" is a twofold declaration, vigilantly denying the efficacy of purely profane realities while categorically enjoining a trust in the power of the unique Deity. To utter, therefore, with meaning and conscious intent, the creed of Islam is to discover the full nature and bounds of one's duty as a created being.

Modern living is a tall order: a personal quest for fulfillment limited by all the tortured choices of an age of uncertainty, an attempt to recognize and fulfill obligations to oneself, the family, the nation and the global society of mankind. For the Muslim believer these attempts are themselves secondary to a larger attempt to please his Creator, who is to be actively recognized as being greater (akbar) than this purely human network of expectations, duties and hopes. A tall order indeed! In such a context, the Muslim sees his Islam as a unified enterprise of private faith and public practice, which cultivates the fullest appreciation of whatever is good and wholesome while actively inviting the most permanent quarrel with the forces of what the Qur'an calls zulm (wrongdoing), whether personal or communal. For what is the worth of a piety that retires from the real world of varied voices, whether innocent and caring, or, more frequently, irate and tired?

What, then, is it to be religious today? To be religious is to see oneself continuously as an exile in the midst of natural existence. This is not to say—it would be plainly untrue—that one is not of this world or in this world nor, most importantly, that one is under a religious obligation to entertain hopes of a false Utopia here or elsewhere. Nor is true religion a warrant for uprooting oneself from the soil of existence by refusing to give personal passions their due: faith has its own resources for easing the burden of private emotion, such as the natural desire for legitimate power and (licit) sexual gratification. It is certainly not for Islam to undermine the normal aspirations of human beings by demanding some deliberate and sustained detachment from the sensuous, the natural, the immediate and the temporal. No, the truly religious ideal involves an intense effort to pass through ordinary human experience and sanctify every episode, whether immediately or retrospectively, by celebrating the good while turning the realization of wrongdoing into an occasion for repentance. In doing that, one is merely practicing the conviction that “God is greater.”

 V

Such a religious view of the universe would merely indulge our speculative ingenuity—unless it had practical consequences. And these are legion. Choice here settles on three motifs that are dominant in any contemporary discussion of the Islamic religion as a relevant charter for human society. All three are authentically Qur’anic, proclaiming as each does the greatness of God; all are increasingly significant as this century draws to a close: man as custodian of Nature and technology, man as a socio-sexual creature, and man as a tenant with a fixed lease on physical life in this world. We may, for convenience, call these the problems of technology, sexuality and mortality, respectively. The first two are explored briefly here, the third in section VI.

Some of the Qur’an’s comments on the religious significance of Nature and an auxiliary technology are profound in a way we today more readily appreciate than did Muhammad’s own contemporaries. Within the scripture of Islam there is, in the Reverend Kenneth Cragg's apt phrase, "a theology of ecology."[503] Unless technology is itself placed under a constraining sovereignty—unless Allah-u-akbar is also the scientists' slogan—all our scientific achievements may well radically come to grief. A merciful creator has placed the natural world in our trust. Do we know the duties of stewardship? Can we discharge these properly if we recognize no responsibility to forces greater than the human? The Qur'an's implied verdict is unequivocal. A science and technology freed of all reference and responsibility to the transcendent will cause irreversible damage even while, paradoxically, aiming to confer immeasurable benefit. For a generation that lives under the increasingly darkening shadow of global nuclear holocaust, such a verdict is neither extreme nor rooted in some outdated dogma.

Man too is part of a universal order of mercy and provision. The inaugural revelation already, if we may move on to our second theme, makes a reference to the basic mystery of procreation. "Recite in the name of thy Lord who created man from a bloodclot ('alaq)" (Sura 96, Verses 1–2; interpreted). Throughout the Qur'an, there are many reverent allusions to human sexuality and its consequences as among the signs of God for a people given to sustained reflection (tadabbur). The male-female division and the benefits of mutual love and compassion flowing from it are divine portents.

Within the Muslim scripture, the sacred and the sexual are often discussed in association. It is as though sexuality is next to godliness in the Islamic lexicon! There is no doubt that the sexual act hides within it deeply religious significances, notwithstanding its essentially legal as opposed to sacramental status in Islam. At the very least, it is an invitation to reflection. For the Qur'anic confidence seems to be that a destiny brought close to the texture of its own origin and dependence (its biological root and the promise of the human fruit) could hardly fail to register the power and caring wisdom of its creator. Humility is certainly not out of place in an area of deep mutual vulnerability. Given the large and varied liabilities and significances of the sexual office—the delicacy of an intimacy that conceals temptations to exploitation, the inevitability of far-reaching consequences of our choices here—the Qur'anic stress is surely salutary.

This is particularly true today. For within the area of the sexual demand upon the human frame, the Qur’anic warning against reducing “the best form” (akhsani- taqwim, Sura 95, Verse 4; interpreted) to “the lowest of the low” (asfala-saflin, Sura 95, Verse 5; interpreted) acquires impressively contemporary meanings. When we survey the opposed modern view of sexuality as an arena for the celebration of our emancipation —a form of recreation—we can well understand why the fear of God is an appropriate concomitant of the will to sexuality. The prostitution of sex, serving and served by profane interests, notably commercial pornography, is an almost inevitable consequence of the rupture of the traditional liaison between the sexual and the sacred. Given the peculiarly powerful proclivity of the sexual demand to degenerate into what is, stripped of the garment (libas)[504] of piety and compassion, merely base and humiliating, the fear of God, in recognition of his greatness, is the best possible background to the activities of the sexual instinct.

It is in this context that one should broach the vexed subject of Islam’s legal charter for a truly erotic society. The traditional Muslim custom of segregating men and women in order to protect women against aggressive kinds of male desire has led to charges of sexual apartheid. But one must not judge too hastily here. The aim of Islam’s admittedly paternalistic provisions for women is to secure valid norms of modesty, male and female, so that sexual appetite can be indulged with wholesome enjoyment. Within recognized and appropriately liberal limits, men and women can develop a sexual potential, enjoying it without fear of private sin or public reproach. Beyond that there is a clear and legally enforced recognition of the dangers of injury to the dignity of involved parties. Given the power of sex as an instinctual energy, the need for control and harness is virtually axiomatic. Any kind of irresponsible adventurism here spells disaster. Certainly, the recent Western experiment, with all its auxiliary techniques for sexual gratification, has produced an increasingly sordid sensuality retrospectively embittered by its own paradoxical loss of natural eroticism.

It is, ironically, the Islamic wish for an authentically erotic, a properly sensual, culture that has led to its endorsement of severely scrupulous, almost puritanical, attitudes towards the abuse of the sexual instinct. Traditional Islam’s notorious “extreme” (hudud) ordinances for sexual offenses cannot be properly understood without a compelling sense of the scripture’s own high estimate of the sexual office.

The veil is no doubt an apt symbol for the sexual culture the Qur’an sanctions and encourages men and women to cultivate. For it well captures the idea of a reverent invitation that, variously, in the hands of female adventurism or male-sponsored desires, may deteriorate into what is irreverently suggestive, even base. The invitation is also a liability, just as in the case of Nature whose religious significance may well be lost in the more superficial invitation to seek control and technological dominion. The veil could enslave, cramp or distort even valid sexual ambition; or it could successfully serve as an index to the truly erotic culture.

 VI

In that largely unaccountable desire for immortality which is a unique feature of our species, religious believers may claim a distinctively rational ground. Theism offers, through its faith in the immortality of the soul, important hopes and distinctive ambitions. Though many conceptual difficulties beset this religious belief in survival beyond the grave, it is not clear that it is incoherent. At any rate, acceptance of this conviction has given an overriding purpose to countless human beings throughout history. Certainly, by standing robust witness to an afterlife, Islam has produced an impressive record of zestful bravery and purposeful courage in the context of holy struggle against militant forms of evil.

The Qur’an is alert, on multiple levels, to the fact of transience. All things, including human generations, pass away. Only “thy Lord, full of majesty” is exempt from the indifferent ravages of time. As for the rest of us, God has decreed time as an index to the fragility of all, especially the sinful, society.

In these meditative contexts, where the Qur’anic mood is in dangerous proximity to the forbidden impulse of tragedy, there is a peculiarly moving beauty in the language which translation drastically reduces. It is a language, at any rate, that indelibly impressed those in the contemplative traditions of Islamic theism. For the Arabs, the Qur’an is the first document to impose a specifically religious significance on the facts of human impermanence and mortality. No adequate philosophy of man and his place in the titanic immensity called the universe could conceivably omit references to this centrally relevant truth of our condition. The pre-Islamic Arabs were naturally impressed by the transience of all things mortal; most entertained tragic notions. In the event Islam was destined to frustrate the will to tragedy while radically satisfying the residual desire for a conclusive triumph over the limitations of physical extinction.

That there was in Muhammad’s Arabia a national longing for some successful transcendence of the natural and human order is amply evidenced in pagan poetry. The Qur’an offers in conscious opposition to such pagan poetry, a new approach to physical extinction. For Islam, like every responsible metaphysic of man, accepts and psychically reckons with the fact of death. It completely changed its significance for the Arabs. The Qur’an distances itself from the martial ethos of pre-Islamic Arabia with its strong traditions of muru’a (virility) displayed in courage and recklessness. But, in a manner typical of its religious genius, it effectively transformed the protest against death by recruiting the old recklessness for a new cause, thereby dignifying the recklessness while ensuring the cause.

If Islamic history overflows with episodes of courageous sacrifice of life for the cause of faith, it is at least partly because a due recognition of the greatness of God, according to the Qur’an, necessitates such dramatic gestures. Though there are many, including unspectacular, ways of pleasing God, martyrdom is, according to all learned authorities, unquestionably the best. Tradition has confidently maintained that martyrs for the cause of Islam are the only exceptions to the rule of strict reckoning on the awful day ofjudgment. (Muhammad, incidentally, will be judged like anyone else since he died a natural death.)

The Qur’an takes martyrdom seriously. It denies that martyrs are dead; rather, believers are instructed to say, martyrs are living in the presence of God, satisfied and rejoicing in their new state. This is no reductionist sentimentalism that merely allows the dead to live in the memories of the living—with good and evil leaving some permanent heritage while its agents have long left the scene. The Qur’an has a strikingly robust doctrine about an afterlife, with contrasted fates awaiting the good and the bad. Those who endorse the greatness of God may validly entertain high hopes of entering Paradise. As for the rest, for whom their own whims were greater (akbar) than God, the sacred volume has a clear message. Their destination is Hell, which is, [Jean-Paul] Sartre [1905–1980] notwithstanding, by no means just other people.

 VII

“Every path,” declared the late Ayatollah [Ruhollah] Khomeini [Iranian leader, 1902–1989], “can lead to Hell.” Some paths much quicker than others, one might immediately add. (The comment is as true, if not more so, than the maxim that inspires it.) Khomeini himself goes on to list science, mysticism, theology, ethics and, surprisingly, even monotheism as all capable of leading to perdition. It is an apt observation for our purposes here, intimating as it does the dangers of abusing powerful and profound faiths. The potential threat of “political religion,” for want of a better phrase, is all too obvious, especially when it strikes alliance with human arrogance and lust for domination.

There can be no easy complacency these days, arguing as we do for the necessity of religion to generations that barely care. There are many today who have no wish to be “saved,” to be “successful” in the eyes of God. Islam offers spiritual success to those who prefer failure. It is no small paradox; but there we have it. It is a religious puzzle we must accept on faith and move on. But it is always right and unequivocally just to seek, no matter how painful, a full and permanent controversy with those who reject Islam without adequate basis, who disbelieve in its inspiration while cynically exploiting it for purely political or personal ends.

Such an engagement with the rejectors, however, does not allow us to impose upon them any militancy of our own persuasion. That way lies Hell and alienation. For the interests of Islam are not properly served by encouraging the hypocritical element, already extremely large among the educated and secularized classes in the House of Islam. In such a rendezvous, painful as it is to the committed Muslim, God has the last word. For them their works, and to us ours.

 VIII

“What should it profit a house in the night that a lamp is set forth on its roof —when all is dark within?” Sheikh Abu Hamid al-Ghazzali’s [1058–1111] rhetorical question, attributed to Jesus of Nazareth,[505] brings us to the last turn on the road to Mecca. I have already remarked in the Preface that Muslims have clearly failed to interpret and appropriate Islam properly for the needs of the modern age. There are many reasons for this failure; the chief ones are the shallowness of intellectual responses to the challenges of modernity and an increasing shallowness in the life of faith.

Al-Ghazzali’s question well catches the problem. A little religion is a very dangerous thing. Within the House of Islam, there is today a great need for self-criticism and introspection, both severely jeopardized by the emphasis on a purely external, somewhat legalistic, religious observance. Muslims are religiously obliged to turn inward, to take the full measure of their own failings, and try to effect social and personal criticism in the larger attempt to seek the mercy of God. Islam may well be the best religion with the worst followers.

The pen may be mightier than the sword; but prayer is certainly so. Muslims need to develop, deepen the life of faith. A deeper spirituality, with prayer at its core, will constitute an important part of the characteristically religious reckoning with secularity. Religions are not saved by mental efforts alone. We must live as faithful people; we must strengthen our style of dealing with modernity by living within the parameters of faith, by actively striving for a genuine religiosity that seeks and finds resources for honest, including intellectually honest, living in a difficult age. There are many theological puzzles on our hands; the silence of God is increasingly oppressive, heavier each day on the heart of every reflective believer. And yet here too prayer has its place: “Our Lord, burden us not with what we have not the strength to bear.” (Sura 2, Verse 286)

Faith needs to move mountains: the mountains of doubt, hesitation, unclarity, weakness of will. The opening chapter of the Qur’an well captures the flavor of this religious imperative, one that underlines one entirely indispensable mood of the authentically religious temper. “Thee alone we worship, Thee alone we ask for help,” says the sura [Sura 1, Verse 4]. Could there be a better way of imposing an embargo on every false ideal, an operative veto on any attempt to seek support from purely human sources? This indeed is the voice of the truly iconoclastic conscience. But to attain here the right kind of trust in God—an effortless trust—requires effort, sustained labor. “Guide us in the straight path,” the sura continues [Sura 1, Verse 5]. The mood for submission (islam) is well captured in the imperative “Ihdena” (Guide us!)—gracefully requesting the grace of God, yet enjoining human effort in the making of the plea.

There may be certainties and consolations when we get to the heavenly city—but there are few left on the road to it. It will be a difficult journey; and we have miles to go before we sleep. But I hope Muslims can improve on these admittedly rudimentary beginnings.

It is a revealing feature of the Muslim mind that, though the Muslim calendar has put an end to it [in 1979], the 14th century [A.H.] still lingers on. There is a curious kind of finality about this century in the voice of the simple believer as well as in that of the sophisticated religionist. There is a very keen sense of an impending crisis in this world, heightened by prophetic warnings of imminence ofjudgment.

The Muslim 14th century has, however, ended; and the 15th has already reached a tenth of its span. Islam is now fully in a modern world of competing ideologies and penetrating skepticisms, mostly of Anglo-American provenance, that look with justified suspicion on any exclusivist dogmatic claim. Trust in God is no longer enough; we must tie the camel first. Muslim destinies today need to be shaped partly by conscious choice and struggle. We must earn the right to a future.

* Glossary

 A

ahl al-kitab,—People of the Book (Christians, Jews, Muslims)

akbar,—greater

Allah-u-akbar,—God is great

Ansar,—literally “helpers,” meaning the Muslims of Medina accompanying the Prophet ‘aqida (plural: ‘aqa’id),—creed asatir,—myths

asma’ Allah al-husna,—the beautiful names of God

 B bashar,—human

batin,—inner meaning

 D

dar al-harb,—land of war, non-Islamic lands dar al-Islam,—land of Islam, Islamic lands daraja,—degree, rank

dhikr,—remembrance of God

dhimmi,—protected religious minorities

 F

faddala,—to prefer falasifa,—philosophers

falsafa,—philosophy

faqih (plural: fuqaha’),—religious scholar fardu (plural: fara’id),—Islamic duty fiqh,—Islamic jurisprudence

fitna,—civil war

fitra,—natural disposition to the good

 H

hadd,—limitation

hadith,—tradition of the Prophet hajj,—pilgrimage

halal,—divinely sanctioned

hanif,—inclined to truth

haqiqa,—truth

haram,—prohibited, protected

hazrat,—excellency

hijab,—veil

hijra,—migration of the Muslims from Mecca to Medina in year 622

hudan,—guidance

hudud,—Islamic penalties

hukm (plural: ahkam),—judgment, rule, government

 I

ihsan,—beneficence

ijma’,—consensus

ijtihad,—Islamic interpretation

‘ilm,—science, knowledge

imam,—leader

‘iman,—faith

insan,—human being insaniyat,—humanity

islam,—submission to God

ithar,—self-sacrificing generosity

itlaq,—infinity

 J jadid,—new, modern jahiliya,—the pre-Islamic era jihad,—religious struggle

jizya,—tax on dhimmi

 K

kafir (plural: kafirun),—unbeliever khilafa,—trusteeship, caliphate

kitab,—book

kufr,—disbelief

 M mal,—property

ma’ruf,—common decency

maslaha,—public interest

mawla,—blood brother

mu’amalat,—Islamic civil law, code of behavior

mu’awada,—reciprocity

mujtahid,—religious scholar

mu’min (plural: mu’minin),—believer

mushrik,—polytheist muslimin,—Muslims; literally, those who submit mutashabih,—uncertain

 N

nafs,—soul

 Q

qadi (or qazi),— Islamic judge qawwam,—in charge of qiwama,—responsibility

qiyas,—analogical reasoning

 R

risala,—divine inspiration

 S

shahada,—witnessing, acceptance of Islam

sha’n al-nuzul (plural: shu’un),— occasion of revelation shar’,—divine revelation, Islamic law

shari’a,—Islamic law

shirk,—polytheism

shura,—consultation

sunna,—practice of the Prophet

sura,—chapter of the Qur’an

 T

tadabbur,—reverent reflection

tafasir,—exegetical works

tafsir,—interpretation, analysis

tanattu’,—trangressing, meticulous religiosity taqlid (plural: taqalid)

taqwa,—fear of God, piety tasamuh,—tolerance

ta’wil,—intepretation

ta’zir,—civil penalties

towhid,—unity

 U

‘ulama’,—religious scholars

umm,—mother

umma,—community

ustadh,—teacher

usul,—principles

 Z

zahir,—external meaning

zakat,—Islamic tax

* Index of Qur’anic Citations

Sura 1, Verse 4: 327

Sura 1, Verse 5: 327

Sura 2, Verses 1–2: 278

Sura 2, Verses 2–3: 130

Sura 2, Verse 21: 232

Sura 2, Verse 24: 241

Sura 2, Verse 30: 163

Sura 2, Verse 38: 278

Sura 2, Verse 47: 136

Sura 2, Verse 62: 273

Sura 2, Verse 109: 166, 167

Sura 2, Verse 122: 136

Sura 2, Verse 143: 196

Sura 2, Verse 156: 189

Sura 2, Verse 173: 91

Sura 2, Verse 177: 230

Sura 2, Verse 178: 53, 204

Sura 2, Verse 179: 91

Sura 2, Verse 185: 200

Sura 2, Verse 187: 324

Sura 2, Verse 193: 276

Sura 2, Verse 194: 141, 167

Sura 2, Verse 201: 292

Sura 2, Verse 217: 167

Sura 2, Verse 219: 283

Sura 2, Verses 221–227: 135

Sura 2, Verses 226–232: 232

Sura 2, Verse 228: 87, 135, 265

Sura 2, Verse 233: 91

Sura 2, Verse 251: 35

Sura 2, Verse 253: 136

Sura 2, Verse 256: 76, 163, 177

Sura 2, Verse 257: 76

Sura 2, Verse 272: 157

Sura 2, Verse 275: 51

Sura 2, Verse 282: 52

Sura 2, Verse 285: 136

Sura 2, Verse 286: 327

Sura 3, Verse 7: 249, 311

Sura 3, Verse 19: 277

Sura 3, Verses 64–66: 160

Sura 3, Verse 79: 24

Sura 3, Verse 84: 87, 166

Sura 3, Verse 85: 166, 279

Sura 3, Verse 86: 166

Sura 3, Verse 87: 167

Sura 3, Verses 87–91: 166

Sura 3, Verses 89–91: 167

Sura 3, Verses 99–100: 166

Sura 3, Verses 99–104: 166

Sura 3, Verse 102: 273, 278

Sura 3, Verse 106: 167

Sura 3, Verse 140: 167

Sura 3, Verse 141: 83

Sura 3, Verse 149: 167

Sura 3, Verses 150–151: 167

Sura 3, Verse 154: 83

Sura 3, Verse 159: 37, 79, 201, 283

Sura 3, Verse 179: 156–157

Sura 3, Verse 195: 157

Sura 4, Verse 1: 133, 278

Sura 4, Verse 2: 232

Sura 4, Verse 3: 110

Sura 4, Verse 7: 136

Sura 4, Verse 11: 108, 232

Sura 4, Verse 12: 108

Sura 4, Verse 31: 200

Sura 4, Verse 32: 108, 134

Sura 4, Verse 34: 136–138, 231, 234–235

Sura 4, Verse 36: 229

Sura 4, Verse 58: 44

Sura 4, Verse 59: 83

Sura 4, Verse 62: 77

Sura 4, Verse 64: 30

Sura 4, Verse 66: 105

Sura 4, Verse 80: 32

Sura 4, Verse 82: 311

Sura 4, Verse 83: 38, 42

Sura 4, Verse 92: 110, 230

Sura 4, Verse 95: 134

Sura 4, Verse 113: 31

Sura 4, Verse 129: 110

Sura 4, Verse 136: 274

Sura 4, Verse 141: 231

Sura 4, Verse 147: 276

Sura 4, Verse 171: 197

Sura 4, Verse 176: 232

Sura 5, Verse 3: 277, 279

Sura 5, Verse 5: 232

Sura 5, Verse 6: 91

Sura 5, Verse 8: 90

Sura 5, Verse 32: 311

Sura 5, Verse 34: 53

Sura 5, Verse 38: 108

Sura 5, Verse 42: 174

Sura 5, Verse 44: 90

Sura 5, Verse 45: 53

Sura 5, Verse 48: 50

Sura 5, Verse 49: 78, 90

Sura 5, Verse 51: 164

Sura 5, Verse 57: 167

Sura 5, Verses 58–60: 167

Sura 5, Verse 69: 273

Sura 5, Verse 77: 197

Sura 5, Verse 82: 75

Sura 5, Verse 83: 55

Sura 5, Verses 86–88: 197

Sura 5, Verse 92: 33, 34

Sura 5, Verse 99: 33

Sura 5, Verses 101–102: 39

Sura 5, Verse 111: 280

Sura 6, Verse 10: 30

Sura 6, Verses 66–67: 32

Sura 6, Verse 82: 273

Sura 6, Verse 86: 136

Sura 6, Verses 106–107: 32

Sura 6, Verses 114–115: 205

Sura 6, Verse 126: 288

Sura 6, Verse 132: 134

Sura 6, Verse 151: 274

Sura 6, Verse 154: 176

Sura 6, Verse 163: 273, 279

Sura 6, Verse 165: 135

Sura 7, Verses 31–32: 197

Sura 7, Verse 40: 136, 181

Sura 7, Verse 157: 46

Sura 7, Verses 172–174: 278

Sura 7, Verse 184: 33

Sura 7, Verse 188: 33

Sura 8, Verses 7–8: 30

Sura 8, Verses 21–22: 274–275

Sura 8, Verses 36–39: 276

Sura 9, Verse 6: 80, 203

Sura 9, Verse 10: 232

Sura 9, Verse 20: 134

Sura 9, Verse 29: 141

Sura 9, Verse 34: 64

Sura 9, Verse 60: 230

Sura 9, Verse 70: 76

Sura 9, Verse 71: 108

Sura 9, Verse 103: 283

Sura 9, Verse 118: 277

Sura 9, Verse 128: 201

Sura 10, Verse 2: 33

Sura 10, Verse 19: 16

Sura 10, Verse 99: 32, 163

Sura 10, Verses 99–100: 76

Sura 10, Verse 108: 32

Sura 11, Verse 1: 78

Sura 11, Verse 11: 311

Sura 11, Verse 12: 33

Sura 11, Verse 26: 76

Sura 11, Verse 114: 200

Sura 11, Verse 118: 16

Sura 11, Verse 118–119: 35, 241

Sura 12, Verse 76: 135

Sura 12, Verse 108: 80

Sura 13, Verse 7: 33

Sura 13, Verse 40: 33

Sura 14, Verse 7: 62

Sura 14, Verses 24–25: 251

Sura 14, Verse 47: 35

Sura 15, Verse 28: 162

Sura 15, Verse 29: 162–163

Sura 16, Verse 35: 33

Sura 16, Verse 44: 276, 277

Sura 16, Verse 64: 33

Sura 16, Verse 82: 33

Sura 16, Verse 90: 274

Sura 16, Verse 125: 201, 274

Sura 17, Verse 2: 176

Sura 17, Verse 11: 188

Sura 17, Verse 20: 76

Sura 17, Verse 21: 134

Sura 17, Verse 23: 276

Sura 17, Verses 23–24: 109

Sura 17, Verse 36: 80

Sura 17, Verse 54: 32

Sura 17, Verse 55: 136

Sura 17, Verse 70: 136, 163

Sura 17, Verse 105: 33

Sura 18, Verse 109: 278

Sura 18, Verse 110: 33, 188

Sura 19, Verse 97: 33

Sura 20, Verses 1–3: 33

Sura 20, Verse 44: 76

Sura 20, Verse 47: 76

Sura 20, Verse 75: 134

Sura 20, Verse 111: 273

Sura 20, Verse 114: 307

Sura 21, Verse 7: 83

Sura 21, Verse 35: 140

Sura 21, Verse 85: 153

Sura 21, Verse 107: 47, 91

Sura 22, Verse 49: 33

Sura 22, Verse 52: 311

Sura 22, Verse 75: 133

Sura 23, Verse 115: 163

Sura 24, Verse 2: 109

Sura 24, Verse 31: 132

Sura 24, Verse 33: 230

Sura 24, Verse 54: 33

Sura 24, Verse 55: 35

Sura 25, Verse 43: 32

Sura 25, Verse 56: 33

Sura 27, Verses 22–24: 121

Sura 27, Verse 23: 111

Sura 27, Verse 65: 278

Sura 27, Verses 91–92: 33

Sura 28, Verse 77: 292

Sura 28, Verse 88: 288

Sura 29, Verse 18: 34

Sura 29, Verse 25: 48

Sura 29, Verse 46: 164

Sura 29, Verse 64: 280

Sura 29, Verse 69: 256

Sura 30, Verse 7: 307

Sura 30, Verse 21: 109

Sura 30, Verse 23: 277

Sura 30, Verse 27: 291

Sura 30, Verse 32: 288

Sura 30, Verse 41: 83–84

Sura 31, Verse 8: 108

Sura 32, Verse 9: 162

Sura 33, Verse 6: 32

Sura 33, Verse 21: 81

Sura 33, Verse 35: 108

Sura 33, Verse 36: 32

Sura 33, Verse 40: 33

Sura 33, Verse 45: 73

Sura 33, Verses 45–46: 34

Sura 33, Verses 45–48: 76

Sura 34, Verse 28: 34

Sura 34, Verse 46: 34

Sura 35, Verse 10: 276

Sura 35, Verses 23–24: 34

Sura 36, Verse 17: 34

Sura 36, Verse 20: 201

Sura 36, Verses 34–35: 108

Sura 36, Verse 60: 76

Sura 37, Verses 171–173: 30

Sura 38, Verse 48: 153

Sura 38, Verse 65: 34

Sura 38, Verse 70: 33

Sura 38, Verse 72: 162–163

Sura 39, Verses 17–18: 79

Sura 39, Verse 18: 288

Sura 39, Verse 41: 32

Sura 39, Verse 46: 164

Sura 40, Verse 28: 83

Sura 40, Verse 29: 83

Sura 40, Verses 51–52: 30

Sura 41, Verse 5: 80

Sura 41, Verse 6: 33

Sura 42, Verses 9–10: 78

Sura 42, Verse 13: 50

Sura 42, Verse 21: 50

Sura 42, Verse 36: 87

Sura 42, Verses 36–38: 79

Sura 42, Verse 38: 79, 87, 283

Sura 42, Verses 41–43: 79

Sura 42, Verse 48: 32

Sura 43, Verse 3: 278

Sura 43, Verse 22: 288

Sura 43, Verse 32: 135

Sura 45, Verse 15: 163

Sura 45, Verse 18: 50

Sura 46, Verse 9: 34

Sura 46, Verse 19: 134

Sura 47, Verse 4: 230

Sura 47, Verse 7: 275

Sura 47, Verse 25: 167

Sura 47, Verses 26–27: 167

Sura 47, Verse 31: 273

Sura 47, Verse 32: 167

Sura 47, Verse 34: 167

Sura 47, Verse 38: 167

Sura 48, Verse 8: 34

Sura 48, Verse 28: 35

Sura 49, Verse 10: 156

Sura 49, Verse 12: 202

Sura 49, Verse 12: 75

Sura 49, Verse 13: 88, 134, 157, 164

Sura 49, Verse 14: 272, 278

Sura 50, Verse 16: 164

Sura 50, Verse 45: 32

Sura 51, Verse 56: 274

Sura 52, Verse 48: 31

Sura 53, Verse 32: 202

Sura 53, Verse 36: 176

Sura 54, Verse 17: 278

Sura 54, Verse 54: 278

Sura 57, Verse 25: 95, 275

Sura 57, Verse 27: 197

Sura 58, Verse 3: 230

Sura 58, Verse 11: 135

Sura 60, Verses 8–9: 177

Sura 61, Verses 2–3: 280

Sura 61, Verses 7–9: 35

Sura 64, Verse 16: 273

Sura 66, Verse 1: 141

Sura 67, Verse 26: 34

Sura 68, Verse 4: 282

Sura 72, Verses 20–23: 34

Sura 76, Verse 3: 76

Sura 87, Verse 19: 176

Sura 88, Verses 17–20: 241

Sura 88, Verses 21–24: 33

Sura 88, Verses 21–22: 164, 282, 283

Sura 88, Verses 23–24: 275

Sura 88, Verses 25–26: 275

Sura 89, Verses 11–13: 230

Sura 90, Verses 10–18: 158

Sura 90, Verses 11–12: 181

Sura 95, Verse 4: 324

Sura 95, Verse 5: 324

Sura 96, Verses 1–2: 324

Sura 99, Verse 8: 277

Sura 107, Verses 1–7: 158

Sura 107, Verses 1–4: 65

Sura 109, Verse 6: 170

* Index of Personal Names

 A

Aaron, 76

‘Abd al-Raziq, ‘Ali, v, 11, 15, 19, 29–36, 37, 236

‘Abdallah ibn Ubai, 81

‘Abdallah ibn ‘Umar, 122, 123, 198, 200

‘Abduh, Muhammad, 8, 9, 10, 11, 35, 39, 42–45, 105, 209, 304, 314

Abraham, 87, 161, 163, 166, 201, 279–280

Abrahamian, Ervand, 46

Abu al-Khayr, ‘Abd al-Rahman, 203

Abu Bakr, 111, 148, 157, 165, 199, 279

Abu Bakra, 114–119

Abu Da’ud al-Sijistani, 93, 197

Abu Hanifa, 118, 266, 267, 268

Abu Hurayra, 120–126, 198, 257

Abu Lahab, 248

Abu ‘Ubayd al-Qasim ibn Sallam, 172

Abu Yusuf Ya’qub Al-Kindi, 157, 297

Abu Zahra, Muhammad, 125

Adam, 31, 76, 104, 108, 163, 189, 193, 197, 211, 278, 296

Afary, Janet, 10

Afghani (Asadabadi), Jamal al-Din al-, 8, 9, 124, 209

Afkhami, Mahnaz, 101

Aghnides, Nicolas P., 265

Ahmad, Abdullah, 9, 10

Ahmad, Aziz, 7, 24

Ahmad Bey, 10

Ahmad Khan, Sayyid, 8, 9, 153, 314

Ahmad, Khurshid, 7

Ahmad, Leila, 112

Ahmad, Mumtaz, 67, 255

Ahmad, Syed, 153

Ahmad, Zainal Abidin, 157

Ahmad, Zaki, 20–21

Ahmed, Ishtiaq, 4, 67

Ahmed, Qazi Nissar, 12

‘A’isha bint Abi Bakr, 31, 111, 115–118, 120–124, 201

Ait Sabbah, Fatna, 128

Ajami, Fouad, 12

Ajijola, Alhaji Adeleke Dirisu, vi, 24, 239–243

Akhavi, Shahrough, 46, 47, 187

Akhtar, Shabbir, vii, 26, 319–327

‘Alawi, Muhammad bin al-‘Arbi, 20

Alber, Siegbert, 88

Alexander, 153

‘Ali ibn Abi Talib, 52, 53, 79, 80, 110, 111, 115–118, 148, 157, 199, 219, 301

Ali, Ahmed, 18, 30, 37, 47, 73

‘Ali, Muhammad Kurd, 10

Ali, Ameer, 160, 231

‘Ali al-‘Uzzi, ‘Abd al-Mun’im Salih, 121, 124, 125

Alidust, A., 11

Alkim, Hassan al-, 20

Allworth, Edward, 10

Ameer Ali, 160, 231

Amidi, ‘Ali ibn Abi ‘Ali, 267

Amin, Husain Ahmad, 24

Amin, Qasim, 103

Amir Kabir, 10

‘Amiri, Abu al-Hasan al-, 208

Anas ibn Malik, 31, 118–119, 123, 170, 173, 197

Anawati, Georges C., 15, 29, 49, 215

An-Na’im, ‘Abdullahi Ahmed, vi-vii, 12, 25, 222–238

Ansari, Hamied N., 116

Ansari, S.S., 169, 170

Ansari, Zafar Ishaq, 7

Appleby, R. Scott, 25, 244

Aqdisi, Shaykh Jibril ibn ‘Umar al-, 6

‘Aqqad, ‘Abbas Mahmud al-, 137

Aquino, Benigno (Ninoy), 86

Aquino, Corazon, 86, 88

Arberry, A.J., 311

Aristotle, 267

Arkoun, Mohamed, vi, 11, 12, 13, 16, 24–25, 205–221

Asad, Muhammad, 16, 21, 204

Ash’ari, Abu’l-Hasan, 306

Ash’ari, Abu Musa al-, 117, 118

‘Ashmawi, Muhammad Sa’id al-, v, 15, 19, 29, 49–56

‘Asqalani, see Ibn Hajar al’Asqalani

Ataturk, Mustafa Kemal, 309

Auge, Marc, 208

‘Awwa, Muhammad Salim al-, 14–15, 20

Ayoub, Mahmoud, 16

Ayubi, Nazih N., 4, 24, 49

Azad, Maulana Abu al-Kalam, 9, 10, 153, 160

Azmeh, Aziz Al-, 12, 19

 B

Bacon, Francis, 3, 241, 245

Badran, Ali, v

Badran, Margot, v-vi

Bahr al-‘Ulum, Muhammad, 16

Bakhtin, M.M., 130

Balic *, Smail, 179

Baljon, J.M.S., 7

Banu, U.A.B. Razia Akter, 25

Baqilani, Qazi Abu Bakr, 260

Barton, Greg, 284

Bassiouni, M. Cherif, 226

Bayat, Mangol, 10

Bayhaqi, Abu’l-Fadl Muhammad Katib ibn al-, 200

Bayhum, Muhammad Jamil, 105

Bazargan, ‘Abdul ‘Ali, 20

Bazargan, Mehdi, v, 12, 13, 14, 20, 46, 73–84

Bazzaz, Abu Bakr Muhammad al-, 198

Beaufre, Andre, 285

Bechert, Heinz, 215

Behbehani, Sayyid ‘Abdullah, 10

Behbudiy, Mahmud Khoja, 9

Bello, Ahmadu, 21

Bergson, Henri, 314

Berki, A. Himmet, 169

Berque, Jacques, 302

Beus, Spomenka, vi

Bhutto, Benazir, vi, 21, 107–111

Bhutto, Zulfikar Ali, 107

Bigi, Musa Yarullah, 10

Bihbihani, Aqa Muhammad Baqir, 7–8

Bilqis, 121, 131

Binder, Leonard, 4, 13, 14, 23, 67

Binsa’id, Sa’id, 17

Biruni, Abu Rayhan, 297

Bishri, Tariq al-, 23

Blumenberg, Hans, 218

Boisard, Marcel, 80

Bonjol, Imam, 60

Boroujerdi, Mehrzad, 244

Boulby, Marion, 89

Bowden, John, 179

Bradley, F.H., 305

Braudel, Fernand, 217

Brelwi, Ahmad, 6

Brumberg, Daniel, 17

Brunschwig, R., 229

Bucaille, Maurice, 14

Buddha, 151, 152, 153

Bukhari, Muhammad ibn Isma’il al-, 30, 113, 114, 118, 120, 123, 125, 170, 198, 200, 201, 203, 204, 209

Bula$, Ali, vi, 14, 16, 22, 169–178

Bulliet, Richard W., 16

Burns, Peter, v, 24

Buxton, Charles Roden, 10

 C

Caetani, Leone, 173

Calvin, John, 74

Camus, Albert, 189, 191

Capotorti, Francisco, 226

Castoriadis, Cornelius, 211

Causevic*, Mehmed Dzemaludin*, 10

Charfi, Mohammad, 18

Che Man, W.K., 85

Chehabi, H.E., 46, 73, 187

Chehwang-te, 153

Chen, Lung-chu, 226

Chesterton, G.K., 319

Cik di Tiro, Teungku, 60

Clark, Peter, 139

Clarke, Peter B., 15, 239

Cole, Juan, 8

Commins, David Dean, 8

Comte, Auguste, 260

Constantine, 255

Cook, Stanley A., 132

Cooke, Miriam, vi

Corbin, Henry, 297

Coulson, Noel, 231, 232

Cowan, Milton J., 135

Cragg, Kenneth, 295, 322, 324

Cuthell, David D., 11

Cyrus, 153

 D

Dabashi, Hamid, 46, 187

Dahlan, Haji Ahmad, 9, 34

Dali, Salvador, 320, 321

Danesh, Ahmad Makhdum, 9

Daniel, Norman, 3

Davis, Eric, 29

Davis, Gloria, 284

Daud, Wan Mohd. Nor Wan, 132

Daudet, Leon, 179

Debray, Regis, 218

Delacroix, Eugene, 3

Delhomme, Jeanne, 300

Denner, Arthur, 3

Denny, Frederick Mathewson, 304

Descartes, Rene, 189

Dia, Mamadiou, vii, 11, 13, 295–303

Dihlawi, Shah Wali Allah, 160

Diponegoro, 60

Doi, Abdur Rahman I., 14

d’Ollone, H.M.G., 9

Donnelly, Jack, 223

Donohue, John J., 4, 29

Dorraj, Manuchehr, 73

Dudley, James, 233

Dukkali, Abu Shu’ayb al-, 10

Duran, Khalid, 179, 270

Dwyer, Kevin, 4, 18

 E

Eickelman, Dale F., v-vi, 17

El-Affendi, Abdelwahab, 24

Elginty, Khalid, 89

El-Kharboutly, Maitre A., 233

Ellen, Roy F., 5

Emerson, Caryl, 130

Engineer, Asghar Ali, 22

Ercan, Betigul, vi

Esposito, John L., 3, 18, 20, 26, 29, 46, 59, 67, 73, 85, 89, 112, 127, 155, 187, 205, 255, 270, 304

Eve, 108

 F

Fakhreddin, Rizaeddin, 9

Faris, Dr. Muhammad Abu, 93

Farook, Maulvi, 12

Faruqi, Isma’il al-, 228

Fasi, Muhammad ‘Allal al-, 11

Fatima, 110, 111, 118

Fatwa, Haji Andi Mappetahang, 24

Fayez, Ghulam M., vi

Fayz Kashani (Mulla Muhsin), 248

Federspiel, Howard M., 59, 284

Feisthauer, Joseph, 215

Fischer, August, 260

Fitrat, Abdal Rauf, 10

Fluehr-Lobban, Carolyn, 49

Fuda, Farag, 12

Fyzee, Asaf Ali Asghar, 4

 G

Gabriel (Jibril), 34, 271–272

Galanter, Marc, 227

Galilei, Galileo, 74

Gallagher, Nancy, 13

Gandhi, Mohandas K., 151

Gardet, Louis, 215

Gasprinskii (Gaspirali), Ismail Bey, 9, 10

Gauchet, Marcel, 218

Gautier, Guy, 218

Gavan, 169

Geertz, Clifford, 5

Gellner, Ernest, 6

Genceli, Ali, 170

Genghis Khan, 188

Ghalayini, Mustafa al-, 105

GhaneaBassiri, Kambiz, 127

Ghannouchi, Rashid, v, 13, 20, 89–95

Ghazzali, Abu Hamid Muhammad al-, 70, 207, 212, 219, 248, 250, 258, 307, 314, 315, 326

Gibb, Hamilton A.R., 11, 232, 306, 314, 315

Gide, Andre, 189

Gokalp, Zia, 260–262, 264–265

Goldziher, Ignacz, 265

Govorse, Joseph, 282

Graham, William A., 5

Greenidge, C.W.W., 231

Guenon, Rene, 179

Gueron, Georges, 302

 H

Ha Decheng, 10

Habbab bin Mundhir bin al-Jammuh, al-, 40

Habiba, 103

Haddad, Wadi Zaidan, 145

Haddad, Yvonne Yazbeck, 4, 17, 21, 37, 127, 145

Hadi, Sayid Syekh al-, 10

Hafiz, 191

Hajjaj, Muslim ibn al-, 30, 93, 197, 203, 209

Hakim, al-, 165

Hakim al-Naysaburi, M., 197

Hakim, Khalifah Abdul, 160

Hallaj, Abu’l-Mughith, 189

Hamdi, Mohamed Elhachmi, 5

Hamed, F., 16

Hamidullah, Muhammad, 171, 173, 231

Hammoud, Salah-Dine, vi

Hanafi, Hassan, 12, 26

Hanbal, Ahmad ibn, 114, 197, 200, 266

Harun ar-Rashid, 241

Hasan ibn ‘Ali, 80, 118, 148

Hasanuddin, Sultan, 60

Hassan, M. Kamal, vii, 155

Hassan, Rif, 228, 230

Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich, 244

Heidegger, Martin, 190, 244

Henkin, Louis, 226

Heraclius, 114

Herbert, David, 319

Hibri, Azizah al-, 136, 137

Hidayatallah, Sultan, 60

Hippler, Jochen, 3

Hitler, Adolf, 66, 71

Hodgson, Marshall G.S., 114

Holmes, Oliver Wendell, 287

Holquist, Michael, 130

Hooker, M.B., 5

Horten, Max, 262

Hourani, Albert, 8, 9, 29

Howard, Rhoda, 223

Huntington, Samuel P., 3

Hurgronje, C. Snouck, 263

Husayn ibn ‘Ali, 148, 219

Hussain, Yasmin, 15

Hussein, Aziza, 233

Huwaydi, Fahmi, 17

Huzayfa ibn al-Yaman, 81, 170

 I

Ibn ‘Abbas, ‘Abdallah, 197, 198, 199

Ibn ‘Abd al-Barr, 118–119

Ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhab, Muhammad, 6, 258

Ibn ‘Abidin, Muhammad Amin, 55

Ibn ‘Aqil, 93, 214

Ibn ‘Ata’, 120

Ibn al-Athir, ‘Izz al-Din, 115, 119

Ibn Babawayh, Abu Ja’far Muhammad, 209

Ibn Badis, ‘Abd al-Hamid, 11, 19

Ibn Bata, 217

Ibn al-Dayba’, ‘Abd al-Rahman, 30

Ibn al-Fara’, Abu Ya’la, 197

Ibn Hajar al-‘Asqalani, 114–118, 120–121, 123–126

Ibn Hayyan, Jabir, 241

Ibn Hazm, Abu Muhammad ‘Ali, 258

Ibn Hisham, ‘Abd al-Malik, 172

Ibn ‘Ibad, ‘Abdallah, 209

Ibn Jurayj, Abdul Malik, 266, 268

Ibn Kathir, ‘Imad al-Din, 197, 198, 230

Ibn Khaldun, 92, 192, 213, 250, 260

Ibn Maja, Abu ‘Abdallah, 197

Ibn Marzuq, Shams al-Din, 120

Ibn Mujahid, Ahmad ibn Musa, 214

Ibn Qayyim al-Jawziyya, Muhammad, 55, 93, 140

Ibn Rushd, Abu’l-Walid Muhammad, 212, 297

Ibn Sa’d, Muhammad, 115, 123

Ibn Shanabudh, Abu’l-Hasan Muhammad, 214

Ibn Sina, Abu ‘Ali al-Husayn, 216, 314

Ibn Taymiyya, Ahmad ibn ‘Abd al-Halim, 92–93, 197, 236, 258, 284

Ibn Tufayl, Abu Bakr Muhammad, 216

Ibn Tumart, Muhammad, 258, 261

Ibrahim, Ahmad, 15

Ibrahim, Anwar, 157

Illich, Ivan, 131

Imam, Ahmed Naji al-, 15

Imam Sajjad (Zayn al-‘Abidin ‘Ali ibn al-Husayn), 79

Iqbal, Muhammad, vii, 11, 25, 70, 160, 250, 255–269, 286, 306, 314, 315

Irfani, Suroosh, 47

Isaac, 87, 161, 280

Ishaque, Khalid M., 228

Isma’il (Ishmael), 87, 166, 279–280

Israfil, 34

Izoulet, Jean, 193

 J

Jabir ibn ‘Abdallah, 198

Jabir Ibn Hayyan, 241

Jacob Ya ‘qub, 87, 125, 161, 166, 280

Jadaane, Fahmi, 19, 37

Jahiz, Abu ‘Uthman ‘Amr Ibn Bahr al-, 241

Jalaluddin, Shaykh Muhammad Tahir, 9, 10

Jaspers, Karl, 193

Jawziyya, Muhammad Ibn Qayyim al-, 55, 93, 140

Jesus, 30, 74, 87, 133, 147, 152, 153, 161, 166, 216, 273, 280, 299, 326

Jihan, Numan Chelebi, 10

Jinnah, Muhammad Ali, 71

Jones, Francis R., vi

Juergensmeyer, Mark, 3

Julian, 255

 K

Kabir, Humayun, vi, 23, 59, 145–154

Kano, Aminu, 23

Karkhi, Abu’l-Hasan, 267

Keane, John, 4

Keddie, Nikki R., 8

Kemal, Namik, 9

Kennedy, John F., 147

Kepel, Gilles, 244

Keskioglu *, Osman, 169

Khadduri, Majid, 227–228, 229, 230, 231

Khadija, 110–111

Khalaf-Allah, Muhammad Ahmad, v, 12, 15, 19, 37–45

Khalji, ‘Ala’uddin, 149

Khamlichi, Ahmed al-, 118

Khan, Genghis, 188

Khan, Mohammad Akram, 25

Khan, Sayyid Ahmad, 8, 9, 153, 314

Khan, Shafique Ali, 14

Khatib, Shaykh Ahmad, 10

Khayr al-Din, 10

Khomeini, Ruhollah, 25, 46, 47, 73, 78, 80, 235–236, 326

Khuri, Richard K., 12

Kierkegaard, S0ren, 190

Kindi, Abu Yusuf Ya’qub Al-, 157, 297

Kisra, 114

Koksal, Duygu, vi

Kramers, J.H., 232

Krishnaswami, Arcot, 226

Kubba, Laith, 24

Kulayni, Abu Ja’far Muhammad, 209

Kung, Hans, 25, 179, 215

Kurzman, Charles, v, vii, 3–26

 L

Lacroix, Jean, 299, 300, 302

Lagdameo, Amado Luis, 88

Lakeland, Mary Jo, vi, 128

Lambton, Ann K.S., 73

Lane, Edward William, 135

Laoust, Henri, 217

Laroui, Abdallah, 4

Lasswell, Harold D., 226

Lazzerini, Edward, 10

Leary, Virginia A., 155

Lee, Robert D., 11, 205

Lenin, Vladimir Ilich, 285

Lev, Daniel S., 155

Levtzion, Nehemia, 6

Levy, Reuben, 229, 231

Lewis, Bernard, 93

Lewis, Philip, 319

Liebesny, Herbert, 229, 231

Lincoln, Abraham, 96

Linden, Ian, 15

Lowith, Karl, 218

Luciani, Giacomo, 19, 37

Lueg, Andrea, 3

Luqman, 273

Luther, Martin, 74, 262

 M

Ma Mingxin, 6

Macdonald, Duncan Black, 258

Machiavelli, Niccolo, 74

Madani, ‘Abbasi, 17

Madjid, Nurcholish, vii, 26, 59, 284–294

Maghribi, ‘Abd al-Qadir al-, 10

Magnarella, Paul J., 270

Mahdi, al-Sadiq al-, 26

Mahmassani, Sobhi Rajab, 23

Mahmud II, 10

Mahmud Ghaznavi, 77

Mahmutcehajic*, Rusmir, vi, 23, 179–184

Majlesi, Mulla Mohammad Baqer, 248

Majul, Cesar Adib, 85

Makdisi, George, 214

Malcolm X, 127

Malik, Hafeez, 255

Malik, Yassin, 12

Malkom Khan, Mirza, 9

Malti-Douglas, Fedwa, 205

Manglapus, Raul S., 86, 88

Marcel, Gabriel, 300

Mardin, Serif*, 12, 244

Marjani, Fatollah, vi

Marjani, Shihab al-Din, 9

Martin, Vanessa, 10

Marty, Martin E., 25, 244

Marx, Karl, 286

Maryam (Mary), 133, 153

Massad, Joseph, v Massignon, Louis, 296, 297

Mas’udi, 116–118

Matori Abdul Djalil, 19

Matthew, 161, 181, 326

Maurya, Chandragupta, 148

Mawardi, ‘Ali ibn Muhammad, al-, 297

Mawdudi, Sayyid Abul A’la, 7, 93, 137, 157

Mayer, Ann Elizabeth, 23, 25, 222

Maymuna, 123

Mazaheri, Aly, 296

McCloud, Aminah Beverly, 127

McDougal, Myles S., 226

McGhee, Vern W., 130

McKean, Warwick, 223, 226

McLean, George F., 49

M’Daghri, Abdelkebir Alaoui, 14, 17

Meeker, Michael E., 169

Mehmet ‘Ali, 10

Mernissi, Fatima, vi, 17, 22, 112–126

Meron, Theodore, 223

Mill, John Stuart, 245

Milne, R.S., 156

Mir, Mustansir, 128

Mirza Baji, 75

Miskawayh, 213

Miskin, Haji, 6

Mithat Pasa*, 10

Mohd. Nor Wan Daud, Wan, 132

Moltmann, Jurgen, 25, 179

Montesquieu, Charles de Secondat, 3, 74

Moreau, Rene Luc, 195

Mortimer, Edward, 223

Moses, 30, 76, 83, 87, 133, 134, 166, 201, 273, 301

Mounier, Emmanuel, 299

Mourou, ‘Abdelfatah, 17

Mu’adh ibn Jabal, 55, 198, 200–201, 256

Mu’awiya ibn Abi Sufyan, 80–20, 122, 118, 148

Mughira ibn Shu’ba al-, 119

Muhammad ‘Ali Pasha, 258

Muhammad ibn ‘Abdallah, Prophet, passim

Muhammad, Malik Ghulam, 69

Muhammad, Mi’raj, 7

Muhammad Reza Shah Pahlavi, 78

Mulla Muhsin (Fayz Kashani), 248

Munawi, ‘Abd al-Ra’uf ibn Taj al-‘Arifin al-, 198

Munson, Henry, Jr., 20

Muslim ibn al-Hajjaj, 30, 93, 197, 203, 209

Mussolini, Benito, 71

Mutalib, Hussin, 155

Mutawakkil, al-, 165

Muzaffar, Chandra, vi, 13, 23, 155–160

Muztar, A.D., 7

 N

Nafi’, Bashir, 95

Naim, C.M., 255

Na’ini, Muhammad Husayn, 80

Najjar, Hussayn Fawzi al-, 15

Nanda, Ved P., 226

Nasa’i, Abu ‘Abd al-Rahman, 122, 123, 197, 198

Nashat, Guity, 231

Nasr, Seyyed Hossein, 5

Natsir, Muhammad, v, 20, 59–66, 159–160

Naumann, Friedrich, 263

Nawawi, al-, 94, 197

Nazzam, Ibrahim ibn Sayyar, 257

Nedvi, S.M. Ahmed, 169, 170

Nietzsche, Friedrich, 194

Nila, 110

Noah, 76, 141

Noer, Deliar, 59

Noorbaksh, Mehdi, 20

Nuri, Yahya, 80

 O

Oki?, M. Tayyib, 170

 P

Paden, John N., 21, 23

Paige, Glenn D., 4

Pareto, Vilfredo, 194

Parwez, Ghulam Ahmad, 24, 230

Paul, 88

Pavis, Khusraw, 114

Pellat, Charles, 93

Pericles, 281–282

Perroux, Francois, 299, 301

Pickthall, Muhammad Marmaduke, 135, 137

Piscatori, James P., 20

Plato, 180–181, 263

Popper, Karl, 244

Procter-Smith, Marjorie, 128

Pundato, Dimasangcay A., v, 20, 23, 85–88

 Q

Qaddura, Zahiya, 124

Qadir bi-‘llah, al-, 214

Qalamdaran, Haydar ‘Ali, 80

Qaradawi, YusufAl-, vi, 17, 23, 196–204

Qasimi, Jamal al-Din al-, 8

Qutb, Sayyid, 132, 137–138

 R

Radhakrishnan, Sarvepalli, 195

Rahman, Fazlur, vii, 7, 11, 12, 13, 26, 128, 129, 132, 229, 231, 284, 304–318

Rajaee, Farhang, 11, 25, 244

Ramadan, Said, 15, 16

Ramage, Douglas E., 19, 23, 284

Ramcharan, B.G., 223

Rashid Rida, Muhammad, 9, 11, 15, 29

Rassam, Amal, 112

Ratnam, K.J., 155, 156

Rayyis, Muhammad Dia’ al-Din al-, 15

Razi, Abu Bakr Muhammad, 297

Razi, Fakhr al-Din al-, 45, 70, 90, 314

Redjam, Abderrazak, 12

Renan, Ernest, 3, 297

Richard, Yann, 244

Ricklets, M.C., 284

Rinsche, Gunter, 88

Rizvi, Saiyid Athar Abbas, 7

Robles-Piquer, Carlos, 88

Rodinson, Maxime, 3

Roff, William R., 6

Rousseau, Jean-Jacques, 74

Rumi, Jalal al-Din, 160, 248, 249, 251

Rushdie, Salman, 235–236

 S

Sabbah, Fatna Ait, 128

Sachedina, Abdulaziz, 187

Sa’d ibn al-Rabi, 103

Sa’d ibn Mu’adh al-Nu’manal-Aws, 40

Sadat, Anwar, 116

Sa’di, Muslah al-Din, 82

Sadr, Muhammad Baqir, 78

Sadri, Mahmoud, v

Sagiv, David, 19, 49

Sahabi, ‘Ezzatallah, 73

Sahabi, Yadallah, 74

Said Halim Pasha, 259

Said, Edward, 3

Sa’id, Mohammad, 12

Saint-Simon, Henri, 297

Sajoo, Amyn B., 4, 155, 284

Salih, Subhi al-, 12

Salman, 169

Samanhudi, Haji, 59

Sandel, Michael J., 14

Sardar, Ziauddin, 17, 71

Sarkashi, 268

Sarraf, Tahmoores, 46

Sartre, Jean-Paul, 189, 190–191, 326

Saul, 88

Sauri, Abu ‘Abdallah Sufyan, 257

Sawi, Salah Al-, 95

Sboarina, Gabriele, 88

Schacht, Joseph, 232

Schachter, Oscar, 224

Schmidt, Alvin J., 131

Senghor, Leopold Sedar, 295

Shaaban, Bouthaina, 101

Shafi’i, Abu ‘Abdallah Muhammad, 90, 118, 124, 207, 214, 230, 268

Shahin, Emad Eldin, 89

Shahrour, Muhammad, vi, 12, 13, 23, 139–142

Shaikh-Ali, A.S. Al-, vi

Sharama, Arvind, 227

Shari’at Allah, Hajji, 6

Shari’ati, ‘Ali, vi, 11, 13, 16, 23, 47, 187–195

Sharif, M.M., 160

Shatibi, Abu Ishaq al-, 72, 90–91, 264, 267

Shaukani, Muhammad ibn ‘Ali, 267, 268

Shaw, George Bernard, 149

Shawqi, Ahmad Bik, 36

Sheikh, Hassan ‘Abdallah A., 87

Sheldon, W.H., 192

Shepard, William E., 49

Shestack, Jerome J., 223, 224

Shibli Nu’mani, Muhammad, 304, 314

Shidyaq, Ahmad Faris al-, 9

Shihata, Ibrahim, 231

Shirazi, Molla Sadroddin, 246

Shu’aib, 201

Sibay *, Halim Sabit, 258

Siddique, Sharon, 15

Sindi, Muhammad ibn ‘Abd al-Hadi al-, 113

Smith, Jane I., 127, 227

Smith, Wilfred Cantwell, 11, 215, 296

Smith, William Robertson, 132

Solomon, 121

Sonn, Tamara, 304

Soroush, Abdul-Karim, vi, 12, 13, 17, 24, 244–251

Sow, Fatoumata, 112

Stalin, Josef, 305

Stoddard, Philip H., 11

Suhayl, 169

Sukarno, 285

Sulaiman, Sadek J., v, 20, 96–98, 139

Sullivan, Margaret W., 11

Sumayt, Sayyid Ahmad bin, 10

Surkati, Ahmad, 9

Sutomo, Bung Tomo, 61

Suyuti, Jalal al-Din al-, 197, 258

 T

Tabandeh, Sultanhussein, 224, 228, 229, 232

Tabari, Abu Ja’far Muhammad al-, 115–118, 200

Tabataba’i, ‘Allama Mohammad Husayn, 247–249

Tabataba’i, Sayyid Muhammad, 10

Tagore, Rabindranath, 151

Taha, Mahmoud Mohamed, vii, 12, 16, 25, 222, 225, 231, 234, 235, 236, 237, 270–283

Tahtawi, Rifa’a Rafi’ al-, 9

Taj, Afroz, v

Talbi, Mohamed, vi, 23, 161–168

Taleqani, Mahmud, v, 13, 19, 46–48, 73

Talha ibn ‘Ubayd Allah al-Taymi, 116

Tamimi, Azzam, v, 4, 15, 20

Tapper, Richard, 169

Tarvis, Carol, 134

Tarzi, Mahmud, 9

Tehrani, ‘Ali, 80

Teilhard de Chardin, Pierre, 299

Tha’alibi, ‘Abd al-‘Aziz al-, 10, 11

Thornberry, Patrick, 224, 226

Thucydides, 282

Tibi, Bassam, 4, 15

Tirmidhi, Abu ‘Isa Muhammad al-, 31, 200

Tomo, Bung, 61

Towfi, Najm al-Din al-, 55

Toynbee, Arnold Joseph, 66

Troll, Christian W., 8, 145

Tug *, Salih, 171

Turabi, Hasan, 21

Tusi, Muhammad al-Hasan al-, 209

 U

Umayma, 126

Umm Habiba, 122

Umm Salama, 122

Umm Musa, 133

‘Umar ibn ‘Abd al-‘Aziz, 44, 93

‘Umar ibn al-Khattab, 53, 55, 69, 70, 80, 119, 123, 125, 148, 157, 175, 199, 262, 271–272

‘Umar ibn Hasin, 125

‘Uqbi, Tayyib, 6

Usama ibn Zayd, 203

‘Uthman, 110, 111, 115, 116, 117, 148

‘Uzzi, ‘Abd al-Mun’im Salih ‘Ali al-, 121, 124, 125

 V

Vahiduddin, Syed, 22–23, 26

Vakili, Valla, 244

Valensi, Lucette, 3

van Donzel, E.J., 18

Van Dyke, Vernon, 227

Van Ess, Josef, 215

Vasil, R.K., 155

Veinus, Roger, 3

Voll, John Obert, 4, 6, 9, 20

Voltaire, Francois Marie Arouet de, 3, 74

Von Grunebaum, G.E., 24

Von Kremer, Alfred, 264, 265

Von Stietencron, Heinrich, 215

Vorys, Karl von, 155

 W

Wade, Carole, 134

Wadud-Muhsin, Amina, vi, 21, 127–138

Wafi, Ali Abdel Wahid, 228

Wahid, Abdurrahman, 23

Wali, Isa, 21–22

Wali-Allah, Shah, 6–8, 16, 265

Wang Haoran, 9

Wasfy, Mohamed B.E., vi

Watt, Wm. Montgomery, 205

Wehr, Hans, 135

Weil, Eric, 300, 301

Weiss, Leopold, 204

Welch, Claude E., Jr., 155

Whitehead, Alfred North, 305, 314

Widengren, Geo, 215

Woodward, Mark R., 59

 X

X, Malcolm, 127

Xuan Di, 153

 Y

Yalyin, Huseyin Cahit, 173

Yasmina, Lalla, 120

Yavari-d’Hellencourt, Nouchine, 16

Yazdi, Ebrahim, 20–51

Yazid, 148

Yusuf (Joseph), 92, 125

Yusuf Ali, Abdullah, 132, 153, 156, 157, 162, 163, 164

 Z

Zafar, S.M., v, 20, 59, 67–72

Zakaria, Rafik, 16–17

Zakariyya, Fuad, 19

Zamakhshari, Abu’l Qasim Mahmud al-, 137

Zanjani, Sayyid Abolfazl, 81

Zarkashi, Muhammad ibn Bahadur, 121–124, 268

Zartman, I. William, 4

Zayn al-‘Abidin ‘Ali ibn al-Husayn, 79

Zein-ed-Din, Nazira, v-vi, 21, 101–111

Zia-ii-Haq, Mohammad, 107, 109

Zubair ibn al-‘Awwam, al-, 116

Zuhri, Muhammad ibn Muslim, 266

 [Back Cover]

“Liberal Islam” is not a contradiction in terms; it is a thriving tradition and undergoing a revival within the last generation. This anthology presents the work of 32 prominent Muslims who share parallel concerns with Western liberalism separation of church and state, democracy, the rights of women and minorities, freedom of thought and human progress Although the West has largely ignored the liberal tradition within Islam, many of these authors are well- known in their own countries as advocates of democracy and tolerance Among these are. Abdul-Karim Soroush, a leading oppositional figure in Iran Nurcholish Madjid. a prominent Indonesian intellectual: Mahmoud Mohamed Taha, a religious reformer executed by the Sudanese government, and Ali Abd al-Raziq, an Egyptian religious scholar whose writings on the separation of church and state have been controversial since the 1920s In an analytical introduction, editor Charles Kurzman discusses the history of the liberal tradition in Islam and identifies the main currents in liberal Islamic thought.

This collection will be an important resource for scholars and students of Islam, the Middle East, and international affairs, and will also help to redress the imbalance in our perceptions of the Islamic world.

“This important book makes available for the first time in English a selection of writings from Muslim thinkers engaged with the issues of global modernity. Most Euro-Americans have generally had to be content with the skewed stereotypes and soundbites provided by the media, which portray all Muslims as anti-Western fanatics. Thoughtful readers here have access to the alternative voices of 20th-century Muslim intellectual life The breadth and sophistication of this collection make it the indispensable sourcebook for anyone concerned with modern Islamic reflections on democracy, politics, and religion.”

<right>

—Carl W Ernst. University of North Carolina

</right>

“This book provides a valuable introduction to many significant Muslim thinkers whose importance is ignored by headline hunters w-ho miss the major historical trends. It musi become the standard sourcebook for anyone seriously interested in modern and contemporary Muslim thought.”—John O. Voll, Center for Muslim-Christian Understanding, Georgetown University

About the Editor

Charles Kurzman is Assistant Professor of Sociology at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill Trained at Harvard and Berkeley, he specializes in cross-cultural studies of antiauthoritarian movements He has written extensively on the Iranian Revolution of 1979 and is currently writing a book on constitutional revolutions

ISBN 978-0-19-511622-9

Cover Design by Jeffrey J Faville

[1] All dates are given in the Christian calendar, also known as the Common Era calendar, unless noted.

[2] On despotism, see Lucette Valensi, The Birth of the Despot: Venice and the Sublime Porte, translated by Arthur Denner (Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1993). On violence, see Maxime Rodinson, Europe and the Mystique of Islam, translated by Roger Veinus (Seattle: Near Eastern Studies, University of Washington, 1987), pp. 58–59. On exoticism, see Edward Said, Orientalism (New York: Vintage Books, 1978). On Islamic faith, see Norman Daniel, Islam and the West: The Making of an Image (Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1960). The Bacon quotation is taken from Essays or Counsels (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1908), p. 41; the Renan quotation from Ernest Renan, Oeuvres completes (Complete Works) (Paris: Calmann-Livy, 1947), volume 2, p. 333.

[3] John L. Esposito, The Islamic Threat: Myth or Reality? (New York: Oxford University Press, 1992); Samuel P. Huntington, “The Clash of Civilizations?” Foreign Affairs, volume 72, Summer 1993, pp. 22–49; Mark Juergensmeyer, The Next Cold War? (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993); Jochen Hippler and Andrea Lueg, editors, The Next Threat: Western Perceptions of Islam (London: Pluto Press, 1995).

[4] Quoted in Bassam Tibi, Islam and the Cultural Accommodation of Social Change (Boulder, Colo.: Westview, 1990), p. 73.

[5] Yvonne Yazbeck Haddad, Islamists and the Challenge of Pluralism (Washington, D.C.: Center for Contemporary Arab Studies and Center for Muslim-Christian Understanding, Georgetown University, Occasional Papers, 1995), p. 4.

[6] Asaf A.A. Fyzee, “The Reinterpretation of Islam,” in John J. Donohue and John L. Esposito, editors, Islam in Transition: Muslim Perspectives (New York: Oxford University Press, 1982), p. 193.

[7] Leonard Binder, Islamic Liberalism: A Critique of Development Ideologies (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1988); Abdallah Laroui, “Islam et Liberte” (Islam and Liberty), in Islam et Modernite (Islam and Modernity) (Paris: Editions la Decouverte, 1987), pp. 47–63; Kevin Dwyer, Arab Voices: The Human Rights Debate in the Middle East (London: Routledge; Berkeley: university of California Press, 1991). Among other studies of liberal Islam, see Ishtiaq Ahmed, The Concept of an Islamic State: An Analysis of the Ideological Controversy in Pakistan, Stockholm Studies in Politics, volume 28 (Stockholm: Department of Political Science, University of Stockholm, 1985); Nazih N. Ayubi Political Islam: Religion and Politics in the Arab World (London: Routledge, 1991); I. William Zartman, “Democracy and Islam: The Cultural Dialectic,” The Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, volume 524, 1992, pp. 181–191; John Keane, “Power-Sharing Islam?” in Azzam Tamimi, editor, Power-Sharing Islam? (London: Liberty for Muslim World Publications, 1993), pp. 15–31; Glenn D. Paige et alia, editors, Islam and Nonviolence (Honolulu, Hi.: Center for Global Nonviolence Planning Project, Matsunaga Institute for Peace, University of Hawai'i, 1993); Amyn B. Sajoo, Pluralism in "Old Societies and New States": Emerging ASEAN Contexts (Singapore: Institute of Southeast Asian Studies, 1994); Haddad, Islamists and the Challenge of Pluralism; "Islam and Liberal Democracy," symposium in Journal of Democracy, volume 7, number 2, April 1996, pp. 52–89; and John L. Esposito and John O. Voll, Islam and Democracy (New York: Oxford University Press, 1996).

[8] Mohamed Elhachmi Hamdi, "Islam and Liberal Democracy: The Limits of the Western Model," Journal of Democracy, volume 7, number 2, April 1996, p. 83.

[9] Clifford Geertz, Islam Observed: Religious Development in Morocco and Indonesia (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1968).

[10] Roy F. Ellen, "Social Theory, Ethnography and the Understanding of Practical Islam in South-East Asia," in M.B. Hooker, editor, Islam in South-East Asia (Leiden: E.J. Brill, 1983), p. 65.

[11] For other views on customary Islam, see Seyyed Hossein Nasr, Traditional Islam in the Modern World (London: KPI, 1987); William A. Graham, "Traditionalism in Islam: An Essay in Interpretation," Journal of Interdisciplinary History, volume 23, number 3, Winter 1993, pp. 495–522.

[12] Quoted in Ernest Gellner, Muslim Society (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1981), p. 156.

[13] The best starting point for cross-regional discussion of this period is Nehemia Levtzion and John O. Voll, editors, Eighteenth-Century Renewal and Reform in Islam (Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1987). However, research on the period remains fragmentary.

[14] William R. Roff, “Islamic Movements: One or Many?” in William R. Roff, editor, Islam and the Political Economy of Meaning (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1987), pp. 31–52; John Obert Voll, Islam: Continuity and Change in the Modern World, second edition (Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1994).

[15] Translated in Mi’raj Muhammad, “Shah Wali-Allah’s Concept of the Shari’ah, “ in Islamic Perspectives: Studies in Honour ofMawlana Sayyid Abul A’la Mawdudi, edited by Khurshid Ahmad and Zafar Ishaq Ansari (Leicester, England: The Islamic Foundation, 1979), p. 346. A somewhat different translation appears in J.M.S. Baljon, Religion and Thought of Shah Wali Allah Dihlawi, 1703–1762 (Leiden: E.J. Brill, 1986), p. 162.

[16] Translated in Aziz Ahmad, “Political and Religious Ideas of Shah Wali-Ullah of Delhi,” Muslim World, volume 52, number 1, January 1962, p. 26.

[17] Fazlur Rahman, “The Thinker of Crisis: Shah Waliy-Ullah,” Pakistan Quarterly, volume 6, number 2, Summer 1956, p. 45.

[18] Translated in A.D. Muztar, Shah Wali Allah: A Saint-Scholar of Muslim India (Islamabad: National Commission on Historical and Cultural Research, 1979), p. 204.

[19] See the citations in Saiyid Athar Abbas Rizvi, Shah Wali-Allah and His Times (Canberra, Australia: Ma’rifat Publishing House, 1980), p. 219.

[20] Juan Cole, “Shi’i Clerics in Iraq and Iran, 1722–1780: The Akhbari-Usuli Conflict Reconsidered,” Iranian Studies, volume 18, number 1, Winter 1985, pp. 3–34.

[21] Nikki R. Keddie, An Islamic Response to Imperialism: Political and Religious Writings of Sayyid Jamal ad-Din “al-Afghani” (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1968), p. 171.

[22] Christian W. Troll, Sayyid Ahmad Khan: A Reinterpretation of Muslim Theology (New Delhi: Vikas Publishing House, 1978), p. 275.

[23] Albert Hourani, Arabic Thought in the Liberal Age, 1798–1939 (London: Oxford University Press, 1962), pp. 140–141.

[24] David Dean Commins, Islamic Reform: Politics and Social Change in Late Ottoman Syria (New York: Oxford University Press, 1990), p. 71.

[25] Hourani, Arabic Thought, p. 99; Voll, Islam, p. 163; H.M.G. d’Ollone, Rech.erch.es sur lesMusulmans chinois (Research on Chinese Muslims) (Paris: Ernest Leroux, 1911), pp. 380–381.

[26] Janet Afary, The Iranian Constitutional Revolution, 1906–1911 (New York: Columbia University Press, 1996); Mangol Bayat, Iran’s First Revolution: Shi’ism and the Constitutional Revolution of 1905–1909 (New York: Oxford University Press, 1991); Vanessa Martin, Islam and Modernism: The Iranian Revolution of1906 (London: I.B. Tauris & Co., 1989).

[27] Charles Roden Buxton, Turkey in Revolution (London: T. Fisher Unwin, 1909), pp. 170–171.

[28] Edward Lazzerini, “Ismail Bey Gasprinskii (Gaspirali): The Discourse of Modernism and the Russians,” in Edward Allworth, editor, Tatars of the Crimea: Their Struggle for Survival (Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1988), p. 156.

[29] Fazlur Rahman, “Roots of Islamic Neo-Fundamentalism,” in Change in the Muslim World, edited by Philip H. Stoddard, David D. Cuthell, and Margaret W. Sullivan (Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1981), p. 31.

[30] Abdallah Laroui, “Western Orientalism and Liberal Islam: Mutual Distrust?” MESA Bulletin, volume 31, number 1, July 1997, p. 7.

[31] ‘Ali Shari’ati, “Where Shall We Begin?” translated by A. Alidust and F. Rajaee, in What Is to Be Done? edited by Farhang Rajaee (Houston: The Institute for Research and Islamic Studies, 1986), p. 21. Mamadiou Dia (Senegal, born 1911) makes an entirely contradictory, but similarly sweeping, critique of earlier liberals: “The paradox of Islamic modernism is that it totally ignores modern problems, which are confounded with ancient themes dressed up as modernity. Thus traditional theology remains at the center of modernist thought....” (Mamadiou Dia, Essais sur l’Islam [Essays on Islam], volume 1, Islam et Humanisme [Islam and Humanism] [Dakar, Senegal: Les Nouvelles Editions Africaines, 1977], p. 115).

[32] Quoted in Mohamed Arkoun, Rethinking Islam, translated by Robert D. Lee (Boulder, Colo.: Westview, 1994), p. 25.

[33] Fazlur Rahman, Islam, second edition (Chicago: University of Chicago, 1979), p. 222.

[34] H.A.R. Gibb, Modern Trends in Islam (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1947); Wilfred Cantwell Smith, Modern Islam in India (London: Victor Gallancz, 1946; first published in 1943).

[35] Hassan Hanafi, “Al-Juzur al-tarikhiya lazima alhurriya wa al-dimukratiya fi wujdanuna al-mu’asir” (The Historical Roots of the Impasse with Regard to Freedom and Democracy in our Zeitgeist), Al-Mustaqbal al-‘Arabi (The Arab Future), number 5, January 1979, pp. 130–139. For a discussion of this essay, see Richard K. Khuri, “A Critique of Hassan Hanafi Concerning His Reflections on the Scarcity of Freedom in the Arab-Muslim World,” in Serif * Mardin, editor, Cultural Transitions in the Middle East (Leiden: E.J. Brill, 1994), pp. 86–115.

[36] Aziz Al-Azmeh, Islams and Modernities (London: Verso, 1993), p. 33.

[37] Fouad Ajami, “The Impossible Life of Moslem Liberalism,” New Republic, June 2, 1986, p. 27.

[38] See, for example, the listing of web sites presented in Nancy Gallagher, “Middle East and North Africa Human Rights Activism in Cyberspace,” MESA Bulletin, volume 31, number 1, July 1997, pp. 17–29.

[39] Abdur Rahman I. Doi, Constitutionalism in Islamic Law (Zaria, Nigeria: Centre for Islamic Legal Studies, Ahmadu Bello University, 1977); Maurice Bucaille, The Bible, the Qur’an, and Science (Indianapolis, Ind.: American Trust Publications, 1978); Shafique Ali Khan, Freedom of Thought and Islam (Karachi: Royal Book Co., 1989); Abdelkebir Alaoui M’Daghri, La Liberte de pensee/Freedom of Thought/Hurriyat al-fikr (al-Muhammadiya, Morocco: Matbaat Fazalat, 1991).

[40] On the anomaly of “scripturalist liberalism,” see Binder, Islamic Liberalism, p. 244. On the illiberal elements of Western liberalism, see Michael J. Sandel, Liberalism and the Limits of Justice (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1982); Michael J. Sandel, editor, Liberalism and Its Critics (New York: New York University Press, 1984).

[41] Muhammad Salim Al-Awa, “Political Pluralism from an Islamic Perspective,” in Azzam Tamimi, editor, Power-Sharing Islam? (London: Liberty for Muslim World Publications, 1993), pp. 72–73. See also Muhammed S. El-Awa, On the Political System of the Islamic State [1975], translated by Ahmed Naji al-Imam (Indianapolis, Ind.: American Trust Publications, 1980), p. 83.

[42] Said Ramadan, “Three Major Problems Confronting the World of Islam” [1960], in Ahmad Ibrahim, Sharon Siddique, and Yasmin Hussain, editors, Readings on Islam in Southeast Asia (Singapore: Institute of Southeast Asian Studies, 1985), p. 330.

[43] Hussyn Fawzi al-Najjar, quoted in Bassam Tibi, “Major Themes in the Arabic Political Literature of Islamic Revivalism, 1970–1985,” Part 1, Islam and Christian-Muslim Relations, volume 3, number 2, December 1992, p. 202.

[44] Muhammad Ahmad Khalaf-Allah, translated in chapter 2. See p. 39.

[45] Georges C. Anawati, “Un Plaidayer pour un Islam eclaire (mustanir): Le Livre du Juge Mohammad Sa’id al-‘Ashmawi, Al-Islam al-siyasi (L’Islampolitique)” (A Plea for an Enlightened (Mustanir) Islam: The Book by Judge Muhammad Sa’id al-‘Ashmawi, Al-Islam al-siyasi [Political Islam]), Mideo, volume 19, 1989, pp. 124–125; Binder, Islamic Liberalism, p. 153.

[46] Peter B. Clarke and Ian Linden, Islam in Modern Nigeria: A Study of a Muslim Community in a Post-Independence State, 1960–1983 (Mainz, Germany: Grunewald; Munich, Germany: Kaiser, 1984), p. 89.

[47] Muhammad Asad, The Principles of State and Government in Islam (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1961), p. 48; see also ‘Ali Shari’ati, Histoire et destinee (History and Destiny), translated by F. Hamed and N. Yavarid’Hellencourt (Paris: Sindbad, [1969] 1982), p. 89.

[48] Mahmoud Ayoub, The Qur’an and Its Interpreters, volume 1 (Albany: State University of New York Press, 1984), p. 23.

[49] Ayatollah Syed Mohammad Bahrul Uloom, “Islam, Democracy, and the Future of Iraq,” in Under Siege: Islam and Democracy, edited by Richard W. Bulliet (New York: The Middle East Institute of Columbia University, 1994), p. 26.

[50] Arkoun, Rethinking Islam, p. 94.

[51] Rafik Zakaria, The Struggle within Islam (London: Penguin, 1988), p. 288.

[52] Ziauddin Sardar, Islamic Futures: The Shape of Ideas to Come (London: Mansell, 1985), pp. 102–103.

[53] Yousef Al-Qaradawi, Priorities of the Islamic Movement in the Coming Phase (Cairo: Dar Al-Nashr for Egyptian Universities, 1992), pp. 143–144.

[54] Dale F. Eickelman, “Islamic Liberalism Strikes Back,” MESA Bulletin, volume 27, number 2, December 1993, p. 167.

[55] Reuter’s, March 31, 1991.

[56] Quoted in Daniel Brumberg, “Islam, Elections, and Reform in Algeria,” Journal of Democracy, volume 2, number 1, Winter 1991, p. 64.

[57] Haddad, “Islamists and the Challenge of Pluralism,” p. 18.

[58] Alaoui MDaghri, La Liberte de pensee, p. 38.

[59] Dwyer, Arab Voices, p. 176.

[60] Another possible orthodox response might be to consider past interpretations as having laid the basis for contemporary interpretations. However, the appeal to historical progress is more congenial to liberal Islam than to traditionalists or revivalists. See the discussion of this topic later in this chapter.

[61] “Ibn Khaldun Society—Common Ground,” Trans-StateIslam, volume 3, number 1, Spring 1997, p. 23.

[62] Douglas E. Ramage, Politics in Indonesia: Democracy, Islam, and the Ideology of Tolerance (London: Routledge, 1995), p. 68.

[63] Fahmi Jadane, “Notions of the State in Contemporary Arab-Islamic Writings,” in Giacomo Luciani, editor, The Arab State (London: Routledge, 1990), pp. 251–252.

[64] David Sagiv, Fundamentalism and Intellectuals in Egypt, 1973–1993 (London: Frank Cass, 1995), p. 117.

[65] Al-Azmeh, Islams and Modernities, pp. 25–26.

[66] John L. Esposito and James P. Piscatori, “Democratization and Islam,” Middle East Journal, volume 45, number 3, Summer 1991, pp. 427–440; Esposito and Voll, Islam and Democracy; John O. Voll and John L. Esposito, “Islam’s Democratic Essence,” Middle East Quarterly, volume 1, number 3, September 1994, pp. 3–11.

[67] Mehdi Noorbaksh, “Religion, Politics, and Ideological Trends in Contemporary Iran,” in Jamal S. al-Suwaidi, editor, Iran and the Gulf: A Search for Stability (Abu Dhabi, United Arab Emirates: Emirates Center for Strategic Studies and Research, 1996), pp. 33–34.

[68] Hassan Al-Alkim, “Islam and Democracy: Mutually Reinforcing or Incompatible?” in Azzam Tamimi, editor, Power-Sharing Islam? (London: Liberty for Muslim World Publications, 1993), pp. 81–83.

[69] Ebrahim Yazdi, “Democracy and Human Rights in Islam and Europe,” unpublished text of a speech at the International Conference on Europe and the Islamic World, Bonn, Germany, November 15–16, 1995, p. 3.

[70] Henry Munson, Jr., Religion and Power in Morocco (New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1993), p. 111.

[71] Al-‘Awwa, “Political Pluralism,” p. 70.

[72] Haddad, “Islamists and the Challenge of Pluralism,” pp. 7–8.

[73] Asad, The Principles of State and Government, p. 49.

[74] Hasan Turabi, Women in Islam and Muslim Society (London: Milestones Publishers, circa 1991), p. 46.

[75] John N. Paden, Religion and Political Culture in Kano (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1973), p. 290; see also John N. Paden, Ahmadu Bello: Sardauna of Sokoto (London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1986), p. 302.

[76] Isa Wali, “The True Position of Women in Islam,” The Nigerian Citizen (Zaria, Nigeria), July 14, 1956, p. 3; July 21, 1956, p. 3.

[77] Asghar Ali Engineer, The Rights of Women in Islam (New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1992), pp. 170, 161.

[78] See p. 125.

[79] Syed Vahiduddin, Islamic Experience in Contemporary Thought (Delhi, India: Chanakya Publications, 1986), pp. 108–109.

[80] Ann Elizabeth Mayer, Islam and Human Rights: Tradition and Politics, second edition, (Boulder, Colo.: Westview, 1995), p. 128; Ramage, Politics in Indonesia, p. 64; Binder, Islamic Liberalism, pp. 269–288.

[81] Paden, Religion and Political Culture in Kano, p. 289.

[82] Abdelwahab El-Affendi, Who Needs an Islamic State? (London, England: Grey Seal, 1991), p. 57.

[83] Ghulam Ahmad Parwez, “Two Contrasting Systems,” translated in Aziz Ahmad and G.E. Von Grunebaum, editors, Muslim Self-Statement in India and Pakistan, 1857–1968 (Weisbaden, West Germany: Otto Harrassowitz, 1970), p. 171.

[84] Haji Andi Mappetahang Fatwa, “Some Political Views and Attitudes,” translated by Peter Burns, Indonesia Reports, number 16, June 1986, p. 18.

[85] Laith Kubba, “Islam and Liberal Democracy: Recognizing Pluralism,” Journal of Democracy, volume 7, number 2, April 1996, p. 89.

[86] Quoted in Ayubi, Political Islam, p. 207.

[87] Arkoun, Rethinking Islam, pp. 106–113. An abridged English translation of the declaration is published in Islam: A Challenge for Christianity, edited by Hans Kung and Jurgen Moltmann (London: SCM Press; Maryknoll, N.Y.: Orbis Books, 1994), pp. 140–150. See also the “Cairo Declaration of Human Rights in Islam,” adopted by the Nineteenth Islamic Conference of Foreign Ministers, August 5, 1990 (United Nations Document A/CONF.157/PC/35); and, more generally, Mayer, Islam and Human Rights.

[88] Farhang Rajaee, “Islam and Modernity: The Reconstruction of an Alternative Shi’ite Islamic Worldview in Iran,” in Martin E. Marty and R. Scott Appleby, editors, Fundamentalisms and Society (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1993), p. 116.

[89] U.A.B. Razia Akter Banu, Islam in Bangladesh (Leiden: Brill, 1992), p. 48.

[90] al-Sadiq al-Mahdi, “Islam—Society and Change,” in John L. Esposito, editor, Voices of Resurgent Islam (New York: Oxford University Press, 1983), pp. 236–239.

[91] Hassan Hanafi, Religious Dialogue and Revolution (Cairo: Anglo-Egyptian Bookshop, 1977), p. 202; Hassan Hanafi, Religion, Ideology, and Development (Cairo: Anglo-Egyptian Bookshop, 1995), volume 1, pp. 417–418.

[92] Vahiduddin, Islamic Experience in Contemporary Thought, pp. 63–64.

[93] See below, pp. 312, 317.

[94] Albert Hourani, Arabic Thought in the Liberal Age (London: Oxford University Press, 1962), pp. 184–192.

[95] Georges C. Anawati, “Un Plaidayer pour un Islam eclaire (mustanir): Le Livre du Juge Mohammad Sa’id al-‘Ashmawi, Al-Islam al-siyasi (L’Islampolitique)” (French: A Plea for an Enlightened [Mustanir] Islam: The Book of Judge Muhammad Sa’id al-‘Ashmawi, Al-Islam al-siyasi [Political Islam]), Mideo, volume 19, 1989, pp. 124–125.

[96] Eric Davis, “‘Abd al-Raziq, ‘Ali,” in John L. Esposito, editor, The Oxford Encyclopedia of the Modern Islamic World (New York: Oxford University Press, 1995), volume 1, pp. 5, 7.

[97] John J. Donohue and John L. Esposito, editors, Islam in Transition: Muslim Perspectives (New York: Oxford University Press, 1982), pp. 29–37.

[98] As the two Shaykhs [Muslim ibn al-Hajjaj, circa 821–875, and Muhammad ibn Isma'il Bukhari, 810–870] have narrated: "Thus prophets are sent from the best families of their clans ..." which is part of a long hadith [tradition of the Prophet]. See Taysir al-wusul ila al-jami' al-usul [The Facilitation of Arriving at the Compendium of Fundamentals, by 'Abd al-Rahman Ibn al-Dayba' (1461–1537)], part 3, p. 320.

[99] [Translations of Qur'anic verses are taken, with modifications, from Al-Qur'an: A Contemporary Translation, translated by Ahmed Ali, revised definitive edition (Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1988).—Editor]

[100] Reported by 'A'isha [wife of the Prophet, circa 614–678] at the beginning of the Revelation. Recorded by the two Shaykhs.

[101] Reported by Anas [ibn Malik, a companion of the Prophet, 710–796], recorded by [Abu 'Isa Muhammad] al-Tirmidhi [collector of hadith, died 892].

[102] [Two letters of the Arabic alphabet. 28 of 114 suras of the Qur'an begin with letters.—Editor]

[103] ["Muslim" means "one who submits" to God.—Editor]

[104] The Biography of the Prophet, by Ahmad bin Zayni Dahlan, who died in the year 1304 of the hijra [1923 A.D.]. From the book entitled Iktifa' al-qanu' bima huwa matbu' [The Contentment of the Satisfied with What Is Printed].

[105] Risalat al-tawhid [Treatise on Unity], by Shaykh Muhammad 'Abduh [1849–1905], pp. 122–123.

[106] Ahmad Bik Shawqi [1868–1932].

[107] Yvonne Yazbeck Haddad, Contemporary Islam and the Challenge of History (Albany: State University of New York Press, 1982), pp. 46–53.

[108] Fahmi Jadaane, “Notions of the State in Contemporary Arab-Islamic Writings,” in Giacomo Luciani, editor, The Arab State (London: Routledge, 1990), p. 280.

[109] [Translations of Qur’anic verses are taken, with modifications, from Al-Qur’an: A Contemporary Translation, translated by Ahmed Ali, revised definitive edition (Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1988).—Editor]

[110] [Meccan verses were revealed to the Prophet in Mecca, prior to the hijra [emigration] of 622 A.D.; Medinan verses were revealed to the Prophet in Medina, after the hijra. —Editor]

[111] Shahrough Akhavi, Religion and Politics in Contemporary Iran (Albany: State University of New York Press, 1980), pp. 117–129; H.E. Chehabi, Iranian Politics and Religious Modernism (Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1990), p. 154 et passim; Hamid Dabashi, Theology of Discontent: The Ideological Foundations of the Islamic Revolution in Iran (New York: New York University Press, 1993), pp. 216–272; H.E. Chehabi, “Taleqani, Mahmud,” in John L. Esposito, editor, The Oxford Encyclopedia of the Modern Islamic World (New York: Oxford University Press, 1995), volume 4, pp. 181–182.

[112] Ervand Abrahamian, The Iranian Mojahedin (New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1989); Tahmoores Sarraf, Cry of a Nation:

The Saga of the Iranian Revolution (New York: Peter Lang, 1990), pp. 149–151.

[113] Shahrough Akhavi, “Islam, Politics and Society in the Thought of Ayatullah Khomeini, Ayatullah Taliqani and Ali Shariati,” Middle Eastern Studies, volume 24, number 4, October 1988, p. 424.

[114] Suroosh Irfani, Iran’s Islamic Revolution (London: Zed, 1983), p. ii.

[115] [Translations of Qur’anic verses are taken, with modifications, from Al-Qur’ an: A Contemporary Translation, translated by Ahmed Ali, revised definitive edition (Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1988).—Editor]

[116] Nazih N. Ayubi, Political Islam: Religion and Politics in the Arab World (London,: Routledge, 1991), p. 203.

[117] This was the original title of ‘Ashmawi’s book. Other writings of ‘Ashmawi are now available in English in Carolyn Fluehr-Lobban, editor, Against Islamic Extremism (Gainesville, Fl.: University Press of Florida, 1998).

[118] David Sagiv, “Judge Ashmawi and Militant Islam in Egypt,” Middle Eastern Studies, volume 28, number 3, July 1992, pp. 531–546; Georges C. Anawati, “Un Plaidayer pour un Islam eclaire (mustanir): Le Livre du Juge Mohammad Sa’id al-‘Ashmawi, Al-Islam al-siyasi (LIslam politique)” (French: A Plea for an Enlightened [Mustanir] Islam: The Book of Judge Muhammad Sa’id al-‘Ashmawi, Al-Islam alsiyasi [Political Islam]), Mideo, volume 19, 1989, pp. 91–128; William E. Shepard, “Muhammad Sa’id al-‘Ashmawi and the Application of the Shari’a in Egypt,” International Journal of Middle East Studies, volume 28, number 1, February 1996, pp. 39–58.

[119] Lisan al-‘Arab [Dictionary of Arabic], article on “Shara’a. “

[120] Collection of Preparatory Work for the Civil Code, volume 1, pp. 184, 189, 191.

[121] See M.S. al-‘Ashmawi, Al-Riba wa’l-fa’ idafi’ l-Islam (Usury and Interest in Islam) (Cairo: Dar Sina, 1988).

[122] Majallat al-qudat [Judges’ Journal], numbers 3–4, March-April, 1986, p. 44.

[123] Howard M. Federspiel, Persatuan Islam: Islamic Reform in Twentieth Century Indonesia (Ithaca, N.Y.: Modern Indonesia Project, Southeast Asia Program, Cornell University, 1970); Deliar Noer, The Modernist Muslim Movement in Indonesia, 1900–1942 (Singapore: Oxford University Press, 1973).

[124] Peter Burns, Revelation and Revolution: Natsir and the Panca Sila (Townsville, Australia: Committee of South-East Asian Studies, James Cook University of North Queensland, Southeast Asian Monograph Series No. 9, 1981), p. 31.

[125] Mark R. Woodward, “Natsir, Mohammad,” in John L. Esposito, editor, The Oxford Encyclopedia of the Modern Islamic World (New York: Oxford University Press, 1995), volume 3, pp. 239–240.

[126] Leonard Binder, Religion and Politics in Pakistan (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1963); Mumtaz Ahmad, “Pakistan,” in John L. Esposito, editor, The Oxford Encyclopedia of the Modern Islamic World (New York: Oxford University Press, 1995), volume 3, pp. 289–293.

[127] Ishtiaq Ahmed, The Concept of an Islamic State: An Analysis of the Ideological Controversy in Pakistan (London: Frances Pinter, 1987), pp. 36, 150–162.

[128] [English-language edition published in 1987 in London by Mansell.—Editor]

[129] Ann K.S. Lambton, “A Reconsideration of the Position of theMarj’a al-Taqlid and the Religious Institution,” Studia Islamica, volume 20, 1964, pp. 115–135.

[130] H.E. Chehabi, Iranian Politics and Religious Modernism (Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1990); Manochehr Dorraj, “Bazargan, Mehdi,” in John L. Esposito, editor, The Oxford Encyclopedia of the Modern Islamic World (New York: Oxford University Press, 1995), volume 1, pp. 211–213.

[131] [Translations of Qur’anic verses are taken, with modifications, from Al-Qur’an: A Contemporary Translation, translated by Ahmed Ali, revised definitive edition (Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1988). Bazargan’s slightly different numbering of verses has been edited to conform to the other selections in this collection.—Editor]

[132] [Sahabi, the son of Bazargan’s long-time colleague Yadallah Sahabi, had emerged as leader of the left wing of Bazargan’s Freedom Movement of Iran. While remaining liberal, Sahabi is more critical of Western-style liberal democracy than Bazargan. A subtext of Bazargan’s speech is a defense of liberalism against the left wing of the Freedom Movement, as well as against anti-democratic forces in the Islamic Republic.—Translator]

[133] For further information on this thesis and its comparison with other social philosophies, see my book Be’ sat va ide’ olozhi [Prophetic Mission and Ideology], part I.

[134] The Renaissance of the 15th and 16th centuries commenced with a renewed interest in the Greek art in Italy, particularly after the advent of the print technology.

[135] [The author uses the terms ‘ulama’ and ruhaniyat interchangeably. Both are translated here as “religious scholars.”—Editor]

[136] [Inquisition is] contrary to the Qur’an, which states: “O you who believe, avoid most suspicions: some suspicions are indeed sins. So do not pry into others’ secrets and not backbite.” (Sura 49, Verse 12)

[137] The Holy Qur’an, too, states that “there are priests and monks and scholars among them, and they are not arrogant.” [Sura 5, Verse 82]

[138] Sura 17, Verse [<verbatim>20</verbatim>]: “We bestow the gifts of your Lord on these and those, for the gifts of your Lord are not restricted.” The answer to the first question, whether Islam has left people to do whatever they wish in this world without any obligations or limits, will be addressed at the end of this article.

[139] The charter of the Freedom Movement of Iran, May 15, 1961, declares: “The servitude of God requires refusal of servitude of any other master. Gratefulness to God is contingent upon gaining freedom and utilizing it to attain rights, justice, and service.” The question arising from this proposition, whether Islamic government should refrain from checking corruption and decadence in society, will be addressed at the end of the article.

[140] [Such compilations of religious opinions are a relatively modern phenomenon in Shi i ritual observance. Akin to the Jewish tradition of “Responsa,” these essays are authored by independent religious scholars who aspire to be a “source of imitation” for other Shi’i Muslims. Those who choose to follow the religious edicts of a particular “source of imitation” seek his views on specific subjects in these essays.—Translator]

[141] The late martyr Muhammad Baqir Sadr [Iraqi religious scholar, 1935–1980] states in one of his essays, translated [from Arabic into Persian] under the title Hamrah ba tahavol-e ijtihad [Accompanying the Evolution of Ijtihad (Islamic Interpretation)]: “the move toward ijtihad among the Shi’is was almost coeval with their withdrawal from politics ... and this departure from politics ... gave rise to the idea that the proper arena for religious thought is ... bringing the individual—not the society—into compliance with religion. Thus it was that in the opinion of religious jurisprudence, ijtihad came to be applied to the Muslim individual rather than Muslim society.”

[142] [The author played a crucial and well-documented role in these events. —Translator]

[143] The word “among” means among those who are members of society and responsible and the owners of the property in question, not those without work and responsibility, for instance employees and laborers....

[144] The same verse that states “and consult them concerning the affair” [Sura 3, Verse 159] advises the following: (after consultation and the soliciting of opinions), once you have reached a decision, then place your trust in God. That is, have confidence in the virtue of its [the decision’s] outcome.

[145] In the dawn and dusk prayer called “The Manuscript of Imam Sajjad” [Zayn al-‘Abidin ‘Ali ibn al-Husayn, circa 656–714], we read: “O our nurturing teacher, grant us success in this day and this night and in all our days so we can practice goodness, avoid evil ... defy falsehood, serve the truth, guide the confused, and help the weak....”

[146] Sura 39, Verses 17–18: “So give glad tidings to My creatures. Those who listen to the Word and follow the best it contains, are the ones who have been guided by God, and are men of wisdom.”

[147] Sura 12, Verse 108: “Say: ‘My way, and that of my followers, is to call you to God with full perception. All glory to God, I am not an idolater.’” See also Sura 41, Verse 5.

[148] For instance, Hokumat dar Islam [Government in Islam], by [Haydar ‘Ali] Qalamdaran; Be’sat va ide’ olozhi [Prophetic Mission and Ideology], by [Mehdi] Bazargan; Hokumat-e Islami [Islamic Government], by Yahya Nuri; and Medina-ye fazeleh, ya sistem-e hokumat dar Islam [Learned Medina (Utopia), or the System of Government in Islam], by ‘Ali Tehrani. Also, Imam Khomeini has presented his own opinion of Islamic government in his Velayat-e faqih [Mandate of the Jurisprudent].

[149] Sura 9, Verse 6: “And if an idolater seeks protection, then give him asylum that he may hear the word of God. Then escort him to a place of safety, for they are people who do not know.”

[150] These two narratives are taken from Mosir-e enqelabe Islami [The Course of the Islamic Revolution], notes dated September 12, 1980, by Ayatollah Hajji Sayyid Abolfazl Zanjani.

[151] See my ‘Eshq va parastesh, ya termodinamik-e ensan [Love and Worship, or the Thermodynamics of Humanity].

[152] It is obvious that opposition in this context is an external force, different from materialist-dialectical opposition, involving an internal antithesis that is said to be inevitable, global, and social.

[153] See [my] book Bad va baran dar Quran [Wind and Rain in the Qur’an] where many verses (more than 115 passages) are quoted that bear witness to this argument. [A series of citations follows.—Editor]

[154] Sura 3, Verse 141: “This is so that God may try the faithful and destroy the unbelievers.” Sura 3, Verse 154: “God had to try them to bring out what they concealed in their breasts, and to bring out the secrets of their hearts, for God knows your innermost thoughts.”

[155] The text of Sura 4, Verse [<verbatim>59</verbatim>], is as follows: “O you who believe, obey God, and obey the Prophet and those in authority among you; and if (mutual opposition occurs and) you are at variance over something, refer this (matter and disagreement) to God and the Messenger. […]” It is noteworthy that on five or six other occasions the faithful are told to obey God and the Prophet; only in this occasion is the phrase “those in authority” added, and that is qualified by the phrase “among you” (which could mean elected rulers). It is further stipulated that in case there appears a disagreement between the people and the rulers it should be referred to the other two authorities [God and the Prophet].

[156] W.K. Che Man, Muslim Separatism: The Moros of Southern Philippines and the Malays of Southern Thailand (Singapore: Oxford University Press, 1990), pp. 197–199; Che Man, “Moro National Liberation Front,” and Cesar Adib Majul, “Philippines,” in John L. Esposito, editor, The Oxford Encyclopedia of the Modern Islamic World (New York: Oxford University Press, 1995), volume 3, pp. 132–133 and 326–328; Majul, The Contemporary Muslim Movement in the Philippines (Berkeley, Calif.: Mizan Press, 1985).

[157] Marion Boulby, “The Islamic Challenge: Tunisia since Independence,” Third World Quarterly, volume 10, Number 2, April 1988, pp. 590–614; Khalid Elginty, “The Rhetoric of Rashid Ghanushi,” Arab Studies Journal, volume 3, number 1, Spring 1995, pp. 101–119; Emad Eldin Shahin, “Ghannushi, Rashid al-;” in John L. Esposito, editor, The Oxford Encyclopedia of the Modern Islamic World (New York: Oxford University Press, 1995), volume 2, pp. 60–61.

[158] Abu Ishaq al-Shatibi, Al-Muwafaqat fi usul al-shar a] [The Correspondences on the Methodology of Islamic Law], volume 2, pp. 6–8.

[159] Ibid.

[160] Ibid.

[161] Ibn Khaldun, Al-Muqaddima [The Introduction].

[162] Ibn Taymiyya, Al-Fatawa [Religious Judgments], volume 19, pp. 218–219.

[163] [The term’s meaning is debated; see C. Pellat, “Hilf al-fudul,” Encyclopedia of Islam, second edition, volume 2, edited by B. Lewis, et al. (Leiden: E.J. Brill; London: Luzac and Company, 1971), p. 389.—Editor]

[164] Muslim [ibn al-Hajjaj, 821–875] and Abu Da’ud [al-Sijistani, 817–889]. [Both men are authors of hadith collections.—Editor]

[165] Ibn Qayyim al-Jawziyya [1292–1350], Al-Turuq al-hukmiyya [The Ways of Governance], p. 13.

[166] [Abul A’la] Mawdudi [1903–1979], The Islamic Government; Dr. M[uhammad] Abu Faris, Tahrim al-musharaka fil-hukuma [The Illegality of Participation in the Government].

[167] Imam Al-Nawawi, Al-Arba’un hadithan [Forty Hadiths].

[168] Dr. Salah Al-Sawi, Al-Ta ‘addudiya al-siyasiyya f aldawla al-Islamiyya [Political Pluralism in Islamic Government, 1992], p. 142.

[169] Dr. Bashir Nafi’ article in Al-Hayat [Life], number 10984, March 9, 1993.

[170] Interview with Dale F. Eickelman, November 9, 1996.

[171] Bouthaina Shaaban, “The Muted Voices of Women Interpreters,” in Mahnaz Afkhami, editor, Faith and Freedom: Women’s Human Rights in the Muslim World (Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1995), p. 65.

[172] “Biographical Note,” Women’s Studies International Forum, volume 5, number 2, 1982, p. 223.

[173] Benazir Bhutto, Daughter of Destiny (New York: Simon and Schuster, 1989), pp. 368, 392.

[174] See also Benazir Bhutto, “The Fight for the Liberation of Women” (Remarks at the Fourth United Nations Conference on Women, Beijing, China, September 4, 1995), Women’s Studies Quarterly, volume 24, numbers 1–2, Spring-Summer 1996, pp. 91–97.

[175] [This list includes the two largest sects of Islam, Sunnism and Shi’ism; two schools of thought within Sunnism, the Hanafis and the Malakis; and a revivalist sect founded in northern India in the late nineteenth century, the Barelwis.—Editor]

[176] Amal Rassam, “Mernissi, Fatima,” in John L. Esposito, editor, The Oxford Encyclopedia of the Modern Islamic World (New York: Oxford University Press, 1995), volume 3, pp. 93–94.

[177] Leila Ahmad, “Feminism and Feminist Movements in the Middle East,” Women’s Studies International Forum, volume 5, number 2, 1982, pp. 153–168.

[178] Fatoumata Sow, “Le Harem Politique” (The Political Harem), in Fippu, Journal de Yewwu Yewwi pour la liberation des femmes (Fight Back, Journal of “Liberation through Consciousness” for the Liberation of Women) (Dakar, Senegal), number 2, April 1989, p. 33.

[179] Morocco, Ministere de l’Artisanat et des Affaires Sociales, Les Femmes marocaines dans le developpement economique et social, decennie 1975–1985 [Moroccan Women in Social and Economic Development, the Decade 1975–1985].

[180] Al-Bukhari, Al-Sahih (Collection of Authentic Hadiths), with commentary by al-Sindi (Beirut, Lebanon: Dar al-Ma’rifa, 1978). The hadith quoted by the schoolteacher is in volume 4, p. 226.

[181] Ibn Hajar al-‘Asqalani, Huda al-sari, muqaddimatFath al-bari [The Traveller’s Guide, Introduction to “The Creator’s Conquest’”], commonly known as Fath al-bari [The Creator’s Conquest]. It comprises al-Bukhari’s text with a commentary by al-‘Asqalani. The hadith that concerns us here, on the necessity of excluding women from power, is found on p. 46 of volume 13 of the edition of Al-Matba’a al-Bahiya al-Misriya (1928) and on p. 166 of volume 16 of the edition of Maktaba Mustafa al-Babi al-Halabi fi Misr (1963). (Future page references are to the 1928 edition.)

[182] The Muslim world is divided into two parts: the Sunnis (orthodox) and the Shi’ites (literally, schismatics). Each group has its own specific texts offiqh (religious knowledge), especially as regards sources of the shari ‘a (legislation and laws). The Sunnis are split between four madhahib (schools).... The differences between them most frequently relate to details of juridical procedures.

[183] ‘Asqalani, Fath al-bari, volume 13, p. 46.

[184] See Hodgson, Venture of Islam, volume 1, p. 199.

[185] ‘Asqalani, Fath al-bari, volume 13, p. 46.

[186] On this dilemma and the division that it occasioned, see ‘Asqalani, Fath al-bari, volume 13, p. 49. On the political implications and the philosophical debates that the Battle of the Camel aroused, see the extraordinary description by [Abu Ja’far Muhammad] Tabari [died 922] in his Tarikh al-umam wa al-muluk [History of Imams and Kings] (Beirut, Lebanon: Dar Al-Fikr, 1979), volume 5, pp. 156–225.

[187] [Muhammad] Ibn Sa’d [784–845], [Kitab] al-tabaqat al-kubra [The Great Book of Classes] (Beirut, Lebanon: Dar Sadir, no date), volume 3, p. 159.

[188] Ibn Sa’d, Al-Tabaqat, p. 159.

[189] ‘Asqalani, Fath al-bari, volume 13, p. 622.

[190] [‘Izz al-Din] Ibn al-Athir [1160–1233], Usd al-ghaba f [ma’rifat] al-sahaba [The Lions of the Forest, on Knowing the Companions of the Prophet] (Beirut, Lebanon: Dar al-Fikr li al-Tiba’a wa al-Tawzi’, no date), volume 5, p. 38.

[191] Mas’udi [died 956], Muruj [al-zahab] [Meadows of Gold], volume 2, p. 380; and the French translation of this work, Les Prairies d’ or [Prairies of Gold], volume 3, p. 646.

[192] Tabari, Tarikh, volume 5, p. 182.

[193] ‘Asqalani, Fath al-bari, volume 13, p. 46.

[194] ‘Asqalani, Fath al-bari, volume 13, pp. 50 and 51 for the first version, and p. 44 for the second.

[195] See the analysis of Hamied N. Ansari, “The Islamic Militants in Egyptian Politics,” International Journal of Middle East Studies, volume 16, number 1, 1984, pp. 123–144.

[196] [Bracketed comments in indented quotations in this chapter are the author’s, not the editor’s.—Editor]

[197] Tabari, Tarikh, volume 5, p. 179.

[198] ‘Asqalani, Fath al-bari, volume 13, p. 46.

[199] Mas’udi, Muruj, volume 2, p. 378; and the French translation, volume 2, p. 644.

[200] Tabari, Tarikh, volume 5, p. 221.

[201] Tabari, Tarikh, volume 5, p. 188.

[202] Bukhari, Sahih, volume 4, pp. 221ff.

[203] Mas’udi, Les Prairies dor, volume 2, p. 645.

[204] Tabari, Tarikh, volume 5, p. 190.

[205] ‘Asqalani, Fath al-bari, volume 13, pp. 51ff; Mas’udi, Muruj, volume 3, pp. 4ff; and al-Tabari, Mohammed, Sceau des prophetes [Muhammad, Seal of the Prophets] (Paris: Sindbad, 1980), volume 6, p. 95.

[206] ‘Asqalani, Fath al-bari, volume 13, p. 56.

[207] For assistance with the research for this chapter, I am indebted to Professor Ahmed al-Khamlichi, Chairman of the Department of Private Law, Faculte de Droit, Universite Mohammed V, Rabat, Morocco.

[208] Ibn ‘Abd al-Barr [978–1070], Al-Intiqa’ fi fadl althalath al-a’imma al-fuqaha’ [The Selection, on the Merits of the Three Founding Jurists] (Beirut, Lebanon: Dar al-Kutub al-‘Ilmiya, no date), pp. 10, 16.

[209] Ibn ‘Abd al-Barr, Al-Intiqa’, p. 16.

[210] Ibn ‘Abd al-Barr, Al-Intiqa’, p. 16.

[211] Ibn ‘Abd al-Barr, Al-Intiqa’, p. 15.

[212] Ibn al-Athir, Usd al-ghaba, volume 5, p. 38.

[213] ‘Umar ibn al-Khattab institutionalized the recourse to capital punishment for fornication; his contemporaries were not at all in agreement with his position. See Bukhari, Sahih, volume 4, pp. 146ff.... ‘Umar ibn al-Khattab ... was [also] the instigator of the wearing of the veil and was in complete disagreement with the Prophet about the way to treat women.

[214] ‘Asqalani, Fath al-bari, volume 13, p. 47.

[215] Bukhari, Sahih, volume 1, p. 99.

[216] Bukhari, Sahih, volume 1, p. 199.

[217] Ibn Hajar al-‘Asqalani, Al-Isaba f tamyiz al-sahaba [A Biographical Dictionary of the Companions of the Prophet] (Cairo: Maktaba al-Dirasa al-Islamiya Dar al-Nahda, no date), volume 8, p. 18.

[218] ‘Asqalani, Al-Isaba, volume 7, p. 427.

[219] ‘Abd al-Mun’im Salih al-‘Ali al-‘Uzzi, Difa’ ‘an Abi Hurayra [In Defense of Abu Hurayra], second edition (Beirut, Lebanon: Dar al-Qalam; Baghdad: Maktaba al-Nahda, 1981), p. 13.

[220] ‘Asqalani, Al-Isaba, volume 7, p. 426.

[221] ‘Asqalani, Al-Isaba, volume 7, p. 434.

[222] ‘Asqalani, Al-Isaba, volume 7, p. 441.

[223] Imam [Muhammad ibn Bahadur al-]Zarkashi [circa 1344–1392], Al-Ijaba li-irad ma istadrakathu ‘A isha ‘ala alsahaba [Collection of’A ‘isha’s Corrections to the Statements of the Companions], second edition (Beirut, Lebanon: Al-Maktab al-Islami, 1980), p. 118.

[224] ‘Asqalani, Al-Isaba, volume 7, p. 440.

[225] Imam Zarkashi, Al-Ijaba, p. 112.

[226] Imam Zarkashi, Al-Ijaba, p. 112.

[227] Imam Zarkashi, Al-Ijaba, pp. 112, 113.

[228] Imam Zarkashi, A l-Ijaba, p. 111.

[229] Imam Zarkashi, Al-Ijaba, p. 115.

[230] Imam [Abu ‘Abd al-Rahman al-]Nasa’i [830–915], Sunan [Hadith Collection] (Cairo: Al-Matba’a al-Misriya, no date), volume 1, p. 155.

[231] Nasa’i, Sunan, volume 1, p. 155.

[232] Nasa’i, Sunan, volume 1, p. 147.

[233] Bukhari, Sahih, volume 3, p. 243.

[234] Imam Zarkashi, Al-Ijaba, p. 113.

[235] Bukhari, Sahih, volume 3, p. 243.

[236] The biography of ‘Abdallah ibn ‘Umar can be found in ‘Asqalani, Al-Isaba, volume 4, pp. 182ff.

[237] Bukhari, Sahih, volume 4, p. 137.

[238] Imam Zarkashi, Al-Ijaba, pp. 37, 38.

[239] Imam Zarkashi, Al-Ijaba, p. 32.

[240] Imam Zarkashi, Al-Ijaba, p. 31.

[241] Zahiya Qaddura, ‘A ‘isha, Umm al-mu’minin [‘A’isha, Mother of the Faithful] (Beirut, Lebanon: Dar al-Kitab al-Lubnani, 1976).

[242] Imam Zarkashi, Al-Ijaba, p. 116.

[243] ‘Asqalani, Al-Isaba, volume 8, p. 17.

[244] Imam Zarkashi, Al-Ijaba, p. 120.

[245] [Al-‘Ali] al-‘Uzzi, Difa’.

[246] [Al-‘Ali] al-‘Uzzi, Difa’, p. 7.

[247] Bukhari, Sahih, volume 1, p. 34.

[248] [Al-‘Ali] al-‘Uzzi,Difa’, p. 122.

[249] [Al-‘Ali] al-‘Uzzi,Difa’, p. 122.

[250] Muhammad Abu Zahra, Malik [Malik ibn Anas, 710–796] (Cairo: Dar al-Fikr al-‘Arabi, no date), p. 146.

[251] ‘Asqalani, Al-Isaba, volume 7, p. 440.

[252] Abu Zahra, Malik, p. 145.

[253] ‘Asqalani, Al-Isaba, volume 7, p. 432.

[254] Bukhari, Sahih, volume 1, p. 34.

[255] Bukhari, Sahih, volume 1, p. 34.

[256] Bukhari, Sahih, volume 1, p. 34.

[257] ‘Asqalani, Al-Isaba, volume 7, p. 517.

[258] ‘Asqalani, Al-Isaba, volume 7, p. 517.

[259] Yvonne Yazbeck Haddad and Jane I. Smith, Muslim Communities in North America (Albany: State University of New York Press, 1994); Haddad and Smith, “United States of America,” in John L. Esposito, editor, The Oxford Encyclopedia of the Modern Islamic World (New York: Oxford University Press, 1995), volume 4, pp. 277–284; Aminah Beverly McCloud, African American Islam (New York: Routledge, 1995); Kambiz GhaneaBassiri, Competing Visions of Islam in the United States (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1997), especially pp. 126–131.

[260] The perpectives, circumstances, and background of the individual. This concept will be discussed at greater length below.

[261] One notable exception in English is Fazlur Rahman’s Major Themes of the Qur’an (Chicago and Minneapolis: Bibliotheca Islamica, 1980). In addition, see Mustansir Mir, Thematic and Structural Coherence in the Qur’an: A Study of ‘Islahi’s Concept of Nazm (University of Michigan Microfilms International, 1987), which gives a comprehensive analysis of the significance of theme to Qur’anic organization and, consequently, its exegesis.

[262] See Marjorie Procter-Smith, In Her Own Rite: Reconstructing Feminist Liturgical Tradition (Nashville, Tenn.: Abingdon Press, 1990), chapter 1, pp. 13–35, on the significance of inclusion and exclusion of women in religious dialogue.

[263] For example, Fatna A[it] Sabbah in her book Woman in the Muslim Unconscious, translated by Mary Jo Lakeland from the French (New York: Pergamon Press, 1984), discusses valid points with regard to this issue, but when she discusses the Qur'an, she fails to distinguish between the Qur'an and the Qur'anic interpreters.

[264] For details of Fazlur Rahman's discussion of the above double movement methodology—"from the present situation to Qur'anic times, then back to the present"—for particular communities, see his Islam and Modernity: Transformation of an Intellectual Tradition (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1982), Introduction, especially pp. 4–9.

[265] This is a direct contradiction of the classical models which propose that the masculine plural form means male (exclusively). Thus, language is used to make male the norm, and by implication, the female must be abnormal.

[266] This is the Scripture wherein there is no doubt, a guidance unto those who ward off (evil), who believe in the unseen, establish worship, and spend of that We have bestowed upon them.... (Sura 2, Verses 2–3)

[267] M.M. Bakhtin, Speech Genres and Other Late Essays, translated by Vern W. McGhee, edited by Caryl Emerson and Michael Holquist (Austin: University of Texas Press, 1986), pp. 6–7.

[268] This recurrent problem in "reading" the Qur'an causes readers to justify limiting to women statements made using feminine forms and figures; see chapter 3 below concerning Bilqis. [Not included in this excerpt.—Editor] Although she is a good leader—that happens to be a woman—she is not taken as a universal example of leadership. Statements using masculine forms or figures are limited to men and extended to women only by qiyas (analytical reasoning).

[269] Alvin J. Schmidt, Veiled and Silenced: How Culture Shaped Sexist Theology (Macon, Ga.: Mercer University Press, 1989), Introduction, p. xiii.

[270] Schmidt, Veiled and Silenced, pp. 59–60.

[271] Ivan Illich, Gender (New York: Pantheon Books, 1982), pp. 106–107.

[272] See Sayyid Qutb [1903–1966], Fi zilal al-Qur’an [In the Shade of the Qur’an] (Cairo: Dar al-Shuruq, 1980), volume 2 (of 6), pp. 642–643, where he discusses the shared beliefs and responsibility between men and women in the Islamic social system of justice.

[273] Fazlur Rahman, Islam and Modernity, pp. 5–7, discusses the moral values of the Qur’an in “extra-historical transcendental” terms; that is, the moral value extracted from a particular verse goes beyond the time and place of the specific instance at which that verse and its injunction was occasioned.

[274] The practice of stating that one’s wife was as “the back of my mother,” which would make conjugal relations impossible, but would not totally free the woman for remarriage.

[275] Wan Mohd. Nor Wan Daud, The Concept of Knowledge in Islam and Its Implications for Education in a Developing Country (London: Mansell, 1989), p. 7.

[276] See William Robertson Smith, Kinship and Marriage in Early Arabia, edited by Stanley A. Cook (London: A. and C. Black, 1907).

[277] Translation by A. Yusuf Ali, The Holy Qur’an: Text, Translation, and Commentary, U.S. edition (Elmhurst, N.Y.: Tahrike Tarsile Qur’an, 1987).

[278] [Fear of God.—Editor]

[279] It should not be overlooked in my literal interpretation, that “the wombs that bore you” is also used as a metaphor for the blood ties of family relations in general.

[280] To further substantiate this point of view, see the discussion of Mary, Mother of Jesus, in chapter 2. [Not included in this excerpt.—Editor]

[281] Which I will discuss in detail below.

[282] There is a distinction between wahy, receiving divine communication, and risala, receiving divine communication concerning the destiny of humankind, which includes the obligation to transmit the information of that wahy to humankind at large.

[283] Maryam [Mary, the mother of Jesus] and Umm Musa [the mother of Moses] among the women.

[284] See, for example, Sura 22, Verse 75.

[285] “See how We prefer one above another, and verily the Hereafter will be greater in darajat and greater in preference [tafdil].” (Sura 17, Verse 21) [Bracketed terms in Qur’anic quotations are the author’s, not the editor’s.—Editor]

[286] Carol Tarvis and Carole Wade, The Longest War: Sex Differences in Perspective, second edition (Orlando, Fl.: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1984), p. 3.

[287] Tarvis and Wade, The Longest War, p. 20.

[288] This is one of the verses which demonstrates that an Islamic society allows for economic classes.

[289] In addition, the preceding verses 221–227 discuss at length other details related to marriage, divorce, and widowhood.

[290] Edward William Lane, An Arab-English Lexicon (London: Librairie du Liban, 1980), part 5, p. 2017.

[291] As defined by Milton J. Cowan, A Dictionary of Modern Written Arabic, third edition, edited by Hans Wehr (Ithaca, N.Y.: Spoken Language Services, 1976).

[292] For example, the Children of Israel were preferred over “other creatures” (the same term has been translated in chapter 1, the Fatiha, as “the worlds”) in Sura 2, Verses 47 and 122; and Sura 7, Verse 40. This preference is usually understood to mean that they were chosen to receive prophets and the revelations.

[293] [Obedient.—Editor]

[294] This is the ba al-sababiyya known in Arabic as the bi for a reason or purpose. It establishes a conditional relationship between two parts of a sentence or clause. The first part is conditional upon, and cannot be attributed without, the second part.

[295] Azizah al-Hibri, “A Study of Islamic Herstory: Or How Did We Ever Get into This Mess?” Women and Islam: Women’s Studies International Forum, volume 5, number 2, 1982, p. 218.

[296] Which I will discuss in detail below.

[297] Al-Hibri, “A Study of Islamic Herstory,” pp. 217–218.

[298] I have translated ba’d in its usual meaning of “some” or “a portion of.” However, there is also usage of ba’dplus masculine plural noun plus ba’d, which means “each other” with no particular number or gender implied. In other words, a degree of vagueness surrounds this statement. It could also mean women have a preference over men.

[299] Al-Hibri, “A Study of Islamic Herstory,” p. 218.

[300] Al-Kashshaf ‘an haqa’ iq al-tanzil wa ‘uyun al-aqawil fi wujuh al-tawil [The Revealer of the True Meanings of the Revelation and Select Opinions concerning Interpretations of the Text] (Beirut, Lebanon: Dar al-Ma’arif, no date), volume 1 (of 4), p. 523.

[301] Al-Kashshaf, volume 2, p. 117.

[302] Al-Hibri, “A Study of Islamic Herstory,” p. 217.

[303] Al-Hibri, “A Study of Islamic Herstory,” p. 218.

[304] For example, I would include Pickthall because he translates this passage as unrestricted “men are in charge of women.” Al-Zamakhshari, in Al-Kashshaf, volume 1, p. 523, states the terms he believes of God’s preference of men over women. ‘Abbas Mahmud Al-‘Aqqad [1889–1964], Al-Mar’afi al-Qur’an [Woman in the Qur’an] (Cairo: Dar al-Hilal, 1962), p. 7, states the same. Finally, Mawdudi interprets it this way.

[305] Al-Kashshaf, volume 2, pp. 648–653.

[306] Qutb, Fi zilal al-Qur’an, volume 2, p. 650.

[307] Qutb, Fi zilal al-Qur’an, volume 2, p. 650.

[308] Qutb, Fi zilal al-Qur’an, volume 2, p. 650.

[309] Interview with Dale F. Eickelman and Sadek J. Sulaiman, Damascus, March 22, 1996.

[310] Dale F. Eickelman, “Islamic Liberalism Strikes Back,” Middle East Studies Association Bulletin, volume 27, number 2, December 1993, pp. 163–168; Peter Clark, “The Shahrur Phenomenon: A Liberal Islamic Voice from Syria,” Islam and Christian-Muslim Relations, volume 7, number 3, October 1996, pp. 337–341.

[311] Muhammad Shahrour, al-Kitab wa-l-Qur’an: Qira’a mu’asira (The Book and the Qur’an: A Contemporary Reading) (Damascus: Al-Ahali li-l-Taba’a wa-l-Nashr wa-l-Tawzi’a, 1990), p. 44.

[312] In addition to Al-Kitab wa-l-Qur’an, Shahrour is the author of Dirasat al-Islamiyya mu’asira f dawla wa-l-mujtama’ (Contemporary Islamic Studies in State and Society) (Damascus: Al-Ahali li-l-Taba’a wa-l-Nashr wa-l-Tawzi’a, 1994), which contains an introduction replying to the critics of his first book (pp. 15–46); and Al-Islam wa-l-iman: Manzuma al-qiyam (Islam and Faith: A Treatise on Values) (Damascus: Al-Ahali li-l-Taba’a wa-l-Nashr wa-l-Tawzi’a, 1996).

[313] On recent debates within Indian Islam, see Christian W. Troll, “Sharing Islamically in the Pluralistic Nation-State of India: The Views of Some Contemporary Indian Muslim Leaders and Thinkers,” in Yvonne Yazbeck Haddad and Wadi Zaidan Haddad, editors, Christian-Muslim Encounters (Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1995), pp. 245–262.

[314] Science, Philosophy and Culture: Essays Presented in Honour of Humayun Kabir’s Sixty-Second Birthday (New York: Asia Publishing House, 1968), pp. xi-xii.

[315] M. Kamal Hassan, “Malaysia,” in John L. Esposito, editor, The Oxford Encyclopedia of the Modern Islamic World (New York: Oxford University Press, 1995), volume 3, pp. 35–38; Hussin Mutalib, Islam and Ethnicity in Malay Politics (Singapore: Oxford University Press, 1990); Chandra Muzaffar, “Ethnicity, Ethnic Conflict, and Human Rights in Malaysia,” in Claude E. Welch Jr. and Virginia A. Leary, editors, Asian Perspectives on Human Rights (Boulder, Colo.: Westview, 1990), pp. 107–141; K. J. Ratnam, Communalism in the Political Process in Malaya (Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia: University of Malaya Press, 1965); R. K. Vasil, Ethnic Politics in Malaysia (New Delhi: Radiant, 1980); Karl von Vorys, Democracy without Consensus: Communalism and Political Stability in Malaysia (Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1975).

[316] Daniel S. Lev, “Human Rights NGOs [Non-Governmental Organizations] in Indonesia and Malaysia,” in Welch and Leary, Asian Perspectives on Human Rights, pp. 142–161; Amyn B. Sajoo, Pluralism in “Old Societies and New States”: Emerging ASEAN Contexts (Singapore: Institute of Southeast Asian Studies, 1994), pp. 53–54; and Sajoo, “Pondering the ‘Periphery’: Pluralist Trends in Southeast Asia,” Muslim Politics Report, number 8, Summer 1996, p. 5.

[317] There is this awareness, though non-Malays who become Muslims are sometimes referred to as people who have “masukMelayu”(become Malays). “MasukMelayu, “ however, need not be interpreted literally; it could simply mean those who have adopted the religion of the Malays.

[318] These communities would be the Kadazans, Ibans, and others of East Malaysia in the main and some of the Orang Asli of West Malaysia.

[319] In both Sabah and Sarawak, for instance, the Chief Ministership and certain other important political offices are held by indigenous Muslims, though non-Muslim indigenous communities are numerically stronger in both states. For a fuller discussion of politics in these states, see K.J. Ratnam and R.S. Milne, New States in a New Nation (London: Frank Cass, 1974).

[320] See “Amanat Yang di-Pertua Agong PAS Ulang Tahun 1958” [The 1958 Anniversary Speech of the President of the PAS], in Cenderamata Pembukaan Bangunan PAS Kelantan & Kongres PAS ke 13 [Souvenir Program in Conjunction with the Opening of the PAS’s Building in Kelantan and the Thirteenth PAS Congress].

[321] For a detailed analysis see my “Protection of the Malay Community: A study of UMNO’s Position and Opposition Attitudes,” Masters Thesis, Universiti Sains Malaysia, 1974.

[322] See A. Yusuf Ali [1872–1952], The Holy Qur’an: Text, Translation and Commentary (Lahore, Pakistan: Sh. Muhammad Ashraf, 1972).

[323] For a discussion on the Constitution of Medina, see Zainal Abidin Ahmad, Piagam Nabi Muhammad s.a.w. [Charter of the Prophet Muhammad, Peace Be upon Him] (Jakarta, Indonesia: Bulan Bintang, 1973).

[324] See Sayyid Abul A’la Mawdudi, The Islamic Law and Constitution (Lahore, Pakistan: Islamic Publications Ltd.), p. 312.

[325] Mawdudi, The Islamic Law and Constitution, p. 159.

[326] In commenting upon that sura, Yusuf Ali notes, “In Islam, the equal status of the sexes is not only recognized but insisted on. If sex distinction, which is a distinction in nature, does not count in spiritual matters, still less of course would count artificial distinctions such as rank, wealth, position, race, color, birth, etc.” A. Yusuf Ali, The Holy Qur’an, p. 175.

[327] For the UMNO leadership as a whole, Bumiputraism is apparently justified on its own basis. Some analysis of this is available in my “The New Economic Policy and the Quest for National Unity,” Fifth Malaysian Economic Convention (Malaysian Economic Association, 1978).

[328] Two points, however, must be made. Firstly, there are without any doubt a number of Muslim youths who understand genuine Islamic principles. See, for instance, the view of Anwar Ibrahim [born 1947] (President, Angkatan Belia Islam Malaysia [Muslim Youth Movement of Malaysia], or ABIM), in Bintang Timur [Eastern Star], 1st March 1979. Secondly, the world-wide interest in Islam among young Muslims has also had some bearing upon the Malaysian situation, but I do not consider it a crucial factor.

[329] This is due to both the rural-urban drift which has been on since Merdeka [Independence, 1957], and the New Economic Policy (NEP) [since the early 1970s] which among other things emphasizes Malay participation in commerce and industry.

[330] See The Star, 20 March 1979.

[331] This is partly due to the implementation of Malay as the main medium of education since 1970.

[332] The crucial word here is “halal” (legitimate). “Halal” signs therefore refer to foods that Muslims are allowed to eat. There has been a great deal of discussion about this in Utusan Malaysia [Malaysian Messenger] and Utusan Melayu [Malay Messenger, daily newspapers in Kuala Lumpur] in the last two years or so.

[333] The genesis of this whole atmosphere is discussed in my “Some Political Perspectives on the New Economic Policy,” Fourth Malaysian Economic Convention (Malaysian Economic Association, 1977).

[334] The development of these demands finds some mention in my “Dominant Concepts and Dissenting Ideas on Malay Society and Malay Rule from the Malacca Period to the Merdeka Period,” Doctoral Thesis, University of Singapore, 1977.

[335] See various parts in Muhammad Natsir, Capita Selecta [Selected Works], volumes I and II (Jakarta, Indonesia: Pustaka Pendis, 1957).

[336] The Qur’anic call for common principles is contained in Sura Al-‘Imran [Sura 3], Verses 64–66.

[337] For some discussion of common values, see my “Values in the Education System,” New Directions (Singapore), March 1976.

[338] “Mandi Safar” is a sort of purification bath confined mainly to Muslim groups in Malacca. It is pre-Islamic in origin and has some roots in Hindu custom. One of the better known puja ceremonies was the puja conducted for fishermen going out to sea. It was once popular in Kelantan. The former PAS government banned it.

[339] See Khalifah Abdul Hakim’s “Renaissance in Indo-Pakistan: Iqbal,” in M.M. Sharif, editor, A History of Muslim Philosophy, volume 2 (Wiesbaden, Germany: Otto Harrassowitz, 1966), p. 1619.

[340] Michael E. Meeker, “The New Muslim Intellectuals in the Republic of Turkey,” in Richard Tapper, editor, Islam in Modern Turkey (London: I.B. Tauris, 1991), pp. 197–198.

[341] For instance, Ali Bulay, Islam ve Demokrasi (Islam and Democracy) (Istanbul: Beyan Yayinlari, 1993).

[342] A. Himmet Berki and Osman Keskioglu, Hatemu’l Enbiya Hz. Muhammed ve Hayati [The Seal of the Prophets, Hazrat Muhammad, and His Life], 7th edition (Ankara, Turkey, 1978), p. 204; S.M. Ahmed Nedvi and S.S. Ansari, Asr-l Saadet [The Era of Prosperity, Namely the Reign of the Prophet], translated [into Turkish] by A. Genceli (Istanbul, 1985), volume 1, p. 64.

[343] [Muhammad ibn Isma’il] Bukhari [810–870, hadith compiler], 56/181, number 1; M. Tayyib Oki?, “Islamiyette * Ilk* Nufus Sayimi” [The First Census in Islam], Ankara Universitesi Ilahiyat* Fakultesi Dergisi [Ankara University Theology Faculty Review], volume 7, 1958–1959, pp. 11ff

[344] S.M. Ahmed Nedvi and S.S. Ansari, volume 1, p. 64.

[345] We owe our recognition of the Document in the Islamic world to Professor Muhammad Hamidullah.... See his Islam * Peygamberi [The Prophet oflslam], translated [into Turkish] by Professor Salih Tug*, fifth edition (Istanbul, 1990), volume 1, pp. 200ff [The following is translated from Bulan’s Turkish rendition.—Editor]

[346] In [‘Abd al-Malik] Ibn Hisham [died 833] this is written as ma’a (with), and in Abu ‘Ubayd [al-Qasim ibn Sallam, 770–838] as min (of). [These two authors, the most important sources for the text of the Medina Document, disagree on wording in a number of places. —Editor]

[347] Hamidullah, volume 1, p. 189.

[348] L. Caetani, Annali [delllslam] [The History of Islam] (Milan, Italy, 1903), translated [into Turkish] by Huseyin Cahit [Yal?in, 1874–1957] as Islam * Tarihi [The History of Islam] (Istanbul, 1924), volume 3, p. 112.

[349] See Sura 6, Verse 154; Sura 17, Verse 2; Sura 53, Verse 36; Sura 87, Verse 19; et cetera.

[350] [Earlier sections of the article discussed humans' natural sociability.—Editor]

[351] This conceptual frame should be considered as distinct from the Islamic treatment of dhimmi law, because the dhimmi status explains the legal order appropriate for nonMuslims who did not want to live amongst the Muslims and warred with them and were defeated. Our concern here is the conditions of non-Muslims, like those in Medina, who wanted to live amongst the Muslims and participated as equal parties to the political organization, in the form of legal groups, free people according to the general principles of the legal contract which they signed [with the Muslims].

[352] [A long footnote listing recent publications on this issue has been deleted.—Editor]

[353] Khalid Durdn, "Bosnia: Background to a Tragedy," Church and Society, volume 84, number 3, January-February 1994, pp. 72–82; Smail Balic, "Bosnia: The Challenge of a Tolerant Islam," translated by John Bowden, in Hans Kiing and Jiirgen Moltman, editors, Islam: A Challenge for Christianity (London: SCM Press; Maryknoll, N.Y.: Orbis Books, 1994), pp. 3–10; Rusmir Mahmud-Cehajié, "Understanding the Suffering: A Sufi Perspective on the Plight of Bosnia's Muslims," Islamic World Report, volume 1, 1996, pp. 51–63.

[354] [The author wrote a column for the independent newspaper Oslobodenje in Sarajevo, Bosnia-Herzegovina.—Editor]

[355] Among the numerous treatments of Shari'ati's life and work, the following are notable for going beyond hagiography: H.E. Chehabi, Iranian Politics and Religious Modernism (Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press); Hamid Dabashi, Theology of Discontent: The Ideological Foundations of the Islamic Revolution in Iran (New York: New York University Press, 1993), pp. 102–146; Shahrough Akhavi, "Shari'ati, 'Ali," in John L. Esposito, editor, The Oxford Encyclopedia of the Modern Islamic World (New York: Oxford University Press, 1995), volume 4, pp. 46–50; Abdulaziz Sachedina, “Ali Shariati: Ideologue of the Iranian Revolution,” in John L. Esposito, editor, Voices of Resurgent Islam (New York: Oxford University Press, 1983), pp. 191–214.

[356] [Because the word insan has no gender, it is translated here as “humankind” rather than as “man.”—Editor]

[357] Nowadays this verse is said when a death occurs! When progressive and logical ideas fall into the hands of a corrupt and fanatic society, they, too, cause corruption. This applies to this Qur’anic verse.

[358] [Shari’ati is paraphrasing.—Translator]

[359] This is not a new subject. From time immemorial these ideas have been popular among common people. [The best-known morphologist is W.H. Sheldon, The Varieties of Temperament (New York: Harper and Row, 1942).—Translator]

[360] The belief that water, weather, mountainous climate, and so forth shape our character.

[361] [During the war in Vietnam, some Buddhist monks immolated themselves in public as a political statement.—Translator]

[362] Like Eskimos who abandon their elders in ice and snow to die because they can no longer produce.

[363] This notion was expressed in a couplet [quoted in the original text] by an Arabian poet who believed that his tribe was safe and a haven before becoming vulnerable when nibbled by calamities and forced into an extreme position.

[364] Reported by Ahmad [ibn Hanbal, 780–855], [Abu ‘Abd al-Rahman] al-Nasa’i [830–915], and [Abu ‘Abdallah] Ibn Maja [824–887] in their Sunan [Hadith collections].

[365] Reported by al-Imam Ahmad [ibn Hanbal], in hisMusnad[Hadith collection], al-Nasa’i and [‘Imad al-Din] Ibn Kathir [circa 1300–1373] in their Sunan [Hadith collections], and [Muhammad ibn ‘Abdallah] al-Hakim [al-Naysaburi, 933–1014] in his Mustadrak [’ ala sahihayn] [supplement to the authentic Hadith collections], on the authority of [‘Abdallah] Ibn ‘Abbas.

[366] Reported by Muslim [ibn al-Hajjaj, hadith compiler, circa 821–875]. [Jalal-al-Din] Al-Suyuti [died 1505] attributed this hadith to both Ahmad [ibn Hanbal] and Abu Dau’d [al-Sijistani, 817–889].

[367] Reported by Abu Ya’la [Ibn al-Fara’, died 1066] in hisMusnad[Hadith collection], on the authority of Malik ibn Anas [companion of the Prophet, 710–796]. Cited by Ibn Kathir in his interpretation of Sura 57, Verse 27, namely: “But the monasticism which they themselves invented, We did not prescribe for them.”

[368] Mukhtasar [The Handbook] of Ibn Kathir, volume 1, p. 541.

[369] Reported by [Muhammad ibn Isma’il] Al-Bukhari [810–870, hadith compiler].

[370] Reported by Al-Bukhari.

[371] Reported by [Abu Bakr Muhammad] al-Bazzaz [died 965], on the authority of Jabir [ibn ‘Abdallah, Companion of the Prophet, died 697], with a weak isnad [authentic oral history].

[372] Reported by al-Bukhari and al-Nasa’i on the authority of Abu Hurayra [Companion of the Prophet, died 678]. Explained by [‘Abd al-Ra’uf ibn Taj al-‘Arifin] al-Munawi [died 1621].

[373] Reported by al-Bukhari.

[374] Reported by al-Imam Ahmad [ibn Hanbal] and [Abu’l-Fadl Muhammad Katib ibn] al-Bayhaqi [995–1077] on the authority of [‘Abdallah] Ibn ‘Umar, and by [Abu Ja’far Muhammad] al-Tabari [died 922] on the authority of Ibn ‘Abbas.

[375] Reported by al-Bukhari and [Abu ‘Isa Muhammad] al-Tirmidhi [hadith compiler, died 892].

[376] Reported by al-Bukhari.

[377] Authenticated by all authorities.

[378] Reported by al-Bukhari and others.

[379] [The latter two are theological positions historically dismissed as heretical.—Editor]

[380] Authenticated by all authorities.

[381] Reported by Muslim [ibn al-Hajjaj].

[382] Reported by Muslim [ibn al-Hajjaj].

[383] Reported by Muslim [ibn al-Hajjaj].

[384] See ‘Abd al-Rahman Abu al-Khayr, Dhikrayati ma’a Jama’at al-Muslimin (al-Takfir wa al-Hijra) [My Memoires of the Society of Muslims (Society of Excoriation and Exodus)].

[385] Reported by al-Bukhari.

[386] Reported by al-Bukhari.

[387] Translation by Muhammad Asad [born Leopold Weiss, Austria-Pakistan, born 1900].

[388] Reported by al-Bukhari.

[389] Wm. Montgomery Watt, “A Contemporary Muslim Thinker,” The Scottish Journal of Religious Studies, volume 6, number 1, Spring 1985, pp. 5–10.

[390] Fedwa Malti-Douglas, “Arkoun, Mohammed,” in John L. Esposito, editor, The Oxford Encyclopedia of the Modern Islamic World (New York: Oxford University Press, 1995), volume 1, pp. 139–140.

[391] Robert D. Lee, Overcoming Tradition and Modernity (Boulder, Colo.: Westview Press, 1997), pp. 143–174. Among Arkoun’s works are Lectures du Coran (Readings from the Qur’an) (Paris: G.P. Maisonneuve et Larose, 1982); Pour une critique de raison Islamique (For a Critique of Islamic Reason) (Paris: G.P. Maisonneuve et Larose, 1984); LIslam: Morale et politique (Islam: Morals and Politics) (Paris: UNESCO and Desclee de Brouwer, 1986); and Ouvertures sur l'Islam translated by Robert D. Lee, as Rethinking Islam (Boulder, Colo.: Westview Press, 1994).

[392] I prefer to use the French word for this important concept because it has no exact correspondent in English. See C. Castoriadis, L 'Institution imaginaire de la societe [The Imaginary Institution of Society] (Paris: Seuil, 1977).

[393] See my Tarikhiyyat al-fikr al-'arabi al-Islami [Historicity of Arab Islamic Thought] (Beirut, Lebanon: Dar al-Inma' al-'Arabi, 1985).

[394] Miskawayh [932–1030] did this before in his philosophical and historiographical works. See my Humanisms arabe au IVe/Xe siecle [Arab Humanism in the Fourth Century A.H./Tenth Century A.D.], second edition (Paris: Vrin, 1982).

[395] See my essays in Critique de la raison Islamique [Critique of Islamic Reason] (Paris: [G.P. Maisonneuve et Larose], 1984); and L'Islam: Morale et politique [Islam: Morals and Politics] (Paris: UNESCO-Desclee de Brouwer, 1986).

[396] Given and received are technical terms in linguistic and literary analyses. Islam is given as revealed in the grammatical structure of Qur'anic discourse, and it is received as such by the psychological consciousness generated by this discourse and the ritual performances prescribed by it. For more thorough elaboration of this approach, I refer to my essay, The Concept of Revelation: From Ahl al-Kitab to the Societies of the Book ([Claremont, Calif.:] The Claremont Graduate School, 1987).

[397] The comparative approach, attempted by L. Gardet and G. Anawati in their Introduction a la theologie musulmane [Introduction to Islamic Theology] [Paris: I. Vrin, 1948], is commanded by the postulates of Thomist theology. W.C. Smith has tried to open the field, including the case of Islam. See the recent book by Hans Kung, J. Van Ess, H. Von Stietencron, and H. Bechert, Le Christianisme et les religions du monde, Islam, Hindouisme, Bouddhisme [Christianity and the Religions of the World: Islam, Hinduism, Buddhism], translated from German by Joseph Feisthauer (Paris: Seuil, 1986).

[398] I use this expression according to its historical elaboration by F[ernand] Braudel [1902–1985].

[399] Ann Elizabeth Mayer, Islam and Human Rights (Boulder, Colo.: Westview Press, 1991), pp. 54, 113.

[400] See generally, United Nations Action in the Field of Human Rights, United Nations Document ST/HR/2/Rev. 1, United Nations sales number E. 79.XIV.6 (1980); and B.G. Ramcharan, editor, Human Rights Thirty Years after the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (The Hague, Netherlands: Martinus Nijhoff, 1979).

[401] These are the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms of 1950, the American Convention on Human Rights of 1969, and the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights of 1981.

[402] See, for example, Jack Donnelly, "Human Rights and Human Dignity: An Analytic Critique of Non-Western Conceptions of Human Rights," American Political Science Review, volume 76, June 1982, p. 303; and Rhoda Howard and Jack Donnelly, "Human Dignity, Human Rights and Political Regimes," American Political Science Review, volume 80, September 1986, p. 801.

For a survey of the main problems and theories in justification and support of universal standards of human rights, see Jerome J. Shestack, “The Jurisprudence of Human Rights,” in Theodore Meron, Human Rights in International Law: Legal and Policy Issues (Oxford: Clarendon, 1985), p. 69.

[403] Warwick McKean, Equality and Discrimination under International Law (Oxford: Clarendon, 1983), pp. 280–281.

[404] Official spokesmen of the Islamic Republic of Iran have voiced their belief that they are bound by Islamic law and not international human rights standards. See a collection of these statements in Edward Mortimer, “Islam and Human Rights,” Index on Censorship, volume 12, number 5, 1983, pp. 5–6.

[405] The same would be true of other differences such as race or ethnicity, language, and so on. But because shari ‘a does not sanction discrimination on any other grounds except gender and religion, this chapter will focus on these two grounds of discrimination.

[406] In the context of the modern nation-state, this tendency is reflected in general intolerance of minorities, whether religious or otherwise. Thus it has been said that “the ideals of national unity manifested by a central concentration of power; by a common language, culture and religion; and by economic and geographical limits, all so fundamental to the self-identification of the new states, tended also to express themselves in intolerant and repressive attitudes toward those who were perceived or perceived themselves as ‘others’” (Patrick Thornberry, “Is There a Phoenix in the Ashes? International Law and Minority Rights,” Texas International Law Journal, volume 15, Summer 1980, p. 421).

[407] Although this is the unavoidable conclusion of the briefest survey of the relevant principles and rules of shari’a, it is rarely admitted by contemporary Muslim writers on the subject.

One of the rare exceptions in modern Muslim writings is Sultanhussein Tabandeh, A Muslim Commentary on the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (London: F.T. Goulding and Company, 1970), pp. 17–20 and passim, where the author states clearly and defends the exclusion of women and non-Muslims from the full range of human rights under shari’a.

[408] For example, the theories surveyed by Shestack, “Jurisprudence of Human Rights,” pp. 85 and forward, appear to be primarily based on the Western tradition. In fact, the available literature on the philosophical notions of “rights” and “universal human rights,” reviewed in Shestack, pp. 70–85, is not very useful for our purposes because it is primarily based on Western cultural tradition.

[409] Oscar Schachter, in his editorial comment, “Human Dignity as a Normative Concept,” American Journal of International Law, volume 77, 1983, p. 853, has suggested that it may be philosophically significant to derive human rights from the inherent dignity of human beings. But as Schachter himself has shown, the term human dignity has its own definitional problems.

[410] Here I am adopting the analysis of Ustadh [Teacher] Mahmoud Mohamed Taha, Second Message of Islam (Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1987), pp. 80 and forward.

[411] Myles S. McDougal, Harold D. Lasswell, and Lungchu Chen, Human Rights and World Public Order (New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1980), pp. 473–508; and V.

Nanda and C. Bassiouni, “Slavery and the Slave Trade: Steps towards Eradication,” Santa Clara Law Review, volume 12, 1972, p. 424.

Article 8 of the Supplementary Convention on the Abolition of Slavery, the Slave Trade, and Institutions and Practices Similar to Slavery of 1956 requires states party to the convention to communicate to the secretary general of the United Nations copies of any laws, regulations, and administrative measures enacted or put into effect to implement the provisions of this convention. This documentation is to be used by the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations as a basis for further recommendations on this subject.

[412] McKean, Equality and Discrimination under International Law, pp. 116–21.

[413] Louis Henkin, et al., International Law: Cases and Materials, second edition (St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing, 1987), p. 982.

[414] The main current slavery convention was signed on September 25, 1926, and entered into force on March 9, 1927 (60 L.N.T.S. 253). More recent international treaties on the subject include the Supplementary Convention on the Abolition of Slavery, the Slave Trade and Institutions and Practices Similar to Slavery, which was signed on September 7, 1956, and entered into force on April 30, 1957 (18 T.I.A.S. No. 6418, 266 U.N.T.S. 3).

[415] See, for example, Article 5 of the African Charter on Human and Peoples’ Rights and Article 8 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. This last article is exempt by Article 4 of the convention from derogation, that is, no state party to the convention may ever derogate from its obligation to prohibit slavery and the slave trade and servitude under any circumstances. Moreover, Articles 6 and 7 of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, providing for the right to work, render slavery obsolete.

[416] Arcot Krishnaswami, Study of Discrimination in the Matter of Religious Rights and Practices (New York: United Nations, 1960), pp. 11–12; and Francisco Capotorti, Study of the Rights of Persons Belonging to Ethnic, Religious and Linguistic Minorities (New York: United Nations, 1979), pp. 1–3.

[417] This was true among states professing different sects within the same religion as well as among those adhering to different religions. Thus various European peace treaties since the 17th century have provided for the protection of Protestants within Catholic territory and vice versa. See Thornberry, “Is There a Phoenix in the Ashes?” p. 426 and accompanying notes.

[418] See, for example, Articles 1.3 and 55(c) of the United Nations Charter, Article 2 of the African Charter, and Article 2 of the Civil and Political Rights Covenant.

For a comprehensive survey and analysis of current treaty-based guarantees against such discrimination since the end of World War II, see Capotorti, Study of the Rights, pp. 26–41.

[419] The principle of nondiscrimination provided for in the articles cited in the previous note apply equally to discrimination on grounds of gender. Moreover, several specialized conventions specifically apply to the rights of women, such as the Convention on the Political Rights of Women of 1953 (193 U.N.T.S. 135). The most comprehensive of this class of international treaties is the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women of 1979.

[420] Vernon Van Dyke, Human Rights, Ethnicity and Discrimination (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1985), p. 194.

[421] This differential treatment, known as affirmative action or positive discrimination, has its own problems in practice. See, for example, Marc Galanter, Competing Equalities (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1984), for an explanation of these problems as they have arisen through the recent application of this principle in the Indian context.

[422] As was explained in chapter 4, the status of dhimmi [protected peoples] under shari ‘a guaranteed non-Muslims security of person and property and a degree of communal autonomy.

Shari ‘a also recognized for women an independent legal personality, including the full capacity to hold and dispose of property in their own right and certain minimum rights in family law and inheritance. See generally, Jane I. Smith, “Islam,” in Arvind Sharama, editor, Women in World Religions (Albany: State University of New York Press, 1987), p. 235.

[423] Majid Khadduri, “Human Rights in Islam,” Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, number 243, 1946, p. 79.

[424] In a recent substantially revised version of this paper Khadduri omitted the above-quoted statement. Though emphasizing the need for reform and compliance with current international standards of human rights, Khadduri’s revised version does not dispute the accuracy of the statement from his 1946 paper. See Majid Khadduri, The Islamic Conception ofjustice (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1984), p. 233.

[425] See, for example, Ali Abdel Wahid Wafi, “Human Rights in Islam,” Islamic Quarterly, Volume 11, 1967, p. 64; Khalid M. Ishaque, “Human Rights in Islamic Law,” International Commission of Jurists Review, volume 12, 1974, p. 51; and Isma’il al-Faruqi, “Islam and Human Rights,” Islamic Quarterly, volume 27, 1983, p. 12.

[426] Riffat Hassan, “On Human Rights and the Qur’anic Perspectives,” Journal of Ecumenical Studies, volume 19, 1982, p. 51.

[427] Tabandeh, Muslim Commentary on the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, pp. 18–20 and 35–45. Reference to these and other points made in this book was made [in an earlier chapter].

[428] Fazlur Rahman, Islam (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1979), p. 38; and Majid Khadduri, War and Peace in the Law of Islam (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1955), p. 130.

For a comprehensive treatment of slavery in shari’a and in history see R. Brunschwig, “’Abd,” in Encyclopedia of Islam, new edition, volume 1, pp. 24–40. See also Reuben Levy, The Social Structure of Islam (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1957), pp. 73–85.

[429] Modernist arguments that slavery should have been abolished by shari ‘a will be considered below.

[430] I am not concerned here with secret slavery and semislavery, which exist in many parts of the world.

[431] Tabandeh, Muslim Commentary on the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, p. 27.

[432] For reports of sunna and other early traditions showing the free practice of slavery during the Prophet’s time see Majid Khadduri, The Islamic Law of Nations (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1966), pp. 80 and forward.

[433] This, of course, does not cover the purchase of slaves, which is treated by shari’a jurists as part of the law of sale. See Brunschwig, “‘Abd.”

[434] Majid Khadduri and Herbert Liebesny, Law in the Middle East (Washington, D.C.: Middle East Institute, 1955), pp. 355–356. For a documented account of these options and differences of opinion among the jurists in matters of detail see Khadduri, War and Peace in the Law of Islam, pp. 126–130.

[435] For example, Sura 4, Verse 36 of the Qur’an instructs Muslims to “do good” and to treat their parents, relatives, orphans, slaves, and others well.

[436] Khadduri, War and Peace in the Law of Islam, pp. 131–32.

[437] Hassan, “On Human Rights and the Qur’anic Perspectives,” p. 59.

[438] In his explanation of this verse, [‘Imad al-Din] Ibn Kathir [circa 1300–1373] does not mention any implication of prohibition of the enslavement option. Rather, he quotes [Abu ‘Abdallah Muhammad] Shafi’i’s [767–820] statement of the four options open to the ruler over captives of war: execution, enslavement, or release with or without ransom.

[439] Slavery was abolished in Bahrain in 1937, Kuwait in 1947, and Qatar in 1952. See C.W.W. Greenidge, “Slavery in the Middle East,” Middle Eastern Affairs, December 1956, p. 439.

[440] Levy, Social Structure of Islam, pp. 91–134 and passim, for comparisons between various aspects of the status of women before and during the early Islamic period.

[441] On the relative improvements in the status of women introduced by shari’a see Sayed Ameer Ali, The Spirit of Islam (London: Christophers, 1922), pp. 222–257; Fazlur Rahman, “Status of Women in the Qur’an,” in Guity Nashat, editor, Women and Revolution in Iran (Boulder, Colo.: Westview, 1983), p. 37; and Noel Coulson, A History of Islamic Law (Edinburgh, Scotland: Edinburgh University Press, 1964), pp. 14–15.

[442] On the acquisition of the status of aman and its consequences see Muhammad Hamidullah, Muslim Conduct of State, fifth edition (Lahore, Pakistan: Sh. M. Ashraf, 1966) pp. 201202; Khadduri and Liebesny, Law in the Middle East, pp. 361–62; and Ibrahim Shihata, “Islamic Law and the World Community,” Harvard International Club Journal, volume 4, 1962, pp. 108–109.

[443] Although this is the position of all major schools of Islamic jurisprudence, it is not based on direct Qur’anic prohibition of such marriages. Rather, it is based on the derivative argument that since Sura 4, Verse 34 of the Qur’an entitles the husband to exercise authority over his wife while stating, as in Sura 4, Verse 141, that a non-Muslim may never exercise authority over a Muslim, it follows that a man from the People of the Book, such as a Christian or Jew, may never marry a Muslim woman.

This reasoning will be repudiated at the end of this chapter through the application of the evolutionary principle of construction of Islamic sources.

[444] This was the construction given by the founding jurists to Sura 2, Verse 21; Sura 5, Verse 5; and Sura 9, Verse 10, of the Qur’an.

[445] Joseph Schacht, An Introduction to Islamic Law (Oxford: Clarendon, 1964), p. 170.

[446] On the contrast between shari ‘a view of the status and rights of women and that envisaged by Article 16 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights see Tabandeh, Muslim Commentary on the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, pp. 35–67.

[447] Sura 4, Verse 2, of the Qur’an. See Coulson, History of Islamic Law, pp. 18–19.

[448] This is the construction given by the founding jurists to Sura 2, Verses 226–232 of the Qur’an. Look under talaq in H.A.R. Gibb and J.H. Kramers, editors, Shorter Encyclopedia of Islam (Leiden, The Netherlands: E.J. Brill, 1953), pp. 564–567.

[449] Sura 4, Verses 11 and 176, of the Qur’an.

[450] Reports by nongovernmental organizations, such as Amnesty International and the Arab Human Rights Organization, and other monitoring documentation, such as Human Rights Internet Reporter, may be the best available sources of documentation for human rights violations. But because most Muslim countries are governed by authoritarian regimes, information about human rights violations is difficult to obtain.

[451] For an effort to do so see James Dudley, “Human Rights Practices in the Arab States: The Modern Impact of Shari ‘a Values,” Georgia Journal of International and Comparative Law, volume 12, 1982, p. 55.

[452] Shari ‘a is the family law for Muslims in Egypt. See Maitre A. El-Kharboutly and Aziza Hussein, “Law and the Status of Women in the Arab Republic of Egypt,” Columbia Human Rights Law Review, volume 8, 1976, p. 35.

[453] [The distinction between the Mecca and Medina stages is derived from the work of Mahmoud Mohamed Taha, who is also included in this volume.—Editor]

[454] Peter Clarke, “Islamic Reform in Contemporary Nigeria,” Third World Quarterly, volume 10, number 3, April 1988, p. 521.

[455] Farhang Rajaee, “Islam and Modernity: The Reconstruction of an Alternative Shi’ite Islamic Worldview in Iran,” in Martin E. Marty and R. Scott Appleby, editors, Fundamentalisms and Society (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1993), p. 111.

[456] Mehrzad Boroujerdi, “The Encounter of Post-Revolutionary Thought in Iran with Hegel, Heidegger, and Popper,” in Serif * Mardin, editor, Cultural Transitions in the Middle East (Leiden, The Netherlands: E.J. Brill, 1994), pp. 236–259; Yann Richard, “Clercs et Intellectuels de la Republique Islamique d’Iran” (Clerics and Intellectuals of the Islamic Republic of Iran), in Gilles Kepel and Yann Richard, editors, Intellectuels et militants de l’Islam contemporain (Intellectuals and Militants of Contemporary Islam) (Paris: Seuil, 1990), pp. 48–58; Valla Vakili, Debating Religion and Politics in Iran: The Religions Thought of Abdolkarim Soroush (New York: Council on Foreign Relations, occasional paper no. 2, 1996).

[457] Index on Censorship, volume 25, number 4, July-August 1996, pp. 165–178.

[458] This speech and several essays on Iqbal’s political thought appear in C.M. Naim, editor, Iqbal, Jinnah, and Pakistan (Syracuse, N.Y.: Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs, Syracuse University, 1979).

[459] Mumtaz Ahmad, “Pakistan,” and Hafeez Malik, “Iqbal, Muhammad,” in John L. Esposito, editor, The Oxford Encyclopedia of the Modern Islamic World (New York: Oxford University Press, 1995), volume 3, p. 296, and volume 2, pp. 221–224.

[460] [Iqbal equates “liberalism” with secularism.—Editor]

[461] [The Khawarji, or Kharijites, were an early Islamic sect often called “puritanical” for their focus on the extirpation of sin.—Editor]

[462] [The Mu’tazilites were an early Islamic sect that helped to found Islamic philosophy on ancient Greek philosophical methods.—Editor]

[463] [Persia, now called Iran, is the primary home of the minority Shi’i sect of Islam, as distinct from the majority Sunni sect. Shi’is, unlike Sunnis, believe that the Prophet’s twelfth successor, referred to as the Absent or Hidden Imam, has been in occultation since the ninth century and will return as the messiah.—Editor]

[464] [Possibly Muhammad ibn Bahadur Zarkashi, eighth century A.H./fourteenth century A.D.—Editor]

[465] Abdullahi Ahmed An-Na’im, “Translator’s Introduction,” in Mahmoud Mohamed Taha, The Second Message of Islam (Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1987); Khalid Duran, “An Alternative to Islamism: The Evolutionary Thought of Mahmud Taha,” Cross Currents, volume 42, number 4, Winter 1992–1993, pp. 453–467; Paul J. Magnarella, “Republican Brothers,” in John L. Esposito, editor, The Oxford Encyclopedia of the Modern Islamic World (New York: Oxford University Press, 1995), volume 3, pp. 429–430.

[466] [These somewhat technical terms refer to the various degrees of piety and perfection of conduct and lifestyle, in accordance with religious and moral norms and ethics.— Translator]

[467] [God in His comprehensive and all-preceding knowledge already knew that Islam would be rejected when first offered in Mecca, but He conducted the experiment for our sake, so that we should know with certainty. God’s knowledge is ancient and external beyond time, qadim and not hadith. —Translator]

[468] [Reference here is to the hadith where the Prophet describes self-control as the primary and major jihad or self-exertion.—Translator]

[469] [In pre-Islamic days, the Arabs used to bury their daughters alive to avoid any shame they might cause to them, if taken by their enemies, and to avoid having to defend and feed them generally.—Translator]

[470] [That is to say, people’s repentance is initiated by God before it can be undertaken by them.—Translator

[471] [Three letters of the Arabic alphabet. 28 of 114 suras of the Qur’an begin with letters.—Editor

[472] [These terms refer to the Qur’an at different levels of knowledge and understanding of the truth in its batin, beyond the superficial zahir meaning of the text.—Translator

[473] [As indicated earlier in his book, the author includes both the Marxist and liberal traditions when he refers to Western civilization.—Translator

[474] These extracts, corresponding roughly to the part quoted by the author in Arabic, are quoted here as translated by Joseph Govorse, in The Complete Writings of Thucydides: The Peloponnesian War (New York: Modern Library, 1934), pp. 104–105.

[475] For differing interpretations of Madjid's views, see Muhammad Kamal Hassan in Muslim Intellectual Responses to "New Order" Modernization in Indonesia (Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia: Dewan Bahasa dan Pustaka, Kementerian Pelajaran, Malaysia, 1980), pp. 89–99; and Greg Barton, "The International Context of the Emergence of Islamic Neo-Modernism in Indonesia," pp. 69–82 in M.C. Ricklets, editor, Islam in the Indonesian Social Context (Clayton, Australia: Centre of Southeast Asian Studies, Monash University, Annual Indonesian Lectures, number 15, 1991).

[476] Nurcholish Madjid, "The Issue of Modernization among Muslims in Indonesia," pp. 143–155 in Gloria Davis, editor, What Is Modern Indonesian Culture? (Athens, Ohio: Center for International Studies, Ohio University, 1979).

[477] Howard M. Federspiel, Muslim Intellectuals and National Development in Indonesia (New York: Nova Science Publishers, 1992), p. 42.

[478] Douglas E. Ramage, Politics in Indonesia: Democracy, Islam, and the Ideology of Tolerance (London: Routledge, 1995), p. 218; Amyn B. Sajoo, "Pondering the 'Periphery': Pluralist Trends in Southeast Asia," Muslim Politics Report, number 8, Summer 1996, p. 5.

[479] [Note the author's liberal interpretation of the verse.—Translator]

[480] Kenneth Cragg, "Mamadou Dia of Senegal," in The Pen and the Faith: Eight Modern Muslim Writers and the Qur'an (London: George Allen & Unwin, 1985), pp. 33–52; Rene Luc Moreau, Africains Musulmans (African Muslims) (Paris: Presence Africaine; Abidjan: Inades, 1982), pp. 275–279.

[481] [The shahada, which translates literally as witnessing, is repeated at all prayers.—Editor]

[482] Aly Mazaheri, La vie quotidienne des musulmans au Moyen Age [The Everyday Life of Muslims in the Middle Ages, 1951].

[483] W[ilfred Cantwell] Smith, Islam in Modern [History, 1957].

[484] [The Mu’talizites were an early Islamic sect that helped to found Islamic philosophy on ancient Greek philosophical methods.—Editor]

[485] To take up the admirable formulas of J. Lacroix in a different context.

[486] I speak as a Sunni—a Sunni convinced that doctrinal pluralism cannot exclude fraternal exchange in the heart of the umma [Islamic community].

[487] We are paraphrasing a formula of Eric Weil’s.

[488] F. Perroux, “Alienation et creation collective” [Alienation and Collective Creation], ISEA, June 1964, p. 40.

[489] F. Perroux, op. cit.

[490] Georges Gueron, Perspective no. 5.

[491] The expression is J. Lacroix’s.

[492] Tamara Sonn, “Rahman, Fazlur,” in John L. Esposito, editor, The Oxford Encyclopedia of the Modern Islamic World (New York: Oxford University Press, 1995), volume 3, p. 408.

[493] Tamara Sonn, “Fazlur Rahman’s Islamic Methodology,” The Muslim World, volume 81, numbers 3–4, July-October 1991, pp. 212–230.

[494] Frederick Mathewson Denny, “Fazlur Rahman: Muslim Intellectual,” The Muslim World, volume 79, number 2, April 1989, pp. 91–101.

[495] Muhammad Shibli Nu’mani, Safarnama (Lahore, Pakistan: Ghulam ‘Ali and Sons, 1961), pp. 285–286.

[496] Shibli Nu’mani, p. 349.

[497] [A chapter of Iqbal’s work is included in this volume.—Editor]

[498] Philip Lewis, Islamic Britain: Religion, Politics and Identity among British Muslims (London: I.B. Tauris, 1994).

[499] David Herbert, “Shabbir Akhtar on Muslims, Christians and British Society,” Islam and Christian-Muslim Relations, volume 4, number 1, June 1993, p. 104.

[500] The Everlasting Man (London: Burns and Oates, 1974), originally published in 1925, p. 9.

[501] Diary of a Genius (London: Pan Books, Picador edition, 1976), p. 52.

[502] Kenneth Cragg, The Pen and the Faith (London: Allen and Unwin, 1985), chapter 7.

[503] “The Great Perhaps,” in Resurgence, number 137, 1990, pp. 47–48.

[504] The term is Qur’anic. A man and woman are said to be like garments for each other [Sura 2, Verse 187].

[505] The Revival of the Religious Sciences, book 111, section 198, Cairo edition. Compare the passage in Matthew, chapter 23, verse 27.

#title Anthropologists in the Public Sphere

#subtitle Speaking Out on War, Peace, and American Power

#author Roberto J. Gonzalez

#date

#source

#lang en

#pubdate 2024-08-13T06:25:38

#topics anthropology, CIA

#cover r-j-roberto-j-gonzalez-anthropologists-in-the-publ-1.jpg

#DELETED temp

 [Front Matter]

 [Title Page]

ANTHROPOLOGISTS IN THE PUBLIC SPHERE

SPEAKING OUT ON WAR, PEACE, AND AMERICAN POWER

EDITED BY ROBERTO J. GONZÁLEZ

UNIVERSITY OF TEXAS PRESS

AUSTIN

 [Copyright]

Copyright © 2004 by the University of Texas Press

All rights reserved

Printed in the United States of America

First edition, 2004

Requests for permission to reproduce material from this work should be sent to Permissions, University of Texas Press, P.O. Box 7819, Austin, TX 78713–7819.

® The paper used in this book meets the minimum requirements of ANSI/NISO Z39.48–1992 (R1997) (Permanence of Paper).

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS CATALOGING-IN-PUBLICATION DATA

Anthropologists in the public sphere : speaking out on war, peace, and American power / edited by Roberto J.

González. — 1st ed.

p. cm.

Includes bibliographical references and index.

ISBN 0-292-70235-3 (cl. : alk. paper) —

ISBN 0-292-70169-1 (pbk. : alk. paper)

1. Political anthropology. 2. War and society.

3. Peace. 4. Power (Social sciences) I. González,

Roberto J. (Roberto Jesús), date

CN492.A592 2004

306.2—dc22

<right>

2003021093

</right>

 [Dedication]

FOR JORGE, ERNESTO, AND VERÓNICA

 Contents

Acknowledgments

INTRODUCTION

Anthropologists in the Public Sphere: Speaking

Out on War, Peace, and American Power

PART I: WAR, PEACE, AND SOCIAL RESPONSIBILITY 21

CHAPTER 1: FRANZ BOAS 23

“Scientists as Spies” (The Nation, 1919)

CHAPTER 2: MARGARET MEAD 26

“Warfare Is Only an Invention—Not a Biological Necessity” (Asia, 1940)

CHAPTER 3: MARSHALL SAHLINS 34

“Once You’ve Broken Him Down...” (The Nation, 1965)

CHAPTER 4: GERALD D. BERREMAN 46

“Contemporary Anthropology and Moral Accountability” (To See Ourselves, 1973)

CHAPTER 5: LAURA NADER 52

“Two Plus Two Equals Zero—War and Peace Reconsidered” (Radcliffe Quarterly, 1983)

CHAPTER 6: BEATRIZ MANZ 58

“Dollars That Forge Guatemalan Chains” (New York Times, 1985)

CHAPTER 7: DAVID PRICE 62

“Anthropologists as Spies” (The Nation, 2000)

CHAPTER 8: PIERRE BOURDIEU 71

“Abuse of Power by the Advocates of Reason” (Acts of Resistance, 1998)

PART II: PRESCIENT ANTHROPOLOGY:

DIAGNOSING CRISES ABROAD 73

CHAPTER 9: ROBERT M. HAYDEN 75

“West Must Correct Its Mistakes in Yugoslavia”

(Baltimore Sun, 1992)

CHAPTER 10: ROBERT M. HAYDEN 78

“NATO Fuels the Balkan Fire”

(Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, 1999)

CHAPTER 11: ANNA SIMONS 82

“No Exit from Somalia”

(Washington Post, 1991)

CHAPTER 12: ANNA SIMONS 84

“Our Abysmal Ignorance about Somalia” (Washington Post, 1992)

CHAPTER 13: ANNA SIMONS 88

“The Somalia Trap” (Washington Post, 1993)

CHAPTER 14: WINIFRED TATE 91

“Increased U.S. Military Aid to Colombia

Won’t Curb Drug Trafficking”

(San Francisco Chronicle, 1999)

CHAPTER 15: WINIFRED TATE 94

“Colombia: Rules of the Game”

(Foreign Policy in Focus, 2001)

CHAPTER 16: LESLEY GILL 97

“Unveiling U.S. Policy in Colombia”

(Foreign Policy in Focus, 2002)

CHAPTER 17: MARC EDELMAN 102

“The Price of Free Trade: Famine” (Los Angeles Times, 2002)

CHAPTER 18: ALI QLEIBO 105

“How Two Truths Make One Tragedy” (The Independent, 2000)

CHAPTER 19: JETT HALPER 108

“The Matrix of Control”

(Media Monitors Network, 2001)

CHAPTER 20: JETT HALPER 112

“After the Invasion: Now What?”

(CounterPunch, 2002)

CHAPTER 21: HUGH GUSTERSON 117

“If U.S. Dumps Test Ban Treaty,

China Will Rejoice” (Los Angeles Times, 2001)

PART III: PRELUDE TO SEPTEMBER 11 121

CHAPTER 22: ASHRAT GHANI 123

“Cut Off the Arms Flow and Let Afghans Unite” (Los Angeles Times, 1989)

CHAPTER 23: JAMES MERRYMAN 127

“U.S. Can Strengthen African Ties in Wake of Terrorism with Aid, Clear Policies”

(Harrisburg Patriot-News, 1998)

CHAPTER 24: ROBERT TERNEA 130

“Egyptians Don’t Like Saddam, But...” (Austin American-Statesman, 1991)

CHAPTER 25: BARBARA NIMRI AZIZ 133 “Gravesites—Environmental Ruin in Iraq” (Metal of Dishonor, 1997)

CHAPTER 26: TADWA EL GUINDI 140

“U.N. Should Act to Protect Muslim Women” (Newsday, 1998)

CHAPTER 27: ZIEBA SHORISH-SHAMLEY, INTERVIEWED

BY JANA WENDT 144

“Women under the Taliban” (Dateline, 2001)

CHAPTER 28: WILLIAM O. BEEMAN 147

“Follow the Oil Trail—Mess in Afghanistan Partly Our Government’s Fault”

(Pacific News Service, 1998)

PART IV: ANTHROPOLOGICAL INTERPRETATIONS

OF SEPTEMBER 11 151

CHAPTER 29: CATHERINE LUTZ 153

“Our Legacy of War”

(Chronicle of Higher Education, 2001)

CHAPTER 30: DAVID HARVEY, TALAL ASAD, CINDI KATZ, NEIL SMITH, AND IDA SUSSER 156 “Local Horror/Global Response”

(Chronicle of Higher Education: Colloquy, 2001)

CHAPTER 31: WILLIAM O. BEEMAN 158

“A War Our Great-Grandchildren Will Be Fighting—Understanding Osama Bin Laden” (Pacific News Service, 2001)

CHAPTER 32: JANET MCINTOSH 161

“What Have the 9/11 Investigators Overlooked?” (Christian Science Monitor, 2002)

CHAPTER 33: WADE DAVIS 165

“We Need a Global Declaration of Interdependence” (International Herald Tribune, 2002)

PART V: ON AFGHANISTAN, CENTRAL ASIA, AND THE MIDDLE EAST 171

CHAPTER 34: ROBERT CANFIELD 173

“Nation Is Home to Afghans, Mujahedeen, Taliban, Afghan-Arabs, to Name a Few” (St. Louis Post-Dispatch, 2001)

CHAPTER 35: ASHRAF GHANI 176

“The Folly of Quick Action in Afghanistan” (Financial Times, 2001)

CHAPTER 36: NAZIF SHAHRANI 180 “Afghanistan Can Learn from Its Past” (New York Times, 2001)

CHAPTER 37: ZIEBA SHORISH-SHAMLEY, INTERVIEWED BY AMY GOODMAN 183

“Women in the New Afghanistan” (Democracy Now! 2001)

CHAPTER 38: DAVID B. EDWARDS AND SHAHMAHMOOD MIAKHEL 189

“Enlisting Afghan Aid” (People’s Geography Project, 2001)

CHAPTER 39: KAMRAN ASDAR ALI 192

“Pakistan’s Dilemma” (Middle East Report Online, 2001)

CHAPTER 40: FRANCESCA MEREU, WITH SERGEI ARUTYUNOV AND IAN CHESNOV 197

“War Destroyed Chechnya’s Clan Structure” (Middle East News Online, 2002)

PART VI: EXAMINING MILITARISM AND THE “WAR ON TERROR” 203

CHAPTER 41: WILLIAM O. BEEMAN 205

“U.S. Anti-Terrorist Message Won’t Fly in Islamic World” (Pacific News Service, 2001)

CHAPTER 42: DAVID PRICE 208

“Terror and Indigenous Peoples: War without End”

(CounterPunch, 2001)

CHAPTER 43: JOHN BURDICK 211

“Afghan War Could Be Recruiting Tool for Terrorists” (Syracuse Post-Standard, 2001)

CHAPTER 44: DALE F. EICKELMAN 214

“First, Know the Enemy, Then Act” (Los Angeles Times, 2001)

CHAPTER 45: JOHN BURDICK 219

“Sept. 11 Exposes Futile Search for ‘Perfect’ Missile Defense” (Syracuse Post-Standard, 2001)

CHAPTER 46: ROBERTO J. GONZÁLEZ 222

“Ignorance Is Not Bliss” (San Francisco Chronicle, 2002)

CHAPTER 47: MAHMOOD MAMDANI 226

“Turn Off Your Tunnel Vision” (Washington Post, 2002)

CHAPTER 48: THOMAS MCKENNA, INTERVIEWED BY NERMEEN SHAIKH 229

“The Roots of Muslim Separatism in the Philippines” (AsiaSource, 2002)

PART VII: ACADEMIC FREEDOM AND CIVIL LIBERTIES 237

CHAPTER 49: ROBERTO J. GONZÁLEZ 239

“Lynne Cheney-Joe Lieberman Group Puts Out a Blacklist” (San Jose Mercury News, 2001)

CHAPTER 50: DAVID PRICE 243

“Academia under Attack: Sketches for a New Blacklist” (CounterPunch, 2001)

CHAPTER 51: HUGH GUSTERSON, INTERVIEWED BY SHARON BASCO 247

“Lynne Cheney’s Free Speech Blacklist” (TomPaine.com, 2002)

CHAPTER 52: LAURA NADER

“Harmony Coerced Is Freedom Denied” (Chronicle of Higher Education, 2001)

EPILOGUE: Unconventional Anthropology: Challenging the Myths of Continuous War 257

List of Contributors 269

Permissions 273

Index 279

 Acknowledgments

Research for this book was supported in part by a Junior Faculty Career Development Grant from San Jose State University. Roberto and Imelda González enthusiastically encouraged me to pursue the project in its earliest stages. C. Jay Ou and Kenji Tierney made suggestions that improved the manuscript. Theresa May of the University of Texas Press provided comments and directed the manuscript to two anonymous reviewers, who gave thorough and insightful suggestions. I also wish to thank colleagues from the San Jose State anthropology department for their support.

For the last ten years, Laura Nader and Gerald Berreman have been extraordinary mentors. By practicing and advocating a more relevant anthropology, they continue inspiring others to follow their example. I am especially grateful to Laura Nader for her generosity and encouragement.

 Introduction: Anthropologists in the Public Sphere

Speaking Out on War, Peace, and American Power

ROBERTO J. GONZÁLEZ

Every time intellectuals have the chance to speak yet do not speak, they join the forces that train men not to be able to think and imagine and feel in morally and politically adequate ways. When they do not demand that the secrecy that makes elite decisions absolute and unchallengeable be removed, they too are part of the passive conspiracy to kill off public scrutiny. When they do not speak, when they do not demand, when they do not think and feel and act as intellectuals... they contribute to the moral paralysis, the intellectual rigidity, that now grip both leaders and led around the world.

—C. WRIGHT MILLS, THE CAUSES OF WORLD WAR III (1958)

It is time to divert at least some of our research energies away from the minutiae of diverse problems and to focus on their broader context. What has been missing is perspective ...Anthropology appears to be a discipline that can show us how we got where we are and suggest how we might get out.

—JOHN BODLEY, ANTHROPOLOGY AND CONTEMPORARY HUMAN PROBLEMS (1985)

 Anthropology for the General Public

This book is about anthropologists communicating what they know about culture, society, history, and power with the general public. Their statements are short, pointed, and passionate, based on experience and immersion in the subject matter—not fly-by-night observations.

In the 1930s and 1940s, some American anthropologists were so influential, and their work so well known, that they were literally household names. In magazines and newspaper articles and in public debates, Franz Boas, Ruth Benedict, and Margaret Mead (all of Columbia University), as well as Ashley Montagu, regularly commented upon issues of national and international politics and culture using language that almost any literate person could understand.

It is not unusual for anthropologists in other countries to address broad audiences—for example, in Mexico, Rodolfo Stavenhagen, Margarita Nolasco, and Roger Bartra often contribute commentaries to daily newspapers such as La Jornada and Reforma. In France, Claude Lévi-Strauss and Pierre Bourdieu published frequently in Le Monde and other periodicals. Brazil, India, and other countries also have anthropologists who are national figures.

Today few anthropologists could be considered celebrities in the United States, but that does not mean that none speak to the public. The contemporary picture is more disperse, with hundreds of individuals reaching out to wider audiences—in local newspapers, on radio programs and television shows, at schools, museums, libraries, and bookstores, and with community organizations. As the discipline has expanded, it has become more diverse and eclectic. Not surprisingly, efforts at publicizing anthropological knowledge are more varied and decentralized.

There is a wide range of projects under way to disseminate anthropology within the United States. An anthropologist at Virginia Polytechnic, Samuel Cook, has spent years working with community groups in the Appalachian region to draw attention to the environmentally destructive practice of mountaintop removal by coal mining companies. Robert Borofsky of Hawaii Pacific University is revitalizing public anthropology by searching for new avenues to make anthropological knowledge accessible to nonspecialists. His projects include the compilation of concise summaries of articles published in the discipline’s most widely circulated journals. Recently, anthropology graduate students at the University of California, Berkeley, edited an anthology, September 11: Contexts and Consequences, to help broaden public knowledge about the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. Thousands of copies now circulate among those seeking a better understanding of fast-moving foreign policies. Eric Prokosch, whose anthropological analysis of antipersonnel weapons in The Technology of Killing (1995) provides critical information for researchers and the lay public, is perhaps best known for working with Amnesty International in campaigns to end torture and the death penalty. Still others, such as Jan English-Lueck from San Jose State University, are introducing anthropology to high school, junior high, and elementary school students, not only as a way of recruiting future generations of anthropologists, but also to train young minds to think comparatively and critically.

This collection of readings focuses on another group of anthropologists working to publicize their knowledge through the popular press. Specifically, they make use of mass media to diffuse information about U.S. foreign policy and its impact upon other societies. Most of the pieces included here have appeared in newspapers, magazines, or online journals, while a few others are from interviews on television or radio programs. These anthropologists are participant-observers and citizen-scholars whose work appeals directly to the American public.

Although all the contributors have been trained as anthropologists, not all are academics. Some are graduate students, while others are professors or professors emeriti. The collection also includes pieces by anthropologists working for nonprofit or nongovernmental organizations, popular magazines, radio stations, and activist groups. At first sight, it is striking that the majority of the articles have been written by anthropologists who are not based at the old prestige centers of the discipline—the academic departments of elite universities such as Columbia University. Yet an anthropology attuned to public audiences may well reemerge from the profession’s peripheries, if greater tolerance for experimentation is permitted from off-center locations.

A common thread links the individual articles and interviews: they may be read as cultural critiques of American Empire. The emergence and extension of this empire and the corporatization of government are among the most important historical facts of our time and have inspired recent studies by social scientists, economists, and other scholars.[1] Some of the contributors to this book directly address aspects of U.S. governmental foreign policy and its effects in Latin America, the Balkans, Central Asia, Africa, the Middle East, and Southeast Asia. Others focus on the role of social scientists in U.S. imperialist projects. Still others examine connections between “free” trade, corporate power, and the role of military regimes in establishing and maintaining a “New World Order” in the service of multinational corporations.

The anthropologists included in this book are sophisticated in their use of cross-cultural comparison and history, and recognize that cultures are complex and change over time. Most are keenly aware—based on first hand experience—that the analysis of power and control in variegated forms on a global scale is necessary for understanding contemporary realities. The Cold War, economic development programs, and now the “war on terror” have had dramatic effects on people in the “Third World.”

In some cases, an anthropologist’s repeated efforts to make a prognosis appear clearly as open warnings to policy makers about the possible consequences of government action. Such commentaries are published but more often than not ignored by policy makers—this has especially been true in recent years. When the situation becomes a crisis, the anthropologist writes again, and recommendations once again are not used. After the crisis has come to a head and disaster has occurred, the anthropologist tries to draw a lesson from it, and he or she is sometimes invited in to fix things after the fact.

Lack of response from policy makers to early warnings might partially explain the surge in cultural critiques that have emerged since the attacks of September 11. Literally dozens of anthropologists have written and spoken about multiple aspects of the tragic events and their aftermath, often with tremendous urgency. For this reason, the geographic center of gravity of this collection falls in the Middle East and Central Asia, since the media, government officials, and ordinary Americans have looked upon these areas with interest and concern. Many of the authors counter ethnocentric or stereotypical views of a region’s peoples by helping readers understand its cultural complexity and historical connections to Europe and the United States. Confronting persistent ignorance with persistent appeals to reason may lead to change if public opinion can be impacted. Although policy makers may not be quick to use anthropological commentaries, the general public often does a better job. It is to spark citizen thought and action that we write, since without the push and pull of ordinary citizens, there is no democracy.

A publicly engaged anthropology is more necessary now than ever before—not in spite of, but because of, what some call corporate colonialism and what others call free trade. Speaking out and insisting that anthropology play a role in public discussions is especially critical as private interests recruit anthropologists to help promote an expanding multinational corporate dominion by transforming peasants, huntergatherers, pastoralists, refugees, and immigrants into mass consumers.

 Why Anthropology?

Daily newspapers, evening news programs, and weekly magazines report on a long list of pressing issues. Economic globalization and its contradictory effects, ethnic strife, biotechnology, multiculturalism, fundamentalisms and religious revival, nuclear proliferation, the nature of human intelligence, and the state of the environment frequently make headlines. So do seemingly endless wars on terrorism and drugs.

Topics such as these beg for thoughtful analysis. Many self-described experts, however, often suffer from myopia, ethnocentrism, lack of imagination, and, sometimes, dubious credentials. More and more of them are public relations people posing as independent third parties who conduct scientific research for the highest bidder while concealing conflicts of interest.[2] Others who have been assigned the name “pundits” attempt to speak with authority about topics they often know little about.[3] Some of them speak about culture and civilization as if they had come up with the concepts themselves—and abuse them daily.

Considering this sad state of affairs, anthropologists may be uniquely positioned to speak with knowledge and insight. The anthropological lens focuses on humans holistically and cross-culturally, never losing sight of long-term historical processes. Good anthropology integrates culture, language, biology, and history to answer questions about humans and the societies they have made.

At a time when technical experts are trained to think in reductionistic terms by breaking problems into tinier and tinier pieces, to view issues from an ethnocentric perspective ignorant of other cultures, and to live in the present without remembering the past, many anthropologists still strive to be generalists. This contrasts sharply with the approach of many policy makers in our country, who act under the flawed assumption that human troubles can be bracketed off and separated from history, culture, politics, and the future.

Yet we have learned that humans are not automatons. The human horizon has myriad possibilities: Homo sapiens is a creature that sometimes cooperates but just as frequently conflicts, a creature of habit and reflex but also of creativity and innovation, of selfishness but also of altruism. Some of the most persistent and perplexing questions seek to discover how and why groups of people coalesce or break apart—how human relationships hang together or unravel, what changes, what does not. We have long been interested in the question of survival— how, under situations of tremendous ecological, political, or economic pressure, men and women innovate or acquiesce.[4]

Perhaps as importantly, most cultural anthropologists undertake extended fieldwork, living in a different society for a year or more in an effort to understand things “from the native’s point of view.” We live and talk with real people and piece together complex realties from interviews, observations, documents, and other sources. Anthropologists are interested in streets, barrios, ghettos, villages, and refugee camps as well as airport lobbies, first-class hotels, theaters, and bars.

This wide-angle lens gives us a powerful tool for critiquing contemporary life, since we are at once culturally immersed and detached. With insight, anthropologists have challenged deeply held convictions about affluence and poverty, as when Marshall Sahlins suggested that limited wants—not just the accumulation of material goods—might be an alternative basis for defining wealth.[5] Or about science—as when Bronislaw Malinowski insisted that all peoples have magic, religion, and science.[6] Or about sexual norms—as when Margaret Mead informed us that sexual practices are not universal.[7] Or about “race” —as when Franz Boas demonstrated that biological variation within human populations is much greater than the variation between them — an early critique of biological hierarchies.[8] Time and again, anthropological awareness of alternatives has opened new paths for the future.

Sometimes anthropology has demonstrated an uncanny ability to diagnose problems before they become crises. Anthropological prescience has sometimes foretold events months or years in advance. As we shall see, some anthropologists have very publicly predicted impending political and humanitarian disasters in Iraq, the former Yugoslavia, Somalia, and Afghanistan, to name a few. In the selections in this volume, authors have pointed to specific conditions that signal serious trouble ahead in Central America, Pakistan, the Middle East, and the United States. This work, based upon on-the-ground experience and intimate cultural knowledge, suggests a novel approach towards foreign policy in which anthropologists might take a leading role: a preventive diplomacy that aims to forestall (rather than await) future crises by addressing root causes. Current approaches based upon gunboat diplomacy and Realpolitik have proven to be unsustainable in economic and humanitarian terms—or indeed in survival terms.

 Speaking Out as a Public Service

On the surface it is peculiar—even bizarre—that U.S. anthropologists don’t have an even more public face, especially since so many either work at public institutions of higher learning or directly for government agencies. Taxpayers underwrite much of our work, legislators allocate the funds—but what are they getting in return? Granted, many of us teach, but should this be the extent of our public service? Should service include governmental policy recommendations? Expert testimony before congressional committees? Education of the general public?

We might step back in time, to the period before anthropology in the United States was based in universities. A century ago many of its practitioners were based in museums, public spaces for educating as well as entertaining the public. Some argued that for anthropology to survive, museums had to attract large numbers of laypeople—or else wither away from irrelevance and public indifference. The subject matter was inherently interesting, but the problem, still relevant today, was how to pitch information to the general public in a palatable yet enlightening way.

As more anthropologists became full-time academics in the twentieth century, concern for making knowledge public sometimes lapsed. Activities and publications thought to be nonacademic were seldom useful for attaining tenure (or for promotions), and the gap between academic and nonacademic anthropology widened. Today, the term “journalistic” is sometimes used to stigmatize such work. As a colleague once said, “You have to have two discussions going at the same time— one with the geeks in the department and another with the ordinary folks.”

In many cases, university professors have abandoned ordinary folks altogether and are just talking to each other. Kendall Thu of Iowa State observes this when he points out that some cultural anthropologists “have been pursuing trendy issues of postmodernism, blurred genres and identities, hermeneutic interpretation, voices of hegemony, and reflexivity... we are making ourselves increasingly irrelevant to contemporary policy and politics.” [9] This is not to dismiss postmodern approaches—after all, they have partly inspired critiques of hegemonic discourses, including “Orientalist” discourses that have produced stereotypes of “the East”—but where they are found, introversion and self-absorption have undermined their potential connections to real world affairs. Malaysian anthropologist Wazir Karim argues that much of academic anthropology has isolated itself by refusing to confront pressing political issues such as the use of “Western” knowledge by “Third World” elites for the repression of workers, peasants, women, and indigenous people.[10] And Laura Nader recently noted that “anthropology is presently vastly hampered by both secrecy and selfcensorship and in danger of becoming insular to the point of irrelevance except for literary and cultural studies concerns.” [11]

In recent decades, anthropologists have become increasingly specialized and consequently fenced into narrow subspecialties and fields. Many are unable to communicate with wider publics. Critics have observed this phenomenon more generally across the social sciences and humanities, while others have commented upon the decline of “public intellectuals” in the United States in the twentieth century. This may be the culmination of historical processes: since at least the 1870s, social scientists who have publicly challenged established structures of power in the United States—particularly corporate power—have often been marginalized, persecuted, or stripped of their positions for allegedly violating the norms of an objective and value-free science.[12] Yet as economist Douglas Dowd once noted, “The alternatives are not ‘neutrality’ and ‘advocacy.’ To be uncommitted is not to be neutral, but to be committed—consciously or not—to the status quo.” [13] We might take heart in knowing that there are clear exceptions to the rule of intellectual confinement among U.S. academics, as in the case of Edward Said, Patricia J. Williams, Henry Louis Gates, Jr., Cornel West, Juliet Schor, Noam Chomsky, and Saskia Sassen, all of whom communicate with broad publics.

There are more reasons why anthropologists do not reach wider audiences. At the same time that political and critical perspectives have arisen, the corporate media is becoming more restrictive and homogenous. The range of political perspectives has demonstrably narrowed in the last decade, according to media watchdog groups and foreign observers of U.S. conformity.

Factors internal to the discipline may also play a role in anthropologists opting out of communication with wider publics. A host of everyday practices function as barriers between academic anthropologists and nonprofessionals, including the business model of the AAA (and increasingly of academic departments), annual meetings held in luxury hotels, hiring practices and patron-client relationships that tend to exclude women and minorities, and class-based distinctions such as dress, speech, and other practices that reinforce the relatively narrow boundaries of the academic culture.

The need for anthropological input is great. Although many men and women have vast information about the world at their fingertips, never before have so many known so little about it. The acceleration of everyday life, along with passive, seductive, and addictive forms of leisure, block the exchange of knowledge, even easily accessible knowledge. Many ordinary people want to understand how their lives are connected to economic boom and bust, migration, corporate dominion, and war. We have an important role to play in this enterprise, as our predecessors did in the 1920s, the 1940s, and the late 1960s.

A reconnected anthropology might begin by looking at one of the most exotic cultures ever invented—our own. An economic anthropologist from Mars would probably be surprised that in a country where equality is highly valued, the wealthiest 1 percent of the population owns approximately 45 percent of the total assets. In 2001, the average CEO earned 500 times more than the average blue-collar worker, and more than 1,200 times more than the minimum wage worker. Assembly plants continue to close in the Rust Belt, the Deep South, and Silicon Valley, as jobs are exported to Latin America and Southeast Asia where labor costs are cheap and environmental laws are lax or ignored.

If our interplanetary visitor examined politics, he or she might also be intrigued by the collapse of Enron and the apparent contradictions between democracy in theory and in practice. More than half of the members of the House of Representatives and 71 of 100 senators have accepted campaign contributions from Enron, and George W. Bush accepted more than half a million dollars between 1994 and 2001. When eleven congressional committees were scheduled to investigate the company, reports surfaced that of the 248 members of Congress charged with the investigations, no less than 212 received “soft money” campaign contributions from either Enron or its accounting firm, Arthur Anderson.

Undoubtedly fascinated with the contradictory culture of the United States, our extraterrestrial colleague might move on to an analysis of legal systems and find it remarkable that in the present period, certain fundamental guarantees protected by constitutional law have been suspended. The FBI, CIA, and armed forces under the Bush administration have detained more than 1,000 Muslim and Arab people living in the United States in violation of their Constitutional rights, subjected hundreds of millions to greater surveillance, and declared a unilateral “war on terror” in utter disregard of international law. In March 2003 the Bush administration launched a war against Iraq while ignoring the U.N. Security Council.

In times like these, anthropological voices might shed light on cultural contradictions in our own society, the divergence between cultural ideals and realities and what happens as a result, and new possibilities for human action in a democratic society.

This might be a public service and even a civic duty: to observe and comment upon the United States today, the most powerful country on the planet; the relationships between its government officials, military establishment, and multinational corporations; and the effects and consequences of American Empire on the people that we have lived with and learned from in our research.

 Anthropologists as Citizen-Scholars

Civic duty can be defined in different ways, and so can civic anthropology. During World War II, many prominent anthropologists in the United States contributed to the war effort. Ruth Benedict wrote her famous study of “culture at a distance,” The Chrysanthemum and the Sword, to better understand the Japanese; Margaret Mead tried to analyze problems facing American GIs in England; George P. Murdock expanded the Human Relations Area Files with funding from the military; and Clyde Kluckhohn worked with the Office of Strategic Services or OSS (the precursor to the CIA), along with dozens of anthropologists. Others worked directly with Army and Navy intelligence and the Office of War Information (OWI).

These experiences indicate that public engagement does not always result in progressive politics or even humane policies. In fact, cultural knowledge has sometimes been applied during extraordinarily dark chapters in U.S. history. For instance, although anthropologists working for the OWI attempted to “convince the military that they did not have to engage in acts of genocidal annihilation” against Japan to end the war, others working as “community analysts” for the War Relocation Authority enthusiastically advised the government on how to efficiently administer internment camps where approximately 120,000 Japanese and Japanese-Americans were incarcerated on U.S. soil.[14] There are many other examples, including the case of Gregory Bateson, who while working with the OSS “applied his principles of schismo-genesis to foster disorder among minority populations” in South Asia.[15] Though Bateson would later regret participating in such projects, others did not. Elements of this research were later used in psychological warfare operations and “culture cracking” strategies employed by the CIA in Vietnam and other countries. Our discipline’s involvement in World War II reminds us that the application of anthropological knowledge—especially in the direct service of wartime government agencies—is not free of possible contradictions, paradoxes, and ethical dilemmas.

After World War II, anthropologists continued conducting covert operations for the CIA. The American Anthropological Association (AAA) collaborated secretly with the agency in the early 1950s to create a directory of the association’s members with information about their research. Eventually, documents revealed that some anthropologists had undertaken clandestine projects with the U.S. military in its war in Southeast Asia in which they provided detailed ethnographic data on peasant communities, prepared surveys and reports on counterinsurgency, and gave information about the region’s geography.[16] When word of this became public in the late 1960s and early 1970s, a fact-finding AAA committee headed by Margaret Mead reported no wrongdoing on the part of those involved, to the dismay of many members, particularly younger ones. For some social scientists, clearing the way for public debate on the war in Indochina began to take precedence over informing the CIA, the armed forces, and the military’s think tanks. Critical to this shift was a change in notions of accountability: To which constituencies should the anthropologist be accountable? To the federal government and its subcontractors? To the subjects of his or her research? Or directly to the country and the American public?

When anthropologists found that ethnographic information was being used in ways they never intended—for example, to inflict harm upon people such as peasants suspected of being Communist sympathizers—they did not stand helplessly by. They mobilized themselves, rolled up their sleeves, and got to work. It seems clear that by the mid-1960s, a new kind of anthropology was emerging that for some redefined civic responsibility. For this group, civic duty wasn't necessarily unequivocal support for an undeclared U.S. war in Vietnam, or rallying behind the president to support the war. An alternative definition of civic duty might mean protection and promotion of freedom, reason, and equality—even if that conflicted with official government policy.

The painful political lessons of World War II and Vietnam shook our discipline and the academy to their cores. We learned that the militaryindustrial complex described by President Eisenhower in his 1961 farewell address to the country might undermine America's liberties and democratic processes—and our professional autonomy.

Anthropologists were at the forefront during this transformation.[17] Marshall Sahlins is credited with creating the teach-in at the University of Michigan in 1965, with help from colleagues such as Eric Wolf and, at UC Berkeley, Gerald Berreman. During teach-ins students, professors, and citizens would meet after hours (sometimes in all-night sessions) to read and discuss books and articles about the history and culture of Southeast Asia, Latin America, and areas of the world undergoing upheaval and to talk about current events, especially the war in Vietnam. In 1969 Dell Hymes edited Reinventing Anthropology, which among other things called for an anthropology relevant to the times, an awareness of its colonial roots, greater inclusion of minorities in the discipline, and the study of powerful institutions.[18] Others including Laura Nader spoke to community groups such as Kiwanis and Rotary Clubs in order to inform older people about issues concerning young people: free speech, civil rights, women's rights, and Vietnam. Still others insisted that anthropologists be accountable primarily to American principles. Many insisted that the interests of field subjects take precedence over military interests, and succeeded in writing a code of ethics for the American Anthropological Association reflecting this concern—at great risk to their professional careers.[19] (The code of ethics was passed in 1970, but as we shall see in Selection 7, it was diluted in the 1980s.) In different ways these scholars brought universities into the public spotlight, in some cases for the first time in many years, breaking the silence of the McCarthy era.

These scholars shifted their efforts to inform the general public and broaden public debate on issues of war and peace. Others continued informing the generals in the military. Those reaching the general public taught students and laypeople important information useful for carrying out the challenging work of participatory democracy.

 Reconnecting Anthropology

What about today? If we focus upon the accelerating expansion of U.S. influence across the globe—and the imminent crises provoked by these new colonial relationships largely invisible to Americans—we find a growing number of examples of a publicly engaged anthropology that communicates directly with the citizenry, independently of official governmental channels. Some are speaking out and living up to the professional and public responsibilities of the discipline—a critical task in the current wartime climate of national fear and uncertainty.[20] Anthropologist David Price has recently suggested that “in times of war we have a fundamental duty as scholars and citizens to counter the limited views of American and allied policy makers... efforts in this direction would be most effective if we operate as citizen-scholars outside of governmental agencies.” This collection samples such independent scholarship.

It begins with “War, Peace, and Social Responsibility,” a section written by anthropologists over a span of eighty years. Franz Boas’ letter to the editor of The Nation, “Scientists as Spies,” is a classic example of how anthropologists have engaged pressing contemporary issues—in this case, the use of social scientists for espionage during World War I. His brief letter aroused so much controversy that it led to his expulsion from the AAA. The next piece is a 1940 article by Boas’s student, Margaret Mead, who in “Warfare Is Only an Invention—Not a Biological Necessity” makes an appeal for alternative means of resolving global conflicts. The next selections revisit the Vietnam era. In 1965 Marshall Sahlins shocked readers with an account of psychological torture techniques described to him by U.S. military advisers. Gerald D. Berreman discusses anthropology’s lack of accountability following revelations that some of its practitioners had been involved in clandestine counterinsurgency projects. “Two Plus Two Equals Zero,” a selection by Laura Nader written in the early 1980s, describes the unplanned, unconscious, and incremental movement toward war in our society at a time of unprecedented growth of the nuclear arsenal. “Dollars That Forge Guatemalan Chains” is a commentary by Beatriz Manz which documents the brutality of the civil war in Guatemala and the U.S. role in supporting the state military in that conflict. David Price’s contribution, “Anthropologists as Spies,” revisits the topic introduced by Boas in 1919. After examining the espionage cases mentioned by Boas, Price singles out the AAA’s long-standing reluctance to issue statements condemning covert research and espionage. He notes that the economic realities of the present era may make spying even more attractive to some: “As increasing numbers of anthropologists find employment in corporations, anthropological research becomes not a quest for scientific truth, as in the days of Boas, but a quest for secret or proprietary data for governmental or corporate sponsors.” The section concludes with a commentary by Pierre Bourdieu entitled, “Abuse of Power by the Advocates of Reason,” which critiques multinational corporate regimes, the World Bank, and the IMF on the grounds that they are impoverishing entire regions and provoking violent backlash.

The next section, “Prescient Anthropology,” zeroes in on the work of anthropologists describing international crises in the making—sometimes years in advance. For example, Robert M. Hayden, who conducted field research in the former Yugoslavia and India, published an early warning in 1991 about the impending threat of ethnic conflict in the post-Cold War era. His words read prophetically, years before the massacres in Rwanda or the former Yugoslavia. Another article by Hayden critiques the unprecedented NATO bombing of Kosovo in 1999. Anna Simons published a series of op-ed pieces for the Washington Post on the desperate conditions in Somalia long before Black Hawk Down. Her words tell the story of a nation devastated by civil war, famine, and refugees. They also convey concern for lack of media coverage and a poorly informed group of policy “experts.” Her words too were visionary; they foretold and then analyzed the botched U.S. mission in Somalia. Other contributors are prescient in their analyses. Articles by Winifred Tate and Lesley Gill critique U.S. military aid to Colombia (specifically, its use in the “war on drugs”) and emphasize the necessity for a peaceful resolution to that country’s internal conflicts, while Marc Edelman’s commentary focuses on the link between free trade policies and famine in Central America. The Israeli occupation of the Gaza Strip and the West Bank and the worsening crisis there are the focus of contributions from a Palestinian anthropologist, Ali Qleibo, and an Israeli anthropologist, Jeff Halper (coordinator of the Israeli Committee against House Demolitions). The section ends with Hugh Gusterson’s critique of our government’s proposals to dump the comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty.

The section “Prelude to September 11” includes articles and interviews describing grave crises in Central Asia, the Middle East, and Africa. Ashraf Ghani, an anthropologist recently appointed as Afghanistan’s finance minister, was by early 1989 warning that abandoning that country could have disastrous consequences over the long term. James Merryman’s piece, written following the 1998 attacks on American embassies in Kenya and Tanzania, suggests that aid to the families of hundreds of African victims and a clearer foreign policy might improve our country’s standing in those countries. Robert Fernea and Barbara Nimri Aziz focus on various aspects of the first Gulf War and the aftermath of the economic embargo. Fadwa El Guindi, writing years before most Americans had heard of the Taliban, published an op-ed piece describing the plight of women in Algeria, Afghanistan, and several other predominantly Muslim societies. An interview with Zieba Shorish-Shamley describes different aspects of the Taliban’s repression of women. The section concludes with William O. Beeman’s 1998 analysis of the “mess in Afghanistan” and the role of oil corporations seeking to secure a route to the petroleum reserves of the Caspian Sea.

The attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon inspired a great many responses from academics, and the section “Anthropological Interpretations of September 11” presents some of the most thoughtful and well articulated. Catherine Lutz, who has recently focused her career on the relationship between society and the military in the United States, writes that our country has been in “a permanent state of war” since the late 1930s but that for many Americans this has not been visible because conflict has been “outsourced to the global south.” David Harvey, Talal Asad, and colleagues from the CUNY Graduate Center strongly condemn the attacks and then make an impassioned appeal for the United States to refrain from the "intensification of erroneous policies and practices" overseas. William O. Beeman's article focuses on the dangers of engaging bin Laden and his allies in a shortsighted war of revenge. In separate articles, Janet McIntosh and Wade Davis critique the inability or unwillingness of our leaders to come to terms with the role of the United States in creating the conditions that led to the attacks of September 11.

The next section is "On Afghanistan, Central Asia, and the Middle East." Robert Canfield's piece emphasizes the complexity of Afghanistan and painstakingly outlines the relationships between the Taliban, mujahedeen, "Arab-Afghans" (including bin Laden), and different ethnic groups within Afghanistan. Ashraf Ghani's contribution examines the complexity of the political situation in Afghanistan and the possible risks of quick military action there by our armed forces. Nazif Shahrani counsels the eventual formation of a new Afghanistan based on the stability of past models: "The international community should encourage the creation of a government that recognizes the crucial role of the local and regional communities in self-governance, as existed in earlier eras in Afghanistan." The next selection is an interview with Zieba Shorish-Shamley at meetings in Brussels, Belgium, in which Afghan women's groups were creating a common set of demands. She emphasizes the need for women to be fairly represented in Afghanistan's new government. David Edwards and Shahmahmood Miakhel stress the importance of enlisting the aid of ordinary Afghans in confronting the Taliban regime. Kamran Asdar Ali focuses on the dilemmas faced by Pakistan following the events of September 11, specifically the tensions faced by its leaders in the face of mounting domestic criticism for cooperation with the United States. Finally, an article based on interviews with Sergei Arutyunov and Ian Chesnov describes how the Russian war on Chechnya has destroyed kinship structures that formed the basis of social life. According to the report, "Chechnya's younger people… are disoriented, and are now looking for new authority figures—a search that in many instances leads them to the radical Wahhabi Islamic sect or leaders of criminal rings."

In the next section, “Examining Militarism and the ‘War on Terror,”’ anthropologists explore several pressing issues after September 11. William O. Beeman’s commentary challenges the assumptions of U.S. leaders proclaiming anti-terrorist messages by delving into the centuries-old patterns of Western exploitation of societies in the Middle East. David Price notes that the vague definition and use of the word “terrorism” as a catchall phrase has led to its rapid adoption by Russian leaders to describe Chechnya’s separatists, by Chinese leaders to describe Uighur separatists, and by others. Consequently, the “war on terror” poses a threat to native peoples and ethnic minorities throughout the world. In separate commentaries, John Burdick and Roberto J. González argue that U.S. bombing raids over Afghanistan—and the resulting civilian casualties—are making future terrorist attacks on the United States more, not less, likely to occur. Dale F. Eickelman’s contribution makes a critical point: that new media technologies including video and satellite images, computers, and advanced telecommunications are a part of daily life in the Arab-speaking world. Mahmood Mamdani makes an impassioned plea for U.S. policy makers not to allow the “war on terror” to permit U.S.-African relations to slide back to the Cold War era. The section closes with a Thomas McKenna interview which explores the historical roots of Muslim separatism in the Philippines. The wide-ranging interview touches upon the effects of Spanish and U.S. colonialism on Muslim identity, as well as more recent developments.

The final section, “Academic Freedom and Civil Liberties,” analyzes attacks on constitutional guarantees within the United States. Roberto J. González and David Price examine the implications of a document circulated by the American Council of Trustees and Alumni in late 2001, which singles out dozens of academics for allegedly being “short on patriotism,” while Hugh Gusterson—the first scholar named in the report—takes issue with the way in which its authors take statements out of context. More importantly, he also describes how this fits a long historical pattern of scapegoating that tends to occur in our country during times of war. Laura Nader’s article, published two months before the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, is about “coercive harmony”—imposed social harmony—and its consequences. The concept’s relevance in the post-September 11 period is clear, as many Americans feel pressure to fall into line with the dictates of the Bush administration’s policies. She writes: “Coercive harmony can stifle dissent for a while. But if dissent is too tightly bottled up, it will explode... Academics should not be party to establishing an ideology of consensus on our increasingly corporatized campuses. Instead, we have a duty to investigate the dangers of coercive harmony and to expose repression when it poses as consensus.”

Taken as a whole, the collection makes a strong case for the relevance of anthropology to the contemporary world, as well as for the strength and vitality of tried and true techniques used by its practitioners.

 An Argument for Public Anthropology

Many academics have been trained to think that writing for the public is not worth doing because it is perceived as politically risky. But is there any truth to this assertion? Is anthropology perceived as a subversive activity?

On the surface, these appear to be challenging times for academic freedom. In October 2001, a Washington, D.C.-based group called the American Council of Trustees and Alumni published a report titled Defending Civilization: How Our Universities Are Failing America. It documented 117 campus incidents as “evidence” of academic antiAmericanism and was distributed to university regents, trustees, and administrators. Of the forty-five scholars cited in the report, five were anthropologists. More anthropologists were included than scholars of any other discipline.

It seems that anthropologists were highly visible on the list because ours is a field that contextualizes and integrates multiple points of view —social, political, economic, and historical—and of course because many of us do this kind of work in foreign countries. What has changed radically is not anthropology but the time in which we are living. Today, some view contextual, historical knowledge about other cultures as subversive, unpatriotic, and possibly un-American!

But fortunately, they appear to be on the margins. The response to the ACTA report was dramatic and critics on the right and the left protested. Lynne Cheney and Joseph Lieberman, who co-founded ACTA in 1995, distanced themselves from the report.

Because of a surge in publicly engaged anthropology since September 11—including participation in campus rallies and teach-ins—it is clear that anthropologists have an important job ahead. Threats and blacklists are a sign that we are following in the footsteps of Boas, Mead, Montagu, and others who spoke up and were harshly criticized for their views by some and lauded by others.

The rewards of participating in a publicly engaged anthropology more than compensate for the challenges. Writing for and speaking with the general public is intellectually challenging, politically satisfying—and exhilarating.

Such work is intellectually challenging because it encourages the translation and distillation of complex ideas into a language that nonspecialists can understand. (Imagine explaining the meaning of cultural relativism or social solidarity or the significance of clans to a person who has never taken an anthropology course or read a book on the topic.) The limitations are severe—the typical op-ed piece is limited to 750 words. This is a focused kind of writing and speaking that takes time, effort, and verbal economy. It promotes the use of appropriate metaphors, logical argumentation, precise timing, and conciseness.

Politically, this work can be satisfying because it connects us to our civic duties and provides a public service: citizen education. By articulating thoughtful, informed perspectives for a wide audience, we are providing interested people with viewpoints that might otherwise go unmentioned, particularly in the current climate of self-censorship on the part of the corporate media and the public at large. We might even think of this work as democratic outreach, or social science in the service of society, or even civic anthropology for the twenty-first century. Perhaps a clearer articulation of the vital role played by citizen-scholars would lead to a new valuation of intellectual work in the public interest and recognition of this work in tenure reviews. In this regard, the U.S. case is almost unique. In most countries of the world, intellectuals are expected to be participants in citizen causes and do so, sometimes at the risk of being jailed—or worse.

Finally, writing and speaking with the general public can be exhilarating. Letters or phone calls in response to an op-ed piece can be educational and used as tools for reflection. They may lead to connections with community groups, activists, policy makers, or invitations to write and speak publicly. And not least of all, communication with the public dramatically demonstrates to students that anthropology does indeed have a public face and relevance in the contemporary world.

Recently Robert Borofsky asked Norwegian anthropologist Fredrik Barth what steps might be taken to draw more anthropologists into public engagements. He answered: “The image that comes to mind is of American anthropologists, like penguins on the edge of an ice sheet afraid that something in the water will eat them. They stand on the ice and push and push each other until one falls in, and then they see what happens to him. If nothing bad happens, then they might be willing to dive in, too.” [21]

The contributors to this collection are jumping into chilly waters. The experience can be startling, refreshing, and exhilarating. Others have taken the plunge as well: the extraordinary and inspiring efforts of Cultural Survival and Living Beyond Culture exemplify a kind of public engagement being carried out by valiant anthropologists whose work is deeply rooted in indigenous and local struggles. As more and more anthropologists and students embark upon such adventures, they are sure to find strength in numbers. We have much to contribute, and even more to gain.

[1] See Chalmers A. Johnson, Blowback: The Costs and Consequences of American Empire (New York: Metropolitan Books, 2000); Paul Kennedy, The Rise and Fall of the Great Powers: Economic Change and Military Conflict from 1500 to 2000 (New York: Vintage Books, 1989); Paul Sweezy, Harry Magdoff, John Bellamy Foster, and Robert McChesney, “U.S. Military Bases and Empire,” Monthly Review, March 2002, pp. 1–16.

[2] This trend is described in Sheldon Rampton and John Stauber, Trust Us, We’re Experts! (New York: Tarcher Putnam, 2001).

[3] The term “pundit” is derived from the Hindi term pandit, meaning “religious scholar,” and was adopted by British colonists in India in 1816 as a term meaning “learned person.” Today the word preserves a bit of irony and questioning of the person’s authority.

[4] See Laura Nader, “Anthropology!” American Anthropologist 103, no. 3 (September 2001): 1–12.

[5] See Marshall Sahlins, Stone Age Economics (Chicago: Aldine, 1972), pp. 1–39.

[6] See Bronislaw Malinowski, Magic, Science, Religion, and Other Essays (Garden City, N.J.: Anchor Doubleday, 1948 [1925]).

[7] See Margaret Mead, Coming of Age in Samoa (Washington, D.C.: American Museum of Natural History, 1928).

[8] See Franz Boas, Race, Language, and Culture (New York: Macmillan, 1940).

[9] See Kendall M. Thu, “Anthropologists Should Return to the Roots of Their Discipline,” Chronicle of Higher Education (April 30, 1999): A56.

[10] See Wazir Karim, “Anthropology without Tears: How a ‘Local’ Sees the ‘Local’ and the ‘Global,”’ in Henrietta Moore, ed., The Future of Anthropological Knowledge (London: Routledge, 1996), pp. 115–138.

[11] Quoted March 29, 1999, in a symposium of the American Association for the Advancement of Science titled “Secrecy in Science” at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. Accessed from the electronic text of her comments, as posted at <[[http://www.aaas.org/spp/secrecy/Presents/nader.htm] [http://www.aaas.org/spp/secrecy/Presents/nader.htm]]>.

[12] See Mary O. Furner, Advocacy and Objectivity: A Crisis in the Professionalization of American Social Science, 1865–1905 (Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1975). For one account of the decline of public intellectuals in the twentieth century, see Russell Jacoby, The Last Intellectuals (New York: Basic Books, 1987).

[13] See Douglas Dowd, “Thorstein Veblen and C. Wright Mills: Social Science and Social Criticism,” in Irving Horowitz, ed., The New Sociology (New York: Oxford University Press, 1964), pp. 54–66.

[14] David Price, “Lessons from Second World War Anthropology,” Anthropology Today 18, no. 3 (June 2002): 18. See also Orin Starn, “Engineering Internment: Anthropologists and the War Relocation Authority,” American Ethnologist 13, no. 4 (December 1996): 700–720.

[15] See David Price, “Past Wars, Present Dangers, Future Anthropologies,” Anthropology Today 18, no. 1 (March 2002): 3–5.

[16] See Eric R. Wolf and Joseph G. Jorgensen, “Anthropology on the Warpath in Thailand,” New York Review of Books, November 19, 1970, pp. 26–35.

[17] See Laura Nader, “The Phantom Factor: Impact of the Cold War on Anthropology,” in Noam Chomsky, ed., The Cold War & the University (New York: New Press, 1997), pp. 107–146.

[18] See Dell Hymes, ed., Reinventing Anthropology (New York: Vintage, 1969). The contributions by Gerald D. Berreman, William S. Willis, Jr., Eric Wolf, and Laura Nader are especially relevant.

[19] See Eric Wakin, Anthropology Goes to War: Professional Ethics and Counterinsurgency in Thailand (Madison: University of Wisconsin Center for Asian Studies, 1992).

[20] See Laura Nader, “Breaking the Silence—Politics and Professional Autonomy.” Anthropological Quarterly (winter 2001): 155–163.

[21] Quoted in “Envisioning a More Public Anthropology: An Interview with Fredrik Barth,” April 18, 2001. Accessed from electronic text posted at <[[http://www.publicanthropology.org/Journals/Engaging-Ideas/barth.htm.] [http://www.publicanthropology.org/Journals/Engaging-Ideas/barth.htm.]]>

* Part I: War, Peace, and Social Responsibility

 Chapter 1: Scientists as Spies

The Nation, October 16, 1919

FRANZ BOAS

Franz Boas (1858–1942), who founded the first American academic department of anthropology at Columbia University in 1898, wrote many popular articles in the early 1900s on issues including race problems, immigration, and U.S. involvement in World War I. He profoundly believed that scientific knowledge widely disseminated could potentially lead to popular enlightenment and social reform.[22]

In the following article, Boas condemns anthropologists recruited by the U.S. government for espionage during World War I. He was especially outraged to learn that two of the spies had used contacts that he had provided to them for research purposes. When the issue came before the American Anthropological Association in 1920, Boas was censured and removed from office.

Boas had become an American citizen in 1891, yet remained sympathetic to his native Germany. He publicly opposed U.S. entry into World War I. These circumstances undoubtedly made him even more sensitive to the idea of his fellow anthropologists engaging in espionage for the American side.

In an eloquent letter to the editor published in the New York Times on January 8, 1916, Boas revealed his own changing attitudes about U.S. foreign policy in the context of a rapidly expanding American Empire: “At the time of my arrival more than thirty years ago, I was filled with admiration of American political ideals... I thought of it as a country that would not tolerate interference with its own interests, but that would also refrain from oppression of unwilling subjects... A rude awakening came in 1898, when the aggressive imperialism of that period [in Cuba, the Philippines, etc.] showed that the ideal had been a dream... The America that had stood for right, and right only, seemed dead; and in its place stood a young giant, eager to grow at the expense of others.” [23]

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In his war address to Congress, President Wilson dwelt at great length on the theory that only autocracies maintain spies; that these are not needed in democracies. At the time that the President made this statement, the Government of the United States had in its employ several spies of unknown number. I am not concerned here with the familiar discrepancies between the President's words and the actual facts, although we may perhaps have to accept his statement as meaning correctly that we live under an autocracy; that our democracy is a fiction. The point against which I wish to enter a vigorous protest is that a number of men who follow science as their profession, men whom I refuse to designate any longer as scientists, have prostituted science by using it as a cover for their activities as spies.

A soldier whose business is murder as a fine art, a diplomat whose calling is based on deception and secretiveness, a politician whose very life consists in compromises with his conscience, a business man whose aim is personal profit within the limits allowed by a lenient law—such may be excused if they set patriotic devotion above common everyday decency and perform services as spies. They merely accept the code of morality to which modern society still conforms. Not so the scientist. The very essence of his life is the service of truth. We all know scientists who in private life do not come up to the standard of truthfulness, but who, nevertheless, would not consciously falsify the results of their researches. It is bad enough if we have to put up with these, because they reveal a lack of strength of character that is liable to distort the results of their work. A person, however, who uses science as a cover for political spying, who demeans himself to pose before a foreign government as an investigator and asks for assistance in his alleged researches in order to carry on, under this cloak, his political machinations, prostitutes science in an unpardonable way and forfeits the right to be classed as a scientist.

By accident, incontrovertible proof has come to my hands that at least four men who carry on anthropological work, while employed as government agents, introduced themselves to foreign governments as representatives of scientific institutions in the United States, and as sent out for the purpose of carrying on scientific researches. They have not only shaken the belief in the truthfulness of science, but they have also done the greatest possible disservice to scientific inquiry. In consequence of their acts every nation will look with distrust upon the visiting foreign investigator who wants to do honest work, suspecting sinister designs. Such action has raised a new barrier against the development of international friendly cooperation.

[22] See George W. Stocking Jr., “Anthropology and Society,” in Franz Boas, A Franz Boas Reader (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1975), pp. 307–309. Following the German sociological tradition of Max Weber, Boas assumed that as scientists, anthropologists should hold themselves to a high standard of objectivity—even when they produced truths threatening powerful interests. This was clearly exemplified in Boas’ attacks on racism: since racial hierarchies were based upon faulty science, racist policies had no rational justification.

[23] Ibid., pp. 331–332.

 Suggestions for Further Reading

<biblio>

Boas, Franz

1940 Race, Culture, and Language. New York: Macmillan.

1974 A Franz Boas Reader. Edited by George W. Stocking Jr. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

</biblio>

 Chapter 2: Warfare is Only an Invention—not a Biological Necessity

Asia, 1940

MARGARET MEAD

Margaret Mead (1901–1978) was among Boas' most renowned students. Like her mentor, she made anthropological knowledge accessible to the general public and frequently critiqued aspects of American culture.

Along with dozens of anthropologists, Mead served as a government adviser during World War II. Together with Ruth Benedict she founded the Columbia University Research in Contemporary Cultures project, which was under the auspices of the U.S. Office of Naval Research and analyzed the cultures of America's enemies and allies, including Germany, Japan, England, France, and the Soviet Union.

Mead was profoundly affected by the advent of a nuclear age, after U.S. planes bombed Hiroshima and Nagasaki. Throughout her career, she publicly expressed opposition to war as a means of resolving conflict—perhaps a contradictory stance in light of her involvement with U.S. military and intelligence efforts. She once said, "Those who still cling to the old, simple definition of patriotism have not yet recognized that since Hiroshima there cannot be winners and losers in a war, but only losers. And they are vocal out of desperation about a world they do not understand." [24]

The following article was published in 1940, as Nazi Germany invaded Europe and the Japanese swept across Asia. Mead's argument is lucid and powerful: that war is a cultural phenomenon, not a biological one. It still stands as a thought-provoking counterpoint to those who assert that warfare is a part of human nature. Readers should be aware of the occasional use of outdated terminology such as "simple peoples," which reflects the persistence of elements of Victorian-era social evolutionism in American anthropology as late as the 1940s.

Mead has had many critics over the years. Perhaps the sharpest rebukes have come from those critical of the contradictions between her public antiwar statements and writings and her tacit support of U.S. foreign policy.

Anthropologist Peter Worsely notes, “Mead’s political stance... [and] her criticisms of Western institutions [are] always vitiated by her commitment to U.S. foreign policy... Mead’s theoretical posture of concern about the danger of global war never prevented her continuing in the service of the U.S. State Department and the military long after World War II.” [25]

Is war a biological necessity, a sociological inevitability, or just a bad invention? Those who argue for the first view endow man with such pugnacious instincts that some outlet in aggressive behavior is necessary if man is to reach full human stature. It was this point of view which lay behind William James’s famous essay, “The Moral Equivalent of War,” in which he tried to retain the warlike virtues and channel them in new directions. A similar point of view has lain behind the Soviet Union’s attempt to make competition between groups rather than between individuals. A basic, competitive, aggressive, warring human nature is assumed, and those who wish to outlaw war or outlaw competitiveness merely try to find new and less socially destructive ways in which these biologically given aspects of man’s nature can find expression. Then there are those who take the second view: warfare is the inevitable concomitant of the development of the state, the struggle for land and natural resources, of class societies springing not from the nature of man, but, from the nature of history. War is nevertheless inevitable unless we change our social system and outlaw classes, the struggle for power, and possessions; and in the event of our success warfare would disappear, as a symptom vanishes when the disease is cured.

One may hold a sort of compromise position between these two extremes; one may claim that all aggression springs from the frustration of man’s biologically determined drives and that, since all forms of culture are frustrating, it is certain each new generation will be aggressive and the aggression will find its natural and inevitable expression in race war, class war, nationalistic war, and so on. All three of these positions are very popular today among those who think seriously about the problems of war and its possible prevention, but I wish to urge another point of view, less defeatist, perhaps, than the first and third and more accurate than the second: that is, that warfare, by which I mean recognized conflict between two groups as groups, in which each group puts an army (even if the army is only fifteen pygmies) into the field to fight and kill, if possible, some of the members of the army of the other group—that warfare of this sort is an invention like any other of the inventions in terms of which we order our lives, such as writing, marriage, cooking our food instead of eating it raw, trial by jury, or burial of the dead, and so on. Some of this list anyone will grant are inventions: trial by jury is confined to very limited portions of the globe; we know that there are tribes that do not bury their dead but instead expose or cremate them; and we know that only part of the human race has had the knowledge of writing as its cultural inheritance. But, whenever a way of doing things is found universally, such as the use of fire or the practice of some form of marriage, we tend to think at once that it is not an invention at all but an attribute of humanity itself. And yet even such universals as marriage and the use of fire are inventions like the rest, very basic ones, inventions which were, perhaps, necessary if human history was to take the turn that it has taken, but nevertheless inventions. At some point in his social development man was undoubtedly without the institution of marriage or the knowledge of the use of fire.

The case for warfare is much clearer because there are peoples even today who have no warfare. Of these the Eskimos are perhaps the most conspicuous examples, but the Lepchas of Sikkim described by Geoffrey Gorer in Himalayan Village are as good. Neither of these peoples understands war, not even defensive warfare. The idea of warfare is lacking, and this idea is as essential to really carrying on war as an alphabet or a syllabary is to writing. But, whereas the Lepchas are a gentle, unquarrelsome people, and the advocates of other points of view might argue that they are not full human beings or that they had never been frustrated and so had no aggression to expend in warfare, the Eskimo case gives no such possibility of interpretation. The Eskimos are not a mild and meek people; many of them are turbulent and troublesome. Fights, theft of wives, murder, cannibalism, occur among them—all outbursts of passionate men goaded by desire or intolerable circumstance. Here are men faced with hunger, men faced with loss of their wives, men faced with the threat of extermination by other men, and here are orphan children, growing up miserably with no one to care for them, mocked and neglected by those about them. The personality necessary for war, the circumstances necessary to goad men to desperation are present, but there is no war. When a traveling Eskimo entered a settlement, he might have had to fight the strongest man in the settlement to establish his position among them, but this was a test of strength and bravery, not war. The idea of warfare, of one group organizing against another group to maim and wound and kill them was absent. And, without that idea, passions might rage but there was no war.

But, it may be argued, is not this because the Eskimos have such a low and undeveloped form of social organization? They own no land, they move from place to place, camping, it is true, season after season on the same site, but this is not something to fight for as the modern nations of the world fight for land and raw materials. They have no permanent possessions that can be looted, no towns that can be burned. They have no social classes to produce stress and strains within the society which might force it to go to war outside. Does not the absence of war among the Eskimos, while disproving the biological necessity of war, just go to confirm the point that it is the state of development of the society which accounts for war and nothing else?

We find the answer among the pygmy peoples of the Andaman Islands in the Bay of Bengal. The Andamans also represent an exceedingly low level of society; they are a hunting and food-gathering people; they live in tiny hordes without any class stratification; their houses are simpler than the snow houses of the Eskimo. But they knew about warfare. The army might contain only fifteen determined pygmies marching in a straight line, but it was the real thing nonetheless. Tiny army met tiny army in open battle, blows were exchanged, casualties suffered, and the state of warfare could only be concluded by a peacemaking ceremony.

Similarly, among the Australian aborigines, who built no permanent dwellings but wandered from water hole to water hole over their almost desert country, warfare—and rules of “international law”—were highly developed. The student of social evolution will seek in vain for his obvious causes of war—struggle for lands, struggle for power of one group over another, expansion of population, need to divert the minds of a populace restive under tyranny, or even the ambition of a successful leader to enhance his own prestige. All are absent, but warfare as a practice remained, and men engaged in it and killed one another in the course of a war because killing is what is done in wars.

From instances like these it becomes apparent that an inquiry into the causes of war misses the fundamental point as completely as does an insistence upon the biological necessity of war. If a people have an idea of going to war and the idea that war is the way in which certain situations, defined within their society, are to be handled, they will sometimes go to war. If they are a mild and unaggressive people, like the Pueblo Indians, they may limit themselves to defensive warfare, but they will be forced to think in terms of war because there are peoples near them who have warfare as a pattern, and offensive, raiding, pillaging warfare at that. When the pattern of warfare is known, people like the Pueblo Indians will defend themselves, taking advantage of the natural defenses of their mesa village site, and people like the Lepchas, having no natural defenses and no idea of warfare, will merely submit to the invader. But the essential point remains the same. There is a way of behaving which is known to a given people and labeled as an appropriate form of behavior; a bold and warlike people like the Sioux or the Maori may label warfare as desirable as well as possible, a mild people like the Pueblo Indians may label warfare as undesirable, but to the minds of both peoples the possibility of warfare is present. Their thoughts, their hopes, their plans are oriented about this idea— that warfare may be selected as the way to meet some situation.

So simple peoples and civilized peoples, mild peoples and violent, assertive peoples, will all go to war if they have the invention, just as those peoples who have the custom of dueling will have duels and peoples who have the pattern of vendetta will indulge in vendetta. And, conversely, peoples who do not know of dueling will not fight duels, even though their wives are seduced and their daughters ravished; they may on occasion commit murder but they will not fight duels. Cultures which lack the idea of the vendetta will not meet every quarrel in this way. A people can use only the forms it has. So the Balinese have their special way of dealing with a quarrel between two individuals: if the two feel that the causes of quarrel are heavy, they may go and register their quarrel in the temple before the gods, and, making offerings, they may swear never to have anything to do with each other again. But in other societies, although individuals might feel as full of animosity and as unwilling to have any further contact as do the Balinese, they cannot register their quarrel with the gods and go on quietly about their business because registering quarrels with the gods is not an invention of which they know.

Yet, if it be granted that warfare is, after all, an invention, it may nevertheless be an invention that lends itself to certain types of personality, to the exigent needs of autocrats, to the expansionist desires of crowded peoples, to the desire for plunder and rape and loot which is engendered by a dull and frustrating life. What, then, can we say of this congruence between warfare and its uses? If it is a form which fits so well, is not this congruence the essential point? But even here the primitive material causes us to wonder, because there are tribes who go to war merely for glory, having no quarrel with the enemy, suffering from no tyrant within their boundaries, anxious neither for land nor loot nor women, but merely anxious to win prestige which within that tribe has been declared obtainable only by war and without which no young man can hope to win his sweetheart's smile of approval. But if, as was the case with the Bush Negroes of Dutch Guiana, it is artistic ability which is necessary to win a girl's approval, the same young man would have to be carving rather than going out on a war party.

In many parts of the world, war is a game in which the individual can win counters—counters which bring him prestige in the eyes of his own sex or of the opposite sex; he plays for these counters as he might, in our society, strive for a tennis championship. Warfare is a frame for such prestige-seeking merely because it calls for the display of certain skills and certain virtues; all of these skills—riding straight, shooting straight, dodging the missiles of the enemy and sending one's own straight to the mark—can be equally well exercised in some other framework and, equally, the virtues—endurance, bravery, loyalty, steadfastness—can be displayed in other contexts. The tie-up between proving oneself a man and proving this by a success in organized killing is due to a definition which many societies have made of manliness. And often, even in those societies which counted success in warfare a proof of human worth, strange turns were given to the idea, as when the Plains Indians gave their highest awards to the man who touched a live enemy rather than to the man who brought in a scalp—from a dead enemy—because the latter was less risky. Warfare is just an invention known to the majority of human societies by which they permit their young men either to accumulate prestige or avenge their honor or acquire loot or wives or slaves or sago lands or cattle or appease the blood lust of their gods or the restless souls of the recently dead. It is just an invention, older and more widespread than the jury system, but nonetheless an invention.

But, once we have said this, have we said anything at all? Despite a few instances, dear to the hearts of controversialists, of the loss of the useful arts, once an invention is made which proves congruent with human needs or social forms, it tends to persist. Grant that war is an invention, that it is not a biological necessity nor the outcome of certain special types of social forms, still once the invention is made, what are we to do about it? The Indian who had been subsisting on the buffalo for generations because with his primitive weapons he could slaughter only a limited number of buffalo did not return to his primitive weapons when he saw that the white man's more efficient weapons were exterminating the buffalo. A desire for the white man's cloth may mortgage the South Sea Islander to the white man's plantation, but he does not return to making bark cloth, which would have left him free. Once an invention is known and accepted, men do not easily relinquish it. The skilled workers may smash the first steam looms which they feel are to be their undoing, but they accept them in the end, and no movement which has insisted upon the mere abandonment of usable inventions has ever had much success. Warfare is here, as part of our thought; the deeds of warriors are immortalized in the words of our poets, the toys of our children are modeled upon the weapons of the soldier, the frame of reference within which our statesmen and our diplomats work always contains war. If we know that it is not inevitable, that it is due to historical accident that warfare is one of the ways in which we think of behaving, are we given any hope by that? What hope is there of persuading nations to abandon war, nations so thoroughly imbued with the idea that resort to war is, if not actually desirable and noble, at least inevitable whenever certain defined circumstances arise?

In answer to this question I think we might turn to the history of other social inventions, and inventions which must once have seemed as finally entrenched as warfare. Take the methods of trial which preceded the jury system: ordeal and trial by combat. Unfair, capricious, alien as they are to our feeling today, they were once the only methods open to individuals accused of some offense. The invention of trial by jury gradually replaced these methods until only witches, and finally not even witches, had to resort to the ordeal. And for a long time the jury system seemed the best and finest method of settling legal disputes, but today new inventions, trial before judges only or before commissions, are replacing the jury system. In each case the old method was replaced by a new social invention. The ordeal did not go out because people thought it unjust or wrong; it went out because a method more congruent with the institutions and feelings of the period was invented. And, if we despair over the way in which war seems such an ingrained habit of most of the human race, we can take comfort from the fact that a poor invention will usually give place to a better invention.

For this, two conditions, at least, are necessary. The people must recognize the defects of the old invention, and someone must make a new one. Propaganda against warfare, documentation of its terrible cost in human suffering and social waste, these prepare the ground by teaching people to feel that warfare is a defective social institution. There is further needed a belief that social invention is possible and the invention of new methods which will render warfare as out of date as the tractor is making the plough, or the motor car the horse and buggy. A form of behavior becomes out of date only when something else takes its place, and, in order to invent forms of behavior which will make war obsolete, it is a first requirement to believe that an invention is possible.

[24] Quoted in William O. Beeman, “Postscript to September 11: What Would Margaret Mead Say?” Pacific News Service, November 27, 2001.

[25] See Lenora Foerstel and Angela Gilliam, eds., Confronting the Margaret Mead Legacy: Scholarship, Empire, and the South Pacific. (Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1992).

 Suggestions for Further Reading

<biblio>

Mead, Margaret

1942 And Keep Your Powder Dry: An Anthropologist Looks at America. New York: W. Morrow and Co.

1975 World Enough: Rethinking the Future. Boston: Little, Brown and Co. Mead, Margaret, and Rhoda Metraux, eds.

2000 [1953] The Study of Culture at a Distance. London: Bergahn Books.

</biblio>

 Chapter 3: “Once You’ve Broken Him Down...”

The Nation, October 25, 1965

MARSHALL SAHLINS

For some anthropologists, public engagement has meant organizing public forums for open discussion of critical events. In the spring of 1965, a handful of professors at the University of Michigan initiated a series of such meetings when they canceled classes and held public lectures (or “teach-ins”) on the Vietnam War to protest the government’s escalation of the conflict. (The term “teach-in” was derived from the sit-ins in which African Americans and their sympathizers challenged segregation practices by engaging in civil disobedience during the late 1950s and early 1960s.) Among those who coordinated the first teach-in was Marshall Sahlins, a young anthropology professor credited with conceiving the idea. Weeks later, the organizers challenged U.S. government officials to a public debate in Washington, D.C. which was called the National Teach-In. It received national and international media attention.[26]

In August 1965, Sahlins went to Vietnam on a fact-finding mission as a representative of the Inter-University Committee (the sponsors of the National Teach-In). The following article, written by Sahlins for The Nation shortly after his visit, consists of a gripping and revelatory interview he conducted with two U.S. military advisers in the Mekong Delta after accompanying them on a nighttime patrol at the Cambodian border. It reveals the use of psychological torture by American personnel.

Recent events suggest that such tactics may once again be part of our military's arsenal. A December 26, 2002, report published in the Washington Post described how U.S. intelligence officials were subjecting suspected Al Qaeda and Taliban forces to "stress and duress" techniques, as well as transporting them to third countries (with poor human rights records) for interrogation.[27]

Advanced anti-communism trades places with the enemy. It becomes opposite-communism, and "opposites" are things alike in every respect save one. The final stages of American dissolution in Vietnam will be marked by imitation of the enemy's techniques. I have heard it foreshadowed in the talk of Saigon officialdom: discipline, a senior American civilian officer told me, is what the South Vietnamese government needs; power, he said, is the only thing the Chinese can understand; history, he said, will prove us right. In a remote provincial outpost I found two Americans who had appropriated as their own draconian Chinese methods of interrogation and indoctrination ("motivation" is the American newspeak). The forced destruction of people's beliefs is no longer properly described as something "they" do. Torturously exacted confession and conversion are no longer things we fight against: these are now part of our own arsenal, weapons of our own struggle.

The two Americans were leaders of a "motivation" team working among Vietnamese Popular Forces.[28] The team included four Vietnamese instructor-cadres, two of these ex-Vietcong. The dominant of the two Americans was a field representative of a civilian agency; he was assisted by a Special Forces officer. Both were highly qualified, competent in Vietnamese language and custom, and dedicated to Vietnam and their vision of its future. Their program was anticommunist revolution: they were training Popular Forces as revolutionary cadres. The texts were classic communist handbooks on revolutionary warfare, books these Americans studied and clearly admired; it does not go too far to say they were disciples, or at least revisionist disciples, of Mao Zedong, Ho Chi Minh, and Che Guevara.

I lived in with them for a night and a good part of a day. They briefed me and allowed me to see the work for myself. But it is not of this guerrilla program that I write. It is of a discussion I had with the Americans about torture and the transformation of Vietcong prisoners to anticommunism. The two Americans allowed they had some experience with it, and some ideas of how it is properly done.

The interrogation methods the Americans described are copied from those used most effectively by the Chinese, as they themselves explained. (Of course, there are precedents—for example, the Inquisition.) The treatment seems a compressed and abbreviated version of the procedures used on American POWs during the Korean War. The interrogator has at most four or five days before he must send the prisoner on. Physical torture is precluded. A special type of “mental torture” (their term) is instead inflicted. But it aims not merely at eliciting military information. The prisoner’s disclosures are at the same time a betrayal of his cause and a confession of his errors, a renunciation of belief.

[[r-j-roberto-j-gonzalez-anthropologists-in-the-publ-2.jpg]]

If the technique really is effective, and the Americans claim it is, I think it must be because of some rather special qualities of revolutionary warfare and warriors. It has to be understood that a Vietcong prisoner comes in with certain comprehensions and expectations that are deeply entwined with his revolutionary (“communist”) commitment. A guerrilla movement depends decisively on secrecy. Its members are visible daily to the enemy but must be unknown to him; they maintain a hinterland conspiracy of silence; a single traitor wrecks the organization of a whole village, perhaps a district. The guerrilla thus understands that secrecy is a first principle of the revolution. But, by the same token, intelligence becomes a first principle of the counterrevolution. The prisoner, therefore, expects to be tortured for information and ultimately killed if he remains steadfast. He meets his interrogators prepared to resist the worst: it is a test of his revolutionary soul.

Something must be said as well of the two Americans who described the interrogation methods to me. First—and it is a thing seriously to consider—these men are not strangers, not people who have been metamorphosed by some satanic forces to a point beyond our understanding or recognition. Met on a college campus or in a business office, they would not attract unusual attention. Their attitudes toward Vietnam are indeed more scholarly than demonic. They want to involve themselves in the country. They profess with sincerity their respect for the people—so much that they actively wish them a better fate. And now consider this interview, what they said and what they revealed of themselves. After I left them I had the sickening feeling of “there but forthegraceofGod...”

The main protagonist—identified as “Mr. X”—describes himself as an “agnostic atheist,” but clearly he believes in the Devil if not in God. In fact, his is a holy work: to exorcise the Communist devils possessing Vietcong. He undertakes the prisoner’s “conversion” for the prisoner’s own good: he is “helping” the man, saving him. I ask, “What gives you the right?” “Your belief,” he answers. It gives him the right to “proselytize.”

And now consider this interview, what they said and what they revealed of themselves. What follow are excerpts from a tape recording I made of our conversation. Three asterisks in the transcript indicate that a portion of the interview is skipped over; three dots, that a portion of an answer is elided; and a word in parenthesis followed by a question mark indicates an imperfect rendering on the tape and my guess of the word involved.

MR. X: At this time [the prisoner] kind of feels an emotional dependence upon you because for two days you’ve been protecting him from the big, outside ugly world that he doesn’t understand: feeding him good chow, talking with him, calling him a [kambelo?] of the NLF, not the derogatory term of Vietcong... Then you indicate that this nice treatment that he’s had so far [has] not been disinterested good treatment, that we expect his cooperation. This again reintroduces the whole issue of the big, ugly outside world. What's going to happen to him now? Well, he might tell you a couple of things, beginning with rather innocuous things. Well, you can imply that you knew that already, what you're really after are better things and this might rather [uncalm?] him. Then you might say, "Jeez, that scrape you got on your shoulder... it obviously needs attention; we'll have to give you some penicillin." And while you're giving him the penicillin, you're telling him that, "You know, there are these other types of people who just..."

***

MR. X: Actually again, this is the technique that Captain [Y]... and myself have been trying to promote in an advisory relationship. Again, it's a technique that's been used most effectively by the Chinese, in which you've pulled the man out of his familiar environment: he's dependent ... upon you for his continual wellbeing. And even though the prisoner may [resist?], it's kind of an emotional interdependence that's created, and what you try and do is [use?] this emotional interdependence in such a way that he comes to the point where he must tell you what he knows.

SAHLINS: It's in effect brainwashing—is that the point of this?

MR. X: No, what it is, is breaking him down. But... once you've broken him down, it comes to the point where he wakes up in a sweat one morning and tells you, "All right." Then he tells you the names of the two people in his cell; or, he gives you the location of the camp that he just recently came from. Then you're through with him, in practical terms. You've got what you needed to continue operating. But at this point, if you really believe in anything yourself, what you've got to do is give him something to hope for before you send him back for further processing. Because you have just brought this individual to the lowest point in his life in terms of human meaning and existence. So at that point, that's when you've got to stress that, “Well now we’re releasing you for further processing. But for you, what you’ve just told us is the beginning of a positive affirmation. We just can’t process you right into our unit now; because you don’t know what we stand for and what we’re fighting for, but we hope that someday you will be joining us.” See, we don’t have time to get any brainwashing. The Chinese can do that because they have POWs for months and months and months. If we get a guy, we’ve got him for two to five days, and then he’s out of our hands. In that two to five days, we’ve got to get the information we need. But we will not get the information we need by physical torture. We’ve got to get it by an emotional and mental torture. And you can do that because that’s what they’re least adequately prepared for. It’s what Americans are least adequately prepared for when they find themselves in the other side’s hands.

***

SAHLINS: What kind of control do you have over Arvin [Vietnam army] types of interrogation [i.e., physical torture]?

MR. X: Well again, that’s an advisory function. And what you’re trying to do is —this is just a traditional, feudal Asian society, mainland style—and what you’re trying to do is change the course of warfare in Asia. To some extent this has been done: the Chinese People’s Liberation Army; it’s happened probably in the Japanese army, the Japanese Self-Defense and Home Defense Armies. But until the end of World War II, we always thought of the Japanese army as a real cruel, vindictive bunch of cutthroats. Well, it turned out in post-World War II analysis that the Bataan Death March was something that they handled to the best of their ability, given the available transport and the way that they would have handled their own prisoners. They just moved them, and they moved them as fast as they could. People who couldn’t keep up the pace in some cases were helped and in some other cases—just according to the individual guard—were bashed and thrown aside. Vietnamese to our eyes seem rather cruel sometimes to prisoners, but they’re not doing this with any ideological vengeance. They’re doing that because that’s just been the bent of warfare in Mainland Asia for a thousand years, and what we have got to try to do is sophisticate it, and tell them, “Look, that’s just not the way.” It’s a slow process; we’re attempting a reformation of a whole society.

SAHLINS: What practical is being done to discourage this kind of thing?

MR. X: Well, guidance on the spot—

CAPTAIN D (Sahlins’ escort): It’s up to the individual advisers— MR. X: The individual adviser giving guidance on the spot.

CAPTAIN D: Sometimes it’s successful, sometimes not— CAPTAIN Y: In most cases, it’s not.

SAHLINS: From what you say about mental torture, you wouldn’t make any distinction in the morality of either kind [i.e., physical versus mental torture]?

MR. X: Hell, no! I don’t make any distinction in morality at all: torture is torture, and when you fuck around with a guy’s mind and his whole basic raison d’être, you’re really hurting him—especially when he’s prepared mentally, spiritually, for the physical torture.

SAHLINS: Then the attempt to discourage Vietnamese water torture ...isjust because the other type [mental torture] doesn’t offend American sensibilities as much?

MR. X: No, it’s not because of that. Because we don’t concern ourselves here with American sensibilities. We concern ourselves with what will work.

CAPTAIN Y: It’s relatively ineffective.

MR. X: It’s ineffective. It may sound hard-boiled to say that we don’t concern ourselves with American sensibilities—but we don’t. We’re concerning ourselves with Vietnamese sensibilities.

SAHLINS: What about the sensibilities of the Americans who are involved... the person who’s torturing?

MR. X: To most of the Americans, to most of the simple-minded Americans who get involved in Vietnam—that’s all the Boobus americanus that H. L. Mencken spoke about—undoubtedly they think that the mental and emotional torture we’re talking about is the least objectionable, because they’ve never really paused to seriously reflect about it themselves; or perhaps they did not go through the experience of being a POW in the Korean Conflict themselves. And they can probably tell you, “Oh, Jesus, I’d try and stop that physical torture, because I know it’s just wrong”—you know. But we think that we’re looking into it a little more deeply, and we see that the mental and spiritual torture that we bring a man through to the point where he voluntarily gives you the information is pretty rough stuff to get involved in too. But it works.

SAHLINS: How do you offset the damage to yourself?

MR. X: Your belief. Your belief: you have to sincerely believe that in the long run you’re helping this man. It’s like an AA cure. If you’re just breaking the guy down for the sake of getting a poor helpless alcoholic who’s hipped on NLF propaganda to admit that he was wrong and give you the information, then you’re going to send him out in the street a crushed derelict, then there’s something wrong with you. But you have to really believe, as we do—although we get discouraged sometimes by our [Vietnamese] counterparts—you have to really believe that you’re helping this guy to something better.

SAHLINS: Conversion from communism is involved in the torture.

MR. X: Conversion from anything to anything involves a certain degree of self-torture. We just accelerated the process because we need that fucking information.

SAHLINS: This is better for him?

MR. X: He’s alive, and you can still help him...

***

MR. X: Most Americans, unfortunately, don’t bother to think deeply about the stuff they get involved in and they make superficial judgments: “Well, it’s wrong to torture this guy physically because we’re all part of the same (background?)”—

CAPTAIN Y: If you ask you’ll get probably 80 percent of the people [U.S. military] will say, “Well, I didn’t get involved in it. When they capture them, when they capture the Vietnamese communists, I just turn my back and go and have a cigarette.”

MR. X: They take a drink from their canteen and light up a cigarette. And that’s discouraging... I’d rather get—not get involved in it, not in the actual physical torture myself—but I’d rather be right there and see it done, and then laugh like a horse when it doesn’t work and they don’t get the information. And then in the long run you’re affecting the situation when you just laugh at this guy and say: “Look, you think he’s gonna break? So you cut up his stomach a little bit and his insides fell out...Hegotthelast laugh on you, because he didn’t talk a bit.” And maybe it’ll make the guy think, you know, and ten times later, after ten more people have faded out because he physically tortured them, maybe he'll say: "Okay, wise American adviser, what would you do?"... We have a moral responsibility, it seems to me, once we've stepped into this country, to involve ourselves in the complete fabric of the country and to understand it, and then try and help the Vietnamese to look at some different alternatives... We should be acting as a catalyst, as a thinking catalyst in Vietnam. But you cannot be a catalyst unless you know the entire fabric of the thing. And lighting up a cigarette when they bring a prisoner in for questioning is—well, that's an immoral—

CAPTAIN Y: It's just like saying, "It doesn't happen."

MR. X: That's just about the height of immorality, I think. To think that you can just absolve yourself. That's saying that every man is an island; or at least when it is comfortable, when it's comfortable for me to be an island unto myself, then I am; and the bell's tolling for that poor fucker under the knife, not me. That's real bad. And again, it's a simple-minded approach.

***

[Mr. X had mentioned that one of the rules imparted to the cadres in training was "be kind to prisoners." I asked if that wasn't a rule he disobeyed.]

MR. X: Well, if the final result of it is—it's a cruel process—but the result of bringing him closer to you, of conversion—it's a tortuous process of conversion—but the result is a kind one...Ifyou believe in your program, this is what you do...

SAHLINS: Do you believe in breaking people down so they agree with your program? And breaking them down justifies the end?

MR. X: No... That’s why we would not take a guy who’s been broken directly into our unit at this time...

SAHLINS: Either you will rehabilitate him by converting him to your belief or you’re going to leave him a mental wreck... Can your ends be so God-given as to give you this right among humanity to do this?

MR. X: I don’t know. I don’t really believe anybody’s hands are Godgiven. I’m an agnostic atheist.

SAHLINS: No, your ends. I’m not asking you for religious beliefs. What I’m asking is, do you believe you have the right to impose by this method—

MR. X: I think I’ve got the right to try. Nobody’s got the right to succeed—guaranteed. But everybody’s got the right to promote and proselytize what they believe.

* * *

CAPTAIN Y: If we do not break this guy, if we do not attempt to change his ideas, then in essence what have we done? We’ve said that basically he’s right!

SAHLINS: No, that isn’t so. One agrees to disagree as a matter of principle in a democratic system.

MR. X: Oh wait, this is [where] we began… I've had some tremendous conversations with these guys, and we begin by agreeing to disagree. But you can soon get this guy so flustered and so shaken up that before he knows it, he's agreeing with you—because his assumptions to begin with were rather vulnerable.

SAHLINS: But that isn't the issue here. The issue here is whether you will impose your will by this technique, which is—

MR. X: We don't know what our will is yet.

SAHLINS: You will impose your ideas by this technique— MR. X: What ideas?

***

SAHLINS:… I asked the question, how do you justify the effect upon yourself of acting in this way? And you said you're doing the guy a service. Now, I'm asking you, do you believe you have the right to impose your will on somebody, impose what you believe— MR. X: We are not imposing our will. We are not imposing will. Even after you've broken him and gotten the information, he's still a free agent.

***

MR. X: Not impose will—if he fails to accept… an alternative. And not our alternative; there are a number of alternatives. Because in essence that's what we're trying to show him.

***

SAHLINS: So as a matter of fact by this process you either transform him from that belief into one of a range of acceptable beliefs, or you will leave him a mental wreck—

MR. X: But we don’t leave him this way. We have brought him to a point where he realizes that the faith he placed in his previous system was essentially not powerful. He has volunteered the information. At this point he’s got to find a new way. He’s got to have a way out of his dilemma, and the people at the training centers should be skillful enough to point out to him a number of alternatives.

SAHLINS: We come back to the question: whether you have the right—by these techniques, which are external to him—to deny him [the] belief that he came in with in his hand and only accept a set of alternatives which you propose?

***

MR. X: Listen, I’ve met guys…WehadaguyinPhuYenProvince in the summer of ’63 who was the Propaganda Director for the NLF in that province; and boy, we just worked ourselves literally ragged in four days trying to bring that guy to the point where he’d tell us a few things, and he was tremendous—just tremendous. Didn’t tell us a thing.

SAHLINS: You admire this guy?

MR. X: Tremendous—tremendous.

SAHLINS: So you admire more a person who will not acquiesce to the thing that you say is right than one who does?

MR. X: No, not true. I didn’t say that at all. I admire a guy who will tortuously admit—if he really believes—that, “Oh Jesus, I never thought about that before. Those guys [NLF] they told me something else; and you’re really doing something else.” A guy like that who will examine his previously arrived conclusions and change his mind, I admire that—

SAHLINS: That’s very admirable, but it doesn’t describe the process you went through, which was to leave him in a situation where either he takes his set of alternatives which you give him or he is a mental wreck.

MR. X: Remember, this was an act of affirmation on his part, where he yields the information voluntarily. But it’s only a beginning; it’s only a beginning; and it’s not fair to leave him at the point where he’s just made the beginning.

***

MR. X: It’s just like an alcoholic. An alcoholic can attend the meetings and he can see everybody else get embarrassed; and if he doesn’t want to join them he can just back out again. But once a guy begins to join this little society of alcoholics—

CAPTAIN Y: These cadres we have [as instructors]—these ex-VCs, ex-NLF, ex-Viet Minh—they all in some way or another gave up something in their own mind when they turned, came to the government.

***

MR. X:... what we're trying to show these guys when we're interrogating them, through this tortuous process, is that you're not better [off] under the NLF. "Your whole series of assumptions has got to be re-examined here, and we're here to help you re-examine them. And, Jesus, there's some guys here have got some more basic ideas of how they'd like to examine you, but we're just holding these guys off ... and we'll take good care of you." That's the kind of a dirty trick—[but] when you've only got four days...

SAHLINS: Have you done this with Vietcong?

MR. X: We don't do anything because we're advisers—in every sense.

[26] See Elinor Langer, "National Teach-In," Science (May 21,1965): 1075–1077; see also Marshall Sahlins, "The Future of the National Teach-In: A History," in Marshall Sahlins, Culture in Practice: Selected Essays (New York: Zone Books, 2000), pp. 209–218.

[27] See Dana Priest and Barton Gellman, "'Stress and Duress' Tactics Used on Terrorism Suspects Held in Secret Overseas Facilities," Washington Post, December 26, 2002, p. A1.

[28] The Vietnamese Popular Forces were anticommunist troops. The Vietcong, referred to later in this article as the National Liberation Forces (NLF), were Communist.

 Suggestion for Further Reading

<biblio>

Sahlins, Marshall

2000 Culture in Practice: Selected Essays. New York: Zone Books.

</biblio>

 Chapter 4: Contemporary Anthropology and Moral Accountability

Thomas Weaver, ed., To See Ourselves, 1973

GERALD D. BERREMAN

By 1970 documentary evidence surfaced which implicated the involvement of American anthropologists and other social scientists in clandestine counterinsurgency work from 1965 to 1969. In 1965, anthropologists were reported to have participated in Project Camelot, a CIA-supported counterinsurgency program in Latin America. And during the American wars in Indochina, documents taken from the office of a UCLA anthropologist revealed that several anthropologists had secretly assisted the war effort by providing information about Thai culture and communities to the U.S. military.[29]

In this article (first delivered as a talk in 1967), Gerald D. Berreman critiques the notion of a “value-free” social science. He notes that clandestine anthropological activities sponsored by the Department of Defense and other parts of the U.S. military establishment can have disastrous political, professional, and ethical consequences.[30] Berreman has consistently sought to keep anthropological research in the public domain, available to anyone.

Berreman's contribution to ethics in anthropology included a leading role in the American Anthropological Association's standing Committee on Ethics. In November 1970, he and the other committee members formulated the "Principles of Professional Responsibility," which the association adopted in May 1971. The document states that the "anthropologist's paramount responsibility is to those he [or she] studies. When there is a conflict of interest, these individuals must come first." [31]

The notion that contemporary world events are irrelevant to the professional concerns of anthropologists was laid neatly to rest at the 1966 meeting of the American Anthropological Association when Dr. Michael Harner rose to challenge the ruling of the president-elect that a resolution condemning the United States' role in the war in Vietnam was out of order because it did not "advance the science of anthropology" or "further the professional interests of anthropologists." Dr. Harner suggested that "genocide is not in the professional interests of anthropologists." With that, the chair was voted down.

The dogma that public issues are beyond the interests or competence of those who study and teach about man comprises myopic and sterile professionalism, and a fear of commitment which is both irresponsible and irrelevant. Its result is to dehumanize "the most humanist of the sciences," as Eric Wolf has called our discipline; to betray utterly the opportunity and obligation which he has claimed for anthropology, namely: "the creation of an image of man that will be adequate to the experience of our time."

That neutrality in science is illusory is a point which has been made often and well.

The famous anthropologist Franz Boas was alert to startlingly similar problems in the uses of anthropology and anthropologists during World War I, and deplored them publicly. “A number of men who follow science as their profession [including ‘at least four men who carry on anthropological work’]... have prostituted science by using it as a cover for their activities as spies,” he wrote in 1919.

If science has no responsibility, scientists do. Scientists are people. They cannot escape values in the choices they make nor in the consequences of their acts.

If anthropologists choose to collect their data and make their analyses without regard to their use—leaving that choice to others—they may believe that they are adhering to the most rigorous scientific canons. But to say nothing is not to be neutral. To say nothing is as much a significant act as to say something. Douglas Dowd noted that “the alternatives are not ‘neutrality’ and ‘advocacy.’ To be uncommitted is not to be neutral, but to be committed—consciously or not—to the status quo; it is, in C. Wright Mills’ phrase, ‘to celebrate the present.”’

Silence permits others in the society who are less reticent, perhaps less scrupulous, almost certainly less informed, to make their own use of scientific findings. It leaves to politicians and journalists, to entrepreneurs, scoundrels, and madmen, as well as to statesmen and benefactors—but especially to the powerful—the interpretation and manipulation of matters about which they frequently know little, and of whose implications they know less, and nearly always far less than those who collected the material or made the analyses. It is therefore wishful thinking of the most elemental sort to assume that anthropological work can be put before the public without context or interpretation, there to be judged freely and intelligently on its merits without prejudice or manipulation, and to be acted upon accordingly. To assume that is to contribute to misuse born of ignorance or worse. Scientists cannot divorce themselves from the consequences of their scientific acts any more than they can from those of any of their other acts as human beings. This is a fact of existence in human society and it is a tenet of democracy.

Science—even social science—has finally arrived in our society. The rewards to be obtained for supplying social science data and social science interpretations of the right kinds and in the right places are generous. The intellectual today can join the hired myth-makers and apologists of Madison Avenue and Washington. On campus he can be the paid consultant or the academic entrepreneur and grantsman. As Irving Howe has remarked, “For once, the carrots are real.” In this context, the prevalence of social scientists whose eyes are on the main chance rather than on the condition of man should not be surprising. This is the context within which we find social scientists whose “ideology of non-involvement in the social effects of scientific research,” Sidney Willhelm noted, simply frees them from social responsibility, creating an “unaccountable scientific aristocracy,” closely allied to the governmental, military, and corporate elites who buy their services and validate their heady status. As Noam Chomsky has written, “The problems with which research is concerned are those posed by the Pentagon or the great corporations, not, say, by the revolutionaries of Northeast Brazil or by SNCC [the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee]. Nor am I aware of a research project devoted to the problem of how poorly armed guerrillas might more effectively resist a brutal and devastating military technology.” Yet such alternative problems would be likely to interest at least some social scientists.

The rationale which supports this scientific unaccountability among moral men is the myth of a value-free social science. This myth has been exposed to all but its most avid beneficiaries and the most credulous in its audience, as we have seen in this section. Yet it still serves to maintain a whole segment of the profession—or at least to sustain the symbiotic relationship between that segment of social scientists and the corporate foundations and governmental agencies who buy its findings, using them only as and if they see fit. It was Alexander Leighton who said that administrators use the findings of social scientists as a drunk uses a lamp post—for support rather than illumination. It is not important what social scientists say so much as how what they say is used. That depends upon how amenable it is to use and that is where the myth of freedom from values is crucial, and where the social responsibility of the social scientist lies.

The myth of value-freedom in physical science disappeared in the atomic cloud. In social science it is fading, as we have seen, in the dust of Camelot, the blood of Vietnam, and the duplicity of the CIA.

Today, if scientific truth is to be understood and acted upon, those who discover and know it must forcefully announce not only their knowledge, but its implications and consequences. As Winetrout says in the closing paragraph of his essay honoring the courageous [sociologist C. Wright] Mills: “In our present-day world, it is not enough to be scholarly; one must be concerned and angry enough to shout. It is not enough to understand the world; one must seek to change it.”

No doubt, the world will change; no doubt, the social scientist’s knowledge will contribute to that change. His responsibility is to see that this knowledge is used for humane changes. Simply, scientists must be responsible for what they do.

Thirty years ago, Robert Lynd maintained that “either the social sciences know more than do...de facto leaders of the culture as to what the findings of research mean, as to the options the institutional system presents, as to what human personalities want, why they want them, and how desirable changes can be effected, or the vast current industry of social science is an empty facade.” To repeat Kathleen Gough’s question, “Who is to evaluate and suggest guidelines for human society, if not those who study it?”

Our positive responsibility as scientists is to present what we know and what inferences we draw from our knowledge as clearly, thoughtfully, and responsibly as we can. This is a value position with practical and humane consequences. We have already heard from C. Wright Mills. In another work, he decried the “divorce of knowledge from power,” and wrote:

As a type of social man, the intellectual does not have any one political direction, but the work of any man of knowledge, if he is the genuine article, does have a distinct kind of political relevance: His politics, in the first instance, are the politics of truth, for his job is the maintenance of an adequate definition of reality. Insofar as he is politically adroit, the main tenet of his politics is to find out as much of the truth as he can, and to tell it to the right people, at the right time, and in the right way. Or, stated negatively: to deny publicly what he knows to be false, whenever it appears in the assertions of no matter whom; and whether it be by virtue of official secret or an honest error. The intellectual ought to be the moral conscience of his society, at least with reference to the value of truth, for in the defining instance, that is his politics. And he ought also to be a man absorbed in the attempt to know what is real and what is unreal.[32]

I know of no statement which speaks to the responsibility of social scientists in our time as cogently as that one.

Douglas Dowd identifies the focal point of opposition by the young and by intellectuals in the word hypocrisy—hypocrisy in American deeds versus American words. This is where we as scientists and as teachers have a major responsibility: to speak the truth; to provide “an adequate definition of reality.” Candor is a major precondition for trust and for rational action, and this is what is lacking or threatened in our society—in foreign policy, in race relations, in poverty programs, in support of scholarship and research, in university administration, in virtually every sphere of our national life.

The reaction of many anthropologists is to say and do nothing about the problems of the day; to retreat into research, administration, or teaching. Lulled by activity into a sense of purpose, accomplishment, and virtue, they hope that things will somehow work out. Do we need Edmund Burke to remind us that “the only thing necessary for the triumph of evil is for good men [and, I might add, informed men] to do nothing”?

Anthropologists have not lacked outspoken champions of truth— truth about race, about poverty, about professional ethics, about the heavy hands of government and private capital in formulating research, about war, and especially about the war in Indo-China. Probably anthropologists have more of them in proportion to their numbers than any other academic discipline and any other profession. But we need to emphasize and value these contributions in order to counteract the powerful and irresponsible professionalism which belittles or condemns these humane endeavors in favor of the mindless and trivial successes obtained under the illusion of freedom from responsibility for one's self and one's work.

In a world where anything scientists learn is likely to be put to immediate and effective use for ends beyond their control and antithetical to their values, anthropologists must choose their research undertakings with an eye to their implications. They must demand the right to have a hand or at least a say in the use of what they do as a condition for doing it.

We anthropologists must seek to apply our knowledge and skills to real problems, defined by us and not simply accepted from the sources which provide our funds. We must ask questions which address the problems of our time rather than merely those which minimize or obscure them. Nor does the incompleteness of our knowledge disqualify us scientifically, rationally, or morally from asserting what we know. Mills pointed out 20 years ago that "if one half of the relevant knowledge which we now possess were really put into the service of the ideals which leaders mouth, these ideals could be realized in short order." Gouldner has followed logically with the statement: "The issue...is not whether we know enough; the real questions are whether we have the courage to say and use what we know." This is why we must not be timid in asserting ourselves individually and collectively wherever we can. This is why our professional association should not now be chary to express views on matters of public policy just as we have not been in the past (as you have seen in the Resolutions) and just as other such groups express views on such matters. For students of human behavior to decline comment on human behavior is irresponsibility in a democracy, no matter how controversial the issues.

[29] See Irving Horowitz, ed., The Rise and Fall of Project Camelot (Cambridge: MIT Press, 1968); see also Eric R. Wolf and Joseph G. Jorgenson, “Anthropology on the Warpath in Thailand,” New York Review of Books, November 19, 1970, pp. 26–35.

[30] See also Gerald D. Berreman, “Academic Colonialism—Not So Innocent Abroad,” The Nation, November 10, 1969, pp. 505–508.

[31] The code of ethics was published in the Newsletter of the American Anthropological Association, November 1970, pp. 15–16.

[32] “On Knowledge and Power,” in Irving Horowitz, ed. Power, Politics, and People (New York: Ballantine Books, 1964), p. 611.

 Suggestion for Further Reading

<biblio>

Berreman, Gerald D.

1981 The Politics of Truth: Essays in Critical Anthropology. New Delhi: South Asian Publishers.

</biblio>

 Chapter 5: Two Plus Two Equals Zero—War and Peace Reconsidered

Radcliffe Quarterly, March 1983

LAURA NADER

In the 1980s, many Americans expressed a growing concern over the escalation of the nuclear arms race between the United States and the Soviet Union. Laura Nader took a strong public stand against pro-nuclear policies throughout this period, and used anthropological ideas about group dynamics and cultural control to inform her critiques. As early as 1969, she recommended that anthropologists begin to “study up”—that is, research powerful institutions and bureaucracies— and her work among nuclear physicists demonstrates how social scientists can shed light on the practices of high-tech cultures.

In this article, Nader examines the drift toward war in a nuclear age. She argues that institutionalized insanity, organizational survival, and short-term self-interest on the part of policy makers and the military-industrial complex may jeopardize the long-term survival of humanity.

The people responsible for the current nuclear arms policies are a small number of men who circulate between government laboratories, universities, the defense and military establishment, and defense contracting industries. These people promote the belief that we need nuclear capabilities, that we can win a nuclear war or keep the peace through nuclear buildup. They promulgate refined distinctions that make it appear that there are serious internal debates on nuclear arms. As the nuclear debate expands, I am increasingly hearing people say that Americans are being led down the path to a national Jonestown and that other governments may be performing the same function for their people.

Actually the analogy to Jonestown does not quite hold: Jones needed followers to have a Jonestown. Yet there is some similarity. While Americans are not actively following, perhaps they trust that somewhere in the government different sides of the arguments surrounding the nuclear arms race are being openly debated. Open debate will only happen, however, if citizens themselves broaden the debate and question official “wisdom,” a process that is beginning to occur.

Among well-known citizens who have helped broaden and deepen the debate are individuals who are or who have been insiders to nuclear research.

Scientists like Hans Bethe, Herbert York, Robert Wilson, and the late George Kistiakovsky, who were involved as division heads or group leaders in the Manhattan Project or as government laboratory leaders since World War II, have defected from a group-think mentality. The merging of interest between such scientists and the grassroots peace movements concerned about the wisdom of a $222 billion defense program that could lead to global annihilation has added a new dimension to the peace movement. And just plain people are more often making the observations that could be useful reminders to insulated minds. One such observation appeared in a letter-to-the-editor section of a major newspaper noting that President Reagan's naming the MX [missile] a "Peacekeeper" is like "Robespierre describing the guillotine as a headache remedy." Another letter discusses the Orwellian "war is peace" thesis in which a constant state of war allowed the superpowers to control populations and maintain a war economy. As insiders and outsiders join forces, the dangers, the hoax, and the prospects of a different future will become more specified.

The dangers have become policy under the present administration. Although defense and detente were central ideas in earlier debates, increasingly we hear about first strike and winning a protracted nuclear war. Nuclear suicide is being contemplated as a way to preserve our Western civilization and our American democracy. Peaceful coexistence with the Soviets is no longer a goal; rather, we hear talk about radically altering the nature of Soviet society through confrontation. This becomes abundantly clear in Robert Scheer's new book With Enough Shovels (1982), and there is among some an obsession that a postnuclear victory (sic) would ensure destruction of Soviet political authority and cause "the emergence of a postwar world order compatible with Western values." The notion that the Soviets are responsible for general world unrest goes unqualified in these circles.

There are three concepts that have influenced my thinking about war over the past decade. They are institutionalized insanity, organizational survival, and short-term self-interest. Institutionalized insanity operates in groups, has immunity from the forces of society that would come down hard on insane individuals, and has not been widely recognized as a social problem, even though insanity in groups exhibits many of the same qualities as insanity in individuals. Herb York refers to the problem of insanity in his interview with

Mr. Scheer: “What’s going on right now is that the crazier analysts have risen to higher positions than is normally the case.” Senator Alan Cranston refers to an interview that Scheer had with [Undersecretary of Defense] T. K. Jones that went “far beyond the bounds of reasonable, rational, responsible thinking,” when the latter made the now infamous suggestion: If there are enough shovels to go around, everybody’s going to make it. The Reagan reference to Russians as “godless” monsters is additional proof of the thinking that leads to messianic planning to defend presumed U.S. vulnerabilities. I say presumed, because both inside and outside the administration deficiencies in nuclear arms arguments have been challenged or qualified by Hans Bethe, Admiral Hyman Rickover ([author of] No Holds Barred, 1982), and many others.[33]

The architects of the present administration are said to be intellectuals, people who in the words of Mr. Scheer can separate their rhetoric from the consequences of what they advocate. Another view was revealed to me recently by a man who had worked in the Pentagon for more than 25 years. When I asked him if the Pentagon were studying the problem of depressed white middle-aged men in positions of power and responsibility, he added, “and who are being advised by depressed men.”

 Organizational Survival

The concept of organizational survival has been used to understand organizational behavior. For no matter what the explicit goals of an organization are, its most central, albeit usually implicit goal, is its own survival. An organization takes on a life of its own. Although both institutionalized insanity and organizational survival are ubiquitous, they are of particular importance in the nuclear arms race. If institutionalized insanity operates among military and defense people, behavior in their circles that outsiders might think crazy (like the idea that somebody can win a nuclear war) goes undetected and undebated. This situation can persist for a long enough period to ensure that many organizations have invested so much in policies arising from this insanity that organizational survival begins to take precedence over national or even personal survival. Ideologies and rationales are developed within these groups to defend the plan of action. These defenses are reinforced by actual or perceived outside criticism, and become so strong that the insanity is further strengthened. Ideological obsessions among bureaucrats may more often be the result of powerlessness than the political persuasion of the government.

 Permanent War Economy

The defense industry is self-interested and profit motivated, as Admiral Rickover made abundantly clear in his last testimony before Congress. World War II heralded the beginning of close ties between industry and defense. In fact, Washington was such a soft touch that, according to Richard Barnet’s Roots of War (1972), Charles E. Wilson of General Electric, who recognized the profitability of the emerging defense industry, talked of “building a permanent war economy.” During the Eisenhower years, the theory developed among liberal politicians, economists, and business that high military spending would stimulate the economy. This theory was put into practice during the Kennedy administration through an enormous increase in military spending. Due to government sponsorship, defense industries profit from the benefits of long-term contracts, interest-free loans, payment by government of most plant and capital equipment, and government willingness to pay prices subjected to continuous upward renegotiation. These industries are among the biggest, most powerful, technologically advanced units of economic power in the country, and U.S. National Security policy is directed by elite groups largely recruited from business. Critics of government-industry relations have argued that exorbitant prices for poor quality products, and rampant fraud should encourage the government to produce its own products. While Admiral Rickover has been very specific about the fraud problem, others have argued that high-level military spending is having an adverse effect on the civilian economy. Increased military spending has weakened the U.S. position in the international marketplace and increased inflation at home.

I would suggest that we examine the rational and nonrational aspects of the arms race when considering what we should do. The nuclear freeze is a first step, one that if implemented, could give us time to address more fundamental societal questions. There may be something about the way our society has changed since the 1930s that is legitimizing the drift to war. I remember my father saying years ago that we had never found a civilian economic solution to the Great Depression, we simply postponed solutions by going to war. In fact, preparing for war has become endemic to the superpowers. There may be internal structural reasons beyond opposing ideologies that are behind this pattern.

 Danger and Opportunity

When we despair, we need to remember that these are times of danger and opportunity. The antinuclear movement is wise to plan its actions in steps beginning with the nuclear freeze and no-first-use declarations. At the same time, we need to develop positive economies and futures for nation-state societies that are not dependent on war for continued existence. To achieve these goals, those concerned with the arms race might well link up with the environmental movements and with healthy alternatives being worked on by the women's movements. There will be specific recommendations for getting out of this drift toward nuclear war that follow patterns of logical reasoning, i.e., "Nuclear war is not good for your health, and here are a series of paths that lead to exit." What we also need are plans for drawing people away from nuclear drift and toward positive goals. In addition to Nuclear Nightmares by Nigel Calder (1980) we need to visualize peaceful worlds, a world bent on creation versus destruction, on communication rather than distrust between nations. The role of citizen will be crucial in this process: our voices will not be hindered by bureaucracies. In Our Depleted Society (1965), Seymour Melman has written on what we could do with our $222 billion if the emphasis on the arms race were reduced. There has been talk about the economic successes of Japan and West Germany. Why can't we imagine what the economies of the U.S. and the USSR might be without the arms race? Can we find solutions for the Great Depression that do not include warfare and use these solutions as a positive enticement away from nuclear war? Can we address the very serious problem of personal powerlessness among top-level officials in countries like the U.S. or the USSR?

I am arguing that we recognize the limits placed upon our leaders, both military and civilian, and that we realize the role we need to play in generating the necessary optimism to empower people to become active. Under such conditions we could think about developing economies appropriate to the conditions of peace and force ourselves to recognize the differences between wasteful versus adequate defense spending. National security may be best guaranteed by a healthy society. We need to lead the contest between nations into other areas such as peace-time high technology. This will require us to heed Admiral Rickover's advice, which has been echoed elsewhere: "Look at how our society is put together—political and economic power is increasingly being concentrated among a few large corporations and their officers." This is not the American dream, not what Jefferson contemplated. This is not what we would fight a war to preserve, but it may be what some might fight a war to obliterate when we can no longer tolerate the gap between what we would like to be and what we are.

[33] Dr. Hans Bethe, physicist, led the theoretical division of the Manhattan Project and won the 1967 Nobel Prize in Physics. Admiral Hyman Rickover (1900–1986) was a longtime U.S. naval officer and engineer who developed the world's first nuclear-powered engines and the first atomic-powered submarine, the USS Nautilus, launched in 1954.

 Suggestions for Further Reading

<biblio>

Nader, Laura

1969 "Up the Anthropologist—Perspectives Gained from Studying Up." In Reinventing Anthropology, edited by Dell Hymes. New York: Vintage.

1981 "Barriers to Thinking New About Energy," Physics Today 34, no. 3: 9, 99–102.

1986 “The Drift to War.” In Peace and War: Cross-Cultural Perspectives, edited by Mary LeCron Foster and Robert A. Rubenstein, pp. 185192. New Brunswick, N.J.: Transaction Books.

</biblio>

 Chapter 6: Dollars That Forge Guatemalan Chains

New York Times, March 18, 1985

BEATRIZ MANZ

The specter of nuclear holocaust haunted Americans during the Cold War era, but conventional wars also raged abroad in the 1970s and 1980s, often with U.S. support. The twentieth-century history of Guatemala was extraordinarily bloody. Since the colonial era, a small elite has controlled most of the country’s land and indigenous farmers have been forced to work their plantations. In the 1900s many plantations were owned and operated by U.S. corporations such as United Fruit Company. In 1951, Jacobo Arbenz was elected president on a platform of land reform and soon began expropriating fields for redistribution to peasants. But in 1954, the CIA engineered a coup which left Guatemala in the hands of a military dictatorship. Over the next forty years, approximately two hundred thousand people—mostly Mayans—were killed by armed groups openly funded by the United States in the name of halting communism. Guatemala is among the clearest examples of U.S.-sponsored state terror in recent history.

In this article, Beatriz Manz describes the scale of Guatemalan violence and the continuing role of the United States in perpetuating the terror. But the bloodshed did not end, and was not directed solely at Mayan peasants. In 1990, assassins killed Guatemalan anthropologist Myrna Mack; her murder was almost certainly politically motivated. Not until 1996 did the government and the opposition sign U.N.-sponsored peace accords, formally ending the thirty-year civil war.

Freedom of Information Act documents released in 1999 confirm that as early as the 1960s U.S. officials helped to implement a counterinsurgency strategy relying upon death squads (consisting of plainclothes Guatemalan military agents) to eliminate suspected “subversives.” During a visit to Central America in March 1999, President Clinton apologized for U.S. involvement in Guatemala’s civil war.

[[r-j-roberto-j-gonzalez-anthropologists-in-the-publ-3.png]]

The Administration is proposing a major increase, from $13 million to $35 million, in security assistance to Guatemala based on a dual deception—that human rights have improved under General Oscar Humberto Mejía Victores and that the military will soon turn over power to an elected civilian government.

In contrast to virtually every independent human rights organization, a State Department report on Guatemala issued last month maintained that “overall human rights conditions improved in 1984.” In fact, ghastly violence—beatings, rape, torture, mutilations, and assassinations—has become a normal state of affairs. Nor is it a secret war: hundreds of people have been publicly abducted, and mutilated corpses are strewn throughout the countryside. More than 150 articles have appeared in the Guatemalan press detailing killings, disappearances, and gruesome atrocities in the last three months alone.

The military has come to rely on terror as the centerpiece of a counterinsurgency campaign designed to smash the guerrillas’ base of support—to disrupt life among hundreds of thousands of ordinary Guatemalan villagers. The results of this campaign are staggering even by the bloody standards of Guatemala. Some 100,000 children are said to have lost one or both parents to political violence. Of the one million inhabitants in the northwestern part of the country, the center of army activity, 150,000 have fled to Mexico and 250,000 have been displaced or had their lives severely disrupted. In one highland municipality, 46 villages were abandoned. One of these villages, Finca San Francisco Nenton, was the site of a military massacre of 302 men, women, and children, on July 17, 1982.

In the years since then, selective killings and abductions have more or less replaced large-scale massacres, but the architects of yesterday's slaughter are still designing policy. In fact, many of those responsible for atrocities have been promoted rather than punished—and killings and disappearances still occur daily, at a rate of more than 100 a month.

In this climate, the generals have declared that elections will be held on October 27, 1985. This may look good to Washington, but what could elections mean to Guatemalans when the army has crippled or destroyed most independent organizations and virtually the entire country is consumed with fear? The average Guatemalan would not presume to criticize or organize openly against the status quo.

Whether or not elections take place, the military is simply not about to relinquish real power. The occupant of the presidential palace may wear a pinstripe suit instead of a uniform, but the army will still remain in charge. The generals will continue to impose the lopsided pattern of landownership and income distribution that has given rise to much of the conflict. All potential civilian candidates recognize this, and none who might favor land reform dare propose it.

Nor does anyone imagine that the military will relinquish the power it has amassed in the countryside through civil patrols and model villages. The army has conscripted 900,000 predominantly Indian men into unpaid patrols and begun to intern 100,000 Indians in 70 model villages. Together, the two policies are forcefully transforming the lives of the indigenous population.

In fact, far from getting ready to give up power, the army is further entrenching itself in realms normally controlled by civilians. A November 1984 law, for example, extends military control over virtually all rural reconstruction and development efforts—precisely the area where much of the proposed United States economic aid would go.

New security assistance could only send a signal that atrocities are acceptable. It would also be sure to further strengthen the military’s control. Is there an alternative? Aid should be limited to economic assistance and it should be dependent on three conditions: it should go to local communities and not be managed by the military; those guilty of atrocities must be brought to justice; peasant organizations and grassroots groups must be able to function freely.

The choice is clear: we can bankroll the further entrenchment of the military, or we can support the establishment of a stable and just Guatemalan society.

 Suggestion for Further Reading

<biblio>

Manz, Beatriz

1986 Refugees of a Hidden War. Albany: SUNY Press.

</biblio>

 Chapter 7: Anthropologists as Spies

The Nation, November 20, 2000

DAVID PRICE

In this article, David Price revisits the issue of clandestine anthropological research raised in the earlier pieces by Boas (Chapter 1) and Berreman (Chapter 4). Using documents obtained through the Freedom of Information Act, Price traces the historical ties between anthropologists, the CIA, and its precursor (the Office of Strategic Services or OSS) from World War I to the 1991 Gulf War. He also discusses the significance of modifications to the American Anthropological Association’s “Principles of Professional Responsibility” (see Chapter 4) that have diluted the original document’s emphasis on nonsecrecy in research and the primary responsibility of anthropologists to those they study.

Price concludes with a sobering warning: “Unless the scientific community takes steps to denounce such [espionage] activities using the clearest possible language and providing sanctions against those who do so, we can anticipate that such actions will continue with impunity during some future crisis or war.” It remains to be seen whether anthropologists will once again serve as spies in the “war on terror” declared by George W. Bush.

On December 20, 1919, under the heading “Scientists as Spies,” The Nation published a letter by Franz Boas, the father of academic anthropology in America. Boas charged that four American anthropologists, whom he did not name, had abused their professional research positions by conducting espionage in Central America during the First World War. Boas strongly condemned their actions, writing that they had “prostituted science by using it as a cover for their activities as spies.” Anthropologists spying for their country severely betrayed their science and damaged the credibility of all anthropological research, Boas wrote; a scientist who uses his research as a cover for political spying forfeits the right to be classified as a scientist.

The most significant reaction to this letter occurred ten days later at the annual meeting of the American Anthropological Association (AAA), when the association’s governing council voted to censure Boas, effectively removing him from the council and pressuring him to resign from the national research council. Three out of four of the accused spies (their names, we now know, were Samuel Lothrop, Sylvanus Morley, and Herbert Spinden) voted for censure; the fourth (John Mason) did not. Later Mason wrote Boas an apologetic letter explaining that he’d spied out of a sense of patriotic duty.

A variety of extraneous factors contributed to Boas’s censure (chief among these being institutional rivalries, personal differences, and possibly anti-Semitism). The AAA’s governing council was concerned less about the accuracy of his charges than about the possibility that publicizing them might endanger the ability of others to undertake fieldwork. It accused him of “abuse” of his professional position for political ends.

In 1919 American anthropology avoided facing the ethical questions Boas raised about anthropologists’ using their work as a cover for spying. And it has refused to face them ever since. The AAA’s current code of ethics contains no specific prohibitions concerning espionage or secretive research. Some of the same anthropologists who spied during World War I did so in the next war. During the early cold war Ruth Benedict and lesser-known colleagues worked for the RAND Corporation and the Office of Naval Research. In the Vietnam War, anthropologists worked on projects with strategic military applications.

Until recently there was little investigation of either the veracity of Boas’s accusation in 1919 or the ethical strength of his complaint. But FBI documents released to me under the Freedom of Information Act shed new light on both of these issues.

The FBI produced 280 pages of documents pertaining to one of the individuals Boas accused—the Harvard archeologist Samuel Lothrop. Lothrop’s FBI file establishes that during World War I he indeed spied for Naval Intelligence, performing “highly commendable” work in the Caribbean until “his identity as an Agent of Naval Intelligence became known.” What is more, World War II saw him back in harness, serving in the Special Intelligence Service (SIS), which J. Edgar Hoover created within the FBI to undertake and coordinate all intelligence activity in Central and South America. During the war the SIS stationed approximately 350 agents throughout South America, where they collected intelligence, subverted Axis networks, and at times assisted in the interruption of the flow of raw materials from Axis sources. Lothrop was stationed in Lima, Peru, where he monitored imports, exports, and political developments. To maintain his cover he pretended to undertake archeological investigations.

From his arrival in Lima in mid-December 1940, Lothrop was dogged by constant worries that his communications with Washington were being intercepted by British, Peruvian, Japanese, or German intelligence operatives.

By August 1941 he became concerned that his lack of significant archeological progress might lead to the discovery of his true work in Peru. Lothrop reported his fears of being detected to FBI headquarters: “As regards the archaeological cover for my work in Peru, it was based on the understanding that I was to be in the country six months or less. It is wearing thin and some day somebody is going to start asking why an archaeologist spends most of his time in towns asking questions. This won’t happen as soon as it might because the Rockefeller grant for research in Peru makes me a contact man between the field workers and the government.”

Lothrop was referring to the Rockefeller Foundation, which financed twenty archaeologists who were excavating in Peru, Chile, Colombia, Mexico, Venezuela, and Central America. He also used his ties to a variety of academic and research institutions—including Harvard, the Peabody Museum, the Institute of Andean Research, and the Carnegie Institute—as cover in Peru. Archeologist Gordon Willey, who worked on an Institute of Andean Research Project in Peru and had some contact with Lothrop at this time, recalled that “it was sort of widely known on the loose grapevine that Sam was carrying on some kind of espionage work, much of which seemed to be keeping his eye on German patrons of the Hotel Bolivar Bar.”

In fact, Lothrop was considered a valuable agent who collected important information on Peruvian politics and leading public figures of a nature usually difficult to secure. An FBI evaluation reported that headquarters “occasionally receive[s] information of sufficient importance from Mr. Lothrop to transmit to the President.” Lothrop’s principal source was an assistant to the Peruvian minister of government and police. In the spring of 1944 this informant resigned his governmental position and began “working exclusively under the direction of Dr. Lothrop.” In May 1944 the U.S. Embassy reported that Lothrop’s principal informant was fully aware of Lothrop’s connection to the SIS and FBI.

Lothrop’s cover was compromised by four Peruvian investigators in the employ of his top informant. His informant had been heard bragging to the Peruvian police that he made more by working for the U.S. Embassy than the police made working for the Peruvian government.

The FBI decided to test the reliability of Lothrop's key informant by assigning him to collect information on nonexistent events and individuals. The informant was given background information about a nonexistent upcoming anti-Jewish rally that he was to attend, including a list of specific individuals who would be present. Though the rally did not occur, the informant provided a full report on it. He also filed detailed reports on a nonexistent commemorative celebration of the bombing of Pearl Harbor held in a distant town, and on a fictitious German spy who supposedly had jumped ship in Peru.

Lothrop was instructed not to tell the informant that his duplicity had been detected; instead, he was to say he was out of funds to pay for informants. Lothrop refused to believe his informant was lying and sent a letter of resignation to J. Edgar Hoover. His resignation was accepted and he returned to the United States to resume his academic duties at Harvard's Peabody Museum and the Carnegie Institute.

What is now known about Lothrop's long career of espionage suggests that the censure of Boas by the AAA in 1919 sent a clear message to him and others that espionage under cover of science in the service of the state is acceptable. In each of the wars and military actions that followed the First World War anthropologists confronted, or more often repressed, the very issues raised by Boas in his 1919 letter to The Nation.

While almost every prominent living U.S. anthropologist (including Ruth Benedict, Gregory Bateson, Clyde Kluckhohn, and Margaret Mead) contributed to the World War II war effort, they seldom did so under the false pretext of fieldwork, as Lothrop did. Without endorsing the wide variety of activities to which anthropological skills were applied in the service of the military, a fundamental ethical distinction can be made between those who (as Boas put it) "prostituted science by using it as a cover for their activities as spies" and those who did not. World War II did, however, stimulate frank, though muted, discussions of the propriety of anthropologists' using their knowledge of those they studied in times of war, creating conditions in which, as anthropologist Laura Thompson put it, they became "technicians for hire to the highest bidder." Although the racist tenets of Nazism were an affront to the anthropological view of the inherent equality of humankind, Boas (who died in 1942) would probably have condemned anthropologists who used science as a cover for espionage during World War II. Approximately half of America's anthropologists contributed to the war effort, with dozens of prominent members of the profession working for the Office of Strategic Services (OSS), Army and Navy intelligence, and the Office of War Information.

In the following decades there were numerous private and public interactions between anthropologists and the intelligence community. Some anthropologists applied their skills at the CIA after its inception in 1947 and may still be doing so today. For some of them this was a logical transition from their wartime espionage work with the OSS and other organizations; others regarded the CIA as an agency concerned with gathering information to assist policy makers rather than a secret branch of government that subverted foreign governments and waged clandestine war on the Soviet Union and its allies. Still other anthropologists unwittingly received research funding from CIA fronts like the Human Ecology Fund.

The American Anthropological Association also secretly collaborated with the CIA. In the early 1950s the AAA's executive board negotiated a secret agreement with the CIA under which agency personnel and computers were used to produce a cross-listed directory of AAA members, showing their geographical and linguistic areas of expertise along with summaries of research interests. Under this agreement the CIA kept copies of the database for its own purposes with no questions asked. And none were, if for no other reason than that the executive board had agreed to keep the arrangement a secret. What use the CIA made of this database is not known, but the relationship with the AAA was part of an established agency policy of making use of America's academic brain trust.

Anthropologists' knowledge of the languages and cultures of the people inhabiting the regions of the Third World where the agency was waging its declared and undeclared wars would have been invaluable to the CIA. The extent to which this occurred is the focus of ongoing archival and FOIA research. When the CIA overthrew Jacobo Arbenz in Guatemala in 1954, an anthropologist reported, under a pseudonym, to the State Department's intelligence and research division on the political affiliations of the prisoners taken by the military in the coup.

During the Korean War linguists and ethnographers assisted America's involvement with little vocal conflict of conscience. Norwegian sociologist Johan Galtung's revelations in 1965 of Project Camelot, in which anthropologists were reported to be working on unclassified counterinsurgency programs in Latin America, ignited controversy in the AAA. During America's wars in Southeast Asia the AAA was thrown into a state of upheaval after documents purloined from the private office of UCLA anthropologist Michael Moerman revealed that several anthropologists had secretly used their ethnographic knowledge to assist the war effort.

As a result of inquiries made into these revelations, the 1971 annual meeting of the AAA became the scene of a tumultuous showdown after a fact-finding committee chaired by Margaret Mead maneuvered to create a report finding no wrongdoing on the part of the accused anthropologists. An acrimonious debate resulted in the rejection of the Mead report by the voting members of the association. As historian Eric Wakin noted in his book Anthropology Goes to War, this "represented an organized body of younger anthropologists rejecting the values of its elders." But the unresolved ethical issue of anthropologists spying during the First and Second World Wars provided a backdrop to the 1971 showdown. Almost two decades later, during the [1991] Gulf War, proposals by conservatives in the AAA that its members assist allied efforts against Iraq provoked only minor opposition.

Today most anthropologists are still loath to acknowledge, much less study, known connections between anthropology and the intelligence community. As with any controversial topic, it is not thought to be a good "career builder." But more significant, there is a general perception that to rake over anthropology's past links, witting and unwitting, with the intelligence community could reduce opportunities for U.S. anthropologists to conduct fieldwork in foreign nations.

In the course of research in this area I have been told by other anthropologists in no uncertain terms that to raise such questions could endanger the lives of fieldworkers around the globe. This is not a point to be taken lightly, as many anthropologists work in remote settings controlled by hostile governmental or guerrilla forces. Suspicions that one is a U.S. intelligence agent, whether valid or not, could have fatal consequences. As Boas prophetically wrote in his original complaint against Lothrop and his cohorts, “In consequence of their acts every nation will look with distrust upon the visiting foreign investigator who wants to do honest work, suspecting sinister designs. Such action has raised a new barrier against the development of international friendly cooperation.” But until U.S. anthropology examines its past and sets rules forbidding both secret research and collaboration with intelligence agencies, these dangers will continue.

Over the past several decades the explicit condemnations of secretive research have been removed from the AAA’s code of ethics—the “Principles of Professional Responsibility” (PPR). In 1971 the PPR specifically declared that “no secret research, no secret reports or debriefings of any kind should be agreed to or given” by members of the AAA. By 1990 the attenuation of anthropological ethics had reached a point where anthropologists were merely “under no professional obligation to provide reports or debriefing of any kind to government officials or employees, unless they have individually and explicitly agreed to do so in the terms of employment.” These changes were largely accomplished in the 1984 revision of the PPR that Gerald Berreman characterized as reflecting the new “Reaganethics” of the association: In the prevailing climate of deregulation the responsibility for ethical review was shifted from the association to individual judgments.

As anthropologist Laura Nader noted, these Reagan-era changes were primarily “moves to protect academic careers... downplaying anthropologists’ paramount responsibility to those they study.” The current PPR may be interpreted to mean that anthropologists don’t have to be spies unless they want to or have agreed to do so in a contract. A 1995 Commission to Review the AAA Statements on Ethics declared that the committee on ethics had neither the authority nor the resources to investigate or arbitrate complaints of ethical violations and would “no longer adjudicate claims of unethical behavior and focus its efforts and resources on an ethics education program."

Members of the current ethics committee believe that even though the AAA explicitly removed language forbidding secretive research or spying, there are clauses in the current code that imply (rather than state) that such conduct should not be allowed—though without sanctions, this stricture is essentially meaningless. Archeologist Joe Watkins, chairman of the ethics committee, believes that if an anthropologist were caught spying today, "the AAA would not do anything to investigate the activity or to reprimand the individual, even if the individual had not been candid [about the true purpose of the research]. I'm not sure that there is anything the association would do as an association, but perhaps public awareness would work to keep such practitioners in line, like the Pueblo clowns' work to control the societal miscreants." Watkins is referring to Pueblo cultures' use of clowns to ridicule miscreants.[34] Although it is debatable whether anthropologist intelligence operatives would fear sanctions imposed by the AAA, it is incongruous to argue that they would fear public ridicule more. Enforcing a ban on covert research would be difficult, but to give up on even the possibility of investigating such wrongdoing sends the wrong message to the world and to the intelligence agencies bent on recruiting anthropologists.

Many factors have contributed to the AAA's retreat from statements condemning espionage and covert research. Key among these are the century-old difficulties inherent in keeping an intrinsically diverse group of scholars aligned under the framework of a single association. A combination of atavistic and market forces has driven apart members of a field once mythically united around the holistic integration of the findings of archeology and physical, cultural and linguistic anthropology. As some "applied anthropologists" move from classroom employment to working in governmental and industrial settings, statements condemning spying have made increasing numbers of practitioners uncomfortable—and this discomfort suggests much about the nature of some applied anthropological work. The activities encompassed under the heading of applied anthropology are extremely diverse, ranging from heartfelt and underpaid activist-based research for NGOs around the world to production of secret ethnographies and time-allocation studies of industrial and blue-collar workplaces for the private consumption of management.

As increasing numbers of anthropologists find employment in corporations, anthropological research becomes not a quest for scientific truth, as in the days of Boas, but a quest for secret or proprietary data for governmental or corporate sponsors. The AAA's current stance of inaction sends the dangerous message to the underdeveloped world that the world's largest anthropological organization will take no action against anthropologists whose fieldwork is a front for espionage. As the training of anthropology graduate students becomes increasingly dependent on programs like the 1991 National Security Education Program—with its required governmental-service payback stipulations— the issue takes on increased (though seldom discussed) importance.

It is unknown whether any members of the AAA are currently engaged in espionage, but unless the scientific community takes steps to denounce such activities using the clearest possible language and providing sanctions against those who do so, we can anticipate that such actions will continue with impunity during some future crisis or war.

Many in the American Anthropological Association are frustrated with its decision neither to explicitly prohibit nor to penalize secretive government research. It is time for U.S. anthropologists to examine the political consequences of their history and take a hard, thoughtful look at Boas's complaint and the implications implicit in the association's refusal to condemn secret research and to reenact sanctions against anthropologists engaging in espionage.

[34] "Miscreants" refers to those who engage in socially deviant behavior. Among the Pueblo and certain other Native American cultures, clowns traditionally mimicked the behavior of deviants in public settings (for example, at ritual celebrations), thereby reproaching the offenders.

 Suggestions for Further Reading

<biblio>

Price, David

2002 “Lessons from Second World War Anthropology.” Anthropology Today 18, no. 3: 14–20.

2003 Cold War Witch Hunts: The FBI’s Surveillance and Repression of Activist Anthropologists. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press.

</biblio>

 Chapter 8: Abuse of Power by the Advocates of Reason

Acts of Resistance, 1998

The late Pierre Bourdieu (1930–2001), renowned French sociologist and anthropologist, was a frequent contributor to national debates on culture, economic policy, globalization, and immigration. He once said of his public commentaries: “I would not have engaged in public position-taking if I had not, each time, had the perhaps illusory sense of being forced into it by a kind of legitimate rage, close to something like a sense of duty.” [35]

Throughout the 1990s, Bourdieu was particularly concerned about the destructive effects of economic neoliberalism, including the policies of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, institutions whose prescriptions have often led to human suffering and political instability in the Third World, according to some economists, for example, Joseph Stiglitz.[36] In the following commentary, originally delivered at a public discussion organized by the International Parliament of Writers at the 1995 Frankfurt Book Fair, Bourdieu describes “terrorist violence” as a revolt against the modernday “imperialism... of international bodies.”

From deep inside the Islamic countries there comes a very profound question with regard to the false universalism of the West, or what I call the imperialism of the universal. France has been the supreme incarnation of this imperialism, which in this very country has given rise to a national populism, associated for me with the name of Herder.[37] If it is true that one form of universalism is no more than a nationalism which invokes the universal (human rights, etc.) in order to impose itself, then it becomes less easy to write off all fundamentalist reaction against it as reactionary.

Scientific rationalism—the rationalism of the mathematical models which inspire the policy of the IMF or the World Bank, that of the law firms, great juridical multinationals which impose the traditions of American law on the whole planet, that of rational-action theories, etc.—is both the expression and the justification of a Western arrogance, which leads people to act as if they had the monopoly of reason and could set themselves up as world policemen, in other words, as selfappointed holders of the monopoly of legitimate violence, capable of applying the force of arms in the service of universal justice.

Terrorist violence, through the irrationalism of the despair which is almost always at its root, refers back to the inert violence of the powers which invoke reason. Economic coercion is often dressed up in juridical reasons. Imperialism drapes itself in the legitimacy of international bodies. And, through the very hypocrisy of the rationalizations intended to mask its double standards, it tends to provoke or justify, among the Arab, South American, or African peoples, a very profound revolt against the reason which cannot be separated from the abuses of power which are armed or justified by reason (economic, scientific, or any other). These “irrationalisms” are partly the product of our rationalism, imperialist, invasive, and conquering or mediocre, narrow, defensive, regressive, and repressive, depending on the place and time.

One is still defending reason when one fights those who mask their abuses of power under the appearances of reason or who use the weapons of reason to consolidate or justify an arbitrary empire.

[35] Quoted in Pierre Bourdieu, Acts of Resistance (New York: New Press, 1998), p. vii.

[36] Stiglitz, winner of the 2001 Nobel Prize in Economics, outlines his critique in Globalization and Its Discontents (New York: W. W. Norton, 2002).

[37] See Pierre Bourdieu, “Deux impérialismes de l’universel,” in C. Fauré and T. Bishop, eds., L’Amérique des Fracais (Paris: Editions François Bourin, 1992).

 Suggestion for Further Reading

<biblio>

Bourdieu, Pierre

1998 Acts of Resistance: Against the Tyranny of the Market. Translated by Richard Nice. New York: New Press.

</biblio>

* Part II: Prescient Anthropology Diagnosing Crises Abroad

 Chapter 9: West Must Correct Its Mistakes in Yugoslavia

Baltimore Sun, August 16, 1992

ROBERT M. HAYDEN

In the period following the Cold War, ethnic and religious conflicts flared in numerous parts of the world, in some cases for the first time in many decades. Robert M. Hayden was among the first to document and analyze this phenomenon. As an anthropologist who has conducted field research in Yugoslavia and India, two multiethnic and multireligious states, Hayden has analyzed these cultural dynamics in his work.

Among the first international post-Cold War crises was the disintegration of Yugoslavia and the subsequent civil war between Serbs, Bosnians, and Croatians. In this piece, Hayden analyzes how the diplomatic failures of the United States and European countries led to the escalation and increasing violence of the conflict.

The disgusting brutality of the Serbian campaign in Bosnia makes it easy to view the whole Bosnian tragedy as the fault of the Serbs. Yet the Bosnian war, and Serbian campaign itself, are in large measure the result of diplomatic errors by the Europeans and Americans.

If the war is to be stopped, its causes must be addressed. To do so will require recognition of these errors.

The most fundamental error was to accept the disintegration of Yugoslavia. It was always clear that the country would not fall apart cleanly because of the complex intermingling of nationalities there.

There was a basic error of logic: If Yugoslavia could not exist as a multiethnic state, how could the various republics do so?

At the level of cynical Realpolitik, the answer was simple. In the newly independent republics, state chauvinism would replace state socialism, with the majority in each state permitted to discriminate systematically against the largest scapegoat minority under a pious cover of “democracy.” This cynical solution has been applied in Slovenia and Croatia and in the Baltic republics of the former Soviet Union. However, there was a flaw in the reasoning. What if the hated scapegoat minority rose up in arms and rebelled?

With the collapse of Yugoslavia, the most vulnerable minorities in Croatia and Bosnia were the Serbs. In both regions, Serbs were already sensitive because of the ghastly civil war of 1941–45. The then fascist “Independent State of Croatia,” which included Bosnia, implemented a policy of genocide against the Serbs. In Bosnia itself, allied Croat and Muslim forces massacred Serbs, who responded by killing Muslims.

Viewed in this historical context, then, Serb fears of oppression and worse were understandable. They were hardly reassured by a Croatian government that today belittles the wartime genocide or by a coalition of Muslims and Croats to separate Bosnia’s Serbs from Yugoslavia.

In this context of fear, the European Community and U.S. insistence on the inviolability of borders put the Serbs of Croatia and Bosnia in the unenviable position of the Kurds in Iraq. Their rejection of the borders was to be expected, even as the brutality of their resistance can only be condemned. But this was the first blunder: to ratify the destruction of Yugoslavia without redrawing borders.

The second blunder was the premature recognition of Bosnia before a political solution could be reached. Bosnian Serbs had clearly shown that they rejected such a state unless they could have political autonomy amounting to virtual independence. It was clear to all who knew anything about Yugoslavia that the recognition of an independent Bosnia in these circumstances would ignite a civil war. Lord Carrington, the EC special representative to Yugoslavia, Cyrus Vance, the former U.S. Secretary of State, and Warren Zimmerman, U.S. ambassador to Yugoslavia, had counseled against it. Unfortunately, they were right.

Despite the simplistic war cries of that odd couple, Margaret Thatcher and Bill Clinton, the Bosnian tragedy cannot be solved by military action. While America tries to treat the Bosnian war as an international conflict, it is in fact a civil war. The Serbs fighting the Bosnian government are Bosnian Serbs—albeit supported by Serbia—who have been incorporated into a “sovereign” Bosnia against their own will. They boycotted the referendum on Bosnian independence and did not want to secede from Yugoslavia.

Any attempt to defend the territorial integrity of Bosnia will require a long war of conquest against these Bosnian Serbs. Military action would be as tough as fighting the Viet Cong. Nor would action against Serbia help Bosnia. The United States could destroy Serbia, but to do so would impoverish another 10 million people, most of whom oppose the war. It would also create a few million more refugees. It will not force Bosnia’s Serbs to submit to a Muslim-Croat coalition government.

At this stage, any attempt to preserve Bosnia will lead to a longer, bloodier, more horrible war. A better approach would be to accept that the recognition of Bosnia with its existing boundaries was a gross error and to draw new borders, presumably accompanied by transfers of population, a “solution” patterned after the partition of India in 1947.

To save face, the United States and EC may be able to insist on the fiction of a Bosnian “state” which is actually a confederation of autonomous cantons, a temporary solution that would probably soon lead to the secession of the Serbian and Croatian cantons and their attachment to the mother republics.

Patterning the division of Bosnia on the partition of India is hardly a completely satisfactory solution. As that experience shows, such a solution is itself grotesque and will lead only to permanent armed hostility in what used to be Yugoslavia. Yet an unhappy result was foreordained once the EC and the United States gave in to Germany’s insistence on the destruction of the Yugoslavia that had been created after the German defeat in World War I and reconstituted after the German defeat in World War II. Having rejected multinational Yugoslavia, the EC and the United States cannot create a multinational Bosnia. To attempt to do so will enlarge the Balkans tragedy.

 Suggestion for Further Reading

<biblio>

Hayden, Robert M.

1999 Blueprints for a House Divided: The Constitutional Logic of the Yugoslav Conflict. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.

</biblio>

 Chapter 10: Nato Fuels the Balkan Fire

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, March 28, 1999

ROBERT M. HAYDEN

After the conflicts between Serbs, Bosnians, and Croatians subsided, another dispute exploded in the southern Yugoslavian province of Kosovo. Problems began almost immediately after the breakup of the former Yugoslavia, when Slobodan Milosevic ended a policy (implemented by Tito) which granted autonomy to Kosovo from 1974 to 1989. By the end of this period, the vast majority of those living in Kosovo were ethnic Albanians.

In response to the new policy of direct rule, the Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA) began attacking Serbian police and civilians in 1997. Serb forces responded by killing KLAforces and Albanian civilians, and the conflict quickly escalated, resulting in approximately 2,000 deaths and several hundred thousand refugees.

On March 24, 1999, U.S.-led NATO air forces initiated a bombing campaign against Yugoslav targets, in violation of international law and the U.N. Charter. Although many Clinton administration officials argued that the attacks were necessary to prevent greater bloodshed, U.S. State Department and Pentagon officials indicated that Serbian paramilitary atrocities directed at Kosovar Albanian civilians escalated in the weeks following the bombing. [38] In this article, Hayden issues a sharp critique of the NATO campaign.

On March 24, the United States led NATO into the first campaign of military aggression against a sovereign state in Europe since World War II. It did so against the principles of international law and of the United Nations charter. It also did so against the rulings of the Nuremberg trials, which declared that “to initiate a war of aggression... is not only an international crime, it is the supreme international crime.”

That NATO is an aggressor is not in doubt. While hardly a “republic” under the dictatorship of Slobodan Milosevic, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia is clearly a state with internationally recognized borders. NATO is attacking that state militarily, brazenly, although Yugoslavia has not attacked or even threatened any NATO country.

To be sure, Serbian forces have attacked ethnic Albanians in Kosovo, a province that has been part of Serbia since 1913. While Kosovo had a very mixed population in the past, during the years of its “autonomy” under ethnic Albanian rule (1974–1989), it became almost 90 percent Albanian. The Serbian police have been brutal in response to an armed uprising by the Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA), which began to attack Serb police and to murder Serb civilians in 1997.

The resulting conflict has been horrible and tragic. It is hardly unique in the world, however, nor even particularly noteworthy in terms of victims. For example, the Turkish campaigns against the Kurds in Turkey and in Iraq have killed far more people and destroyed far more villages than the Serb campaigns in Kosovo. Yet NATO is not bombing Turkey (which is, of course, a NATO member).

Perhaps the niceties of international law may be forgotten if the cause is right. But what is the cause?

President Clinton has said that we are attacking Yugoslavia to protect the Albanians there from a Serb offensive, to prevent a wider war, to uphold our values, to protect our interests, and to advance the cause of peace. Yet few actions could be less likely to produce these results than the massive assaults now being conducted on Serbia.

Protect the Albanians? It was clear before NATO's aggression that the most likely result of air attacks would be an increase in fighting in Kosovo, and this has happened. The Serbs, committed to holding onto their territory, have increased their attacks on the KLA. The KLA, having gained NATO as its air force, has increased its attacks on the Serbs. Caught in the middle are the people of Kosovo, who are now fleeing the increased fighting. Thus NATO has caused a new wave of refugees.

Prevent a wider war? As the increasing flows of refugees reach Albania and Macedonia, they threaten to disrupt those fragile states. Macedonia is particularly vulnerable, since relations between the Slav Macedonian majority and ethnic Albanian minority there are already uneasy. On the second day of NATO attacks on Serbia, thousands of demonstrators, waving Macedonian flags, attacked the American Embassy, and the Macedonian government stated that anti-NATO sentiment was increasing.

So much for, to use Bill Clinton's words, "defusing the Balkans powder keg." Uphold our values? Which values? Isn't international law one of our values?

Here, the relevant comparison is with Iraq, where the United States conducted the [1991] Gulf war because Saddam Hussein had invaded a neighboring state, thus changing borders by force. In Kosovo, the United States has led NATO into attacking a sovereign state, thus threatening to change borders by force.

Or perhaps the “values” are the need to protect civilians from military attack. In that case, the United States will need to put Turkey on its target list, not to mention Israel, which has attacked civilians in Lebanon (part of which it also occupies) with some frequency for many years now.

Of course, Bill Clinton referred to “genocide” in his speech justifying the attacks on Yugoslavia. Yet in Kosovo, about 2,000 people have died in two years, in the course of the brutal repression of an armed insurrection. This is a condition usually called “civil war.” Tragic, yes. Incidents of war crimes, almost certainly. But “genocide,” no. This is an insult to the memory of the victims of the Holocaust.

Do our values include terrorizing the innocent populations of Belgrade, Novi Sad, Kragujevac, Nis, and other Serbian cities? Do they include damaging the power and water supplies of these people? Do they include destroying the livelihood of these people? Are our values, in fact, the same as those we condemned during the siege of Sarajevo by the Serbs (and failed to notice during the siege of Mostar by the Croats)?

Advance the cause of peace? Increasing conflict, and radically increasing the risk of even greater war, seems an odd way to achieve this goal. Advance our interests? Perhaps. But what are our interests in this case? Bill Clinton has not said. And when we know what they are, will they justify the violations of international law and the betrayal of our supposed values that are manifested by NATO’s massive aggression against Yugoslavia?

In a transparent display of hypocrisy, President Clinton has said that NATO is not waging war against the people of Yugoslavia, but against their government. Can anyone believe that people under attack will hate anyone other than the attackers?

NATO’s aggression has betrayed those who oppose Milosevic’s dictatorship, thus strengthening the rule of the man whom Bill Clinton accurately described as “a dictator who has done nothing since the cold war ended but start new wars and pour gasoline on the flames of ethnic and religious division.”

There is now a new arsonist in the volatile Balkans: NATO.

[38] See Noam Chomsky, “Crisis in the Balkans,” pp. 34–50 in Rogue States: The Rule of Force in World Affairs (Cambridge: South End Press, 2000).

 Chapter 11: No Exit From Somalia

Washington Post, May 15, 1991

ANNA SIMONS

Among the most catastrophic post-Cold War crises was the civil war in Somalia. Like Afghanistan, Somalia was heavily armed by the United States during the 1980s for the alleged purpose of deterring Soviet expansion. The American-backed leadership, however, looted the national treasury and repressed dissent, and many Somalis resented U.S. support of the corrupt regime. By 1991, civil war had exploded.

The following three commentaries by Anna Simons offer an anthropologist’s view of the situation over time. They courageously suggest policy options that would be controversial among many anthropologists and government officials, yet reflect intimate knowledge of the region and local cultures.

In the following 1991 article, written at a time when Somalia barely registered in the U.S. media, Simons urges policy makers to take note of the looming crisis there. She also offers a concrete suggestion for helping Somalis escape the bloodshed.

Conditions for many Somalis are as bad as they are for the Kurds and Bangladeshis, yet because there are no journalists in Somalia, news of the catastrophe there barely trickles out.

Since December, Somalia's capital has been unlivable for hundreds of thousands of Somalis, if not more. Beyond the toll of dead and injured, civil war has utterly devastated the social structure, laid waste the infrastructure and destroyed any semblance of civil order throughout the country. Nevertheless, tens of thousands of Somalis are stuck along the borders of a nation which, for all intents and purposes, no longer exists—with no exit.

Many Somalis are perched on the Kenyan border. However, Kenya has long viewed Somalis with suspicion and ambivalence, and to judge from what Somali friends have written, their applications for refugee status are not being processed at all quickly (if at all), nor is Kenya granting Somalis visas to travel in Kenya or through Kenya to anywhere else. Nor must Kenya have much incentive to do so; no country is making it easy for Somalis to enter.

Thus, even the best-educated and most upstanding and middle class of the Somalis—those who worked for the government or ran businesses and owned restaurants—have been left desperate, destitute, and deserted. This is what one Somali on the Kenyan border writes: "Here the condition is something beyond your imagination. Even the water is very scarce. Don't ask about medicine. Never talk about a house to rent. Food is very scarce. Even if you get food you may not get the purchasing power [money]."

Another good friend watched his handicapped sister raped by militia, after bandits stripped his entire family of everything they owned. Now he fears being shot whenever he tries to cross the border into Kenya to mail a letter—to plead for help.

Meanwhile, Kuwait desperately needs hundreds of thousands of pairs of hands for its massive cleanup and repair.

Kuwait has long hosted Somali workers. Indeed, one returned American soldier saw at least one truckload of jubilant Somalis celebrating the liberation of Kuwait City in Kuwait City—some Somalis clearly stuck out the occupation alongside Kuwaitis.

Somalis are Muslims, like Kuwaitis, and Somalia is also a member of the Arab League. Under normal circumstances I am sure Saudi Arabia and the Gulf states would have tried to head off the civil war in Somalia (as they have so often done in the past). However, they can hardly be blamed for having been preoccupied by recent events so much closer to home.

Nevertheless, now there is occasion to pay attention again, and to offer a simple, temporary but life-saving solution to tens—perhaps hundreds—of thousands of Somalis.

Offer those Somalis on the Kenyan border transit to Kuwait, employment in the cleanup effort in Kuwait and refuge in Kuwait until they have the opportunity to return safely to set their own devastated house in order again.

 Chapter 12: Our Abysmal Ignorance About Somalia

Washington Post, December 6, 1992

ANNA SIMONS

Once the fighting in Somalia appeared to be waning in November and December 1992, the outgoing Bush administration decided to move U.S.

troops into the country on a massive scale under the auspices of the United Nations. In 1993 Clinton supported the intervention as a humanitarian mission, although critics charged that the famine was ending by the time American soldiers arrived on the scene. In many ways, the operation had the appearance of a public relations mission.

In this article, published as U.S. troops were on the way to Somalia, Simons expresses grave concern that “we Americans literally do not know what we are getting into,” and provides readers with basic information about the history and politics of the country. She unambiguously drives her main argument home: the vast majority of so-called Somali experts lack fundamental knowledge about the region.

As the troops and the network anchors head for Somalia, I have this feeling—one that has grown with every passing morning news show, talk show, and evening newscast—that we Americans literally do not know what we are getting into.

The amount of misinformation that has been circulating and recirculating on Somalia is shameful. Perhaps we’ll become better informed as U.S. involvement there deepens, but I’m not counting on it. I only hope that we don’t learn the truth the hard way.

There are only a handful of non-Somalis in America—a very small handful—who should be regarded as experts on Somalia. Currently, however, the term is being loosely applied to a number of people who may indeed be expert in something—international relations, military strategy, low-intensity conflict, humanitarian assistance, or maybe just public relations—but don’t know much at all about Somalia. Nevertheless, they’re being heard from.

[[r-j-roberto-j-gonzalez-anthropologists-in-the-publ-4.png]]

Begin with the military front. To dismiss armed Somalis as an ineffectual, ragtag lot is to not only underestimate the tenacity of people who might well oppose foreign intervention but also to ignore guerrilla experience that has been built up in Somalia over a long period. Opposition groups have been active for more than 10 years in a region that is, in many ways, far more inhospitable than the wide-open sands where U.S. troops practiced before going to war in Kuwait and Iraq.

Moreover, the military experts are being either overconfident—and thus careless—or are just plain not leveling with the American public in some of their pronouncements. As one military adviser who helped train the Somali army has pointed out, the weapons the Somalis have are the same sort of weapons the North Vietnamese used so effectively against our more massive firepower. Plus, three years ago there were substantive reports of chemical weapons being stockpiled in Somalia. The country received weapons not only from the United States and the Soviet Union, but also from Libya and other Arab nations.

And has anyone mentioned the stockpiles of heavy weapons still buried in the bush? Or the initial effectiveness of the Somalis when they fought the Ethiopians in the Ogaden War? [39]

It is ironic that the same media networks that have previously reported on the skill of Somali poachers in decimating East Africa’s wildlife population have not made the connection between such adeptness at outmaneuvering crack police units and the potential ability to outfox some of our own military forces.

At the other end of the expert spectrum are those who claim knowledge of foreign policy and Africa and are spouting things like, “Elders ruled Somalia peacefully for centuries.” In fact, Somalia has existed as a sovereign country only since 1960, and even before colonialism drew boundaries, the strength of various clans and subclans was always variable and shifting with regard to who was in control of what areas and what people.

In fact, this is precisely what now appears to have revived in the northern and northeastern sectors of Somalia: zones of influence exist within which there is relative calm. Who is considering the Somalis in those areas and how their balance of power will be altered with the insertion of American or U.N. troops into the south, and the subsequent resurrection by outsiders of some sort of government for all of Somalia?

No Somalis I know who reside in this country are being consulted as to what should or could be done. In part this is because the State Department has rightly viewed Somalis as too partisan; every Somali in this country, whether the holder of a doctorate or the owner of a convenience store, has relatives somewhere in Somalia and thus strong interests and opinions concerning how things should be done there. There is tremendous disagreement within the U.S. Somali community, disagreement that in many ways parallels the discord in Somalia itself.

But this makes it far too easy for Americans at the State Department, in the Pentagon, and elsewhere in government to dismiss the full range of Somali viewpoints. Clearly, it is all part of the broader resolution: If getting food to starving Somalis cannot be handled diplomatically, then maybe it’s time to knock heads together. And perhaps it is.

But what is at issue for the long haul is an extremely complicated, extremely different, and extremely foreign situation. We should be heading into it with a good deal more knowledge than has so far been provided us by so-called experts.

[39] The Ogaden War (1977–1979) was fought between Somalia and Ethiopia over the disputed Ogaden province. The Soviet-backed Ethiopian army was able to reclaim the territory after a successful invasion by Somali forces in 1977.

 Chapter 13: The Somalia Trap

Washington Post, August 15, 1993

ANNA SIMONS

Simons’ third commentary urges policy makers in the Clinton administration to act decisively in Somalia, but her recommendations were largely ignored. Less than two months after the publication of Simons’ piece, eighteen elite U.S. Army Rangers were killed after their helicopter was shot down in a botched operation in Mogadishu to capture Mohammed Aideed, a local strongman. Within a month, Clinton announced that U.S. troops would begin withdrawing from Somalia.

Before considering withdrawal from Somalia, two key questions must be asked: What was our purpose in embroiling ourselves in Somalia in the first place, and have we achieved our goals?

One reason for choosing withdrawal now may well be that neither question will be any more answerable two years from now than two weeks or two months from now. Our purposes continue to appear as murky today as they did in November and December, while whatever we may have helped achieve for Somalis likely will vanish as soon as we pull out. In other words, we have hoisted ourselves on our own petard such that the real question becomes: At what price can we retreat with honor? And the answer to that question is the simplest by far: We cannot.

The trap we have erected for ourselves is this: Our insertion into Somalia was ill-conceived and impracticable from the outset. Putting the best possible spin on it, it seems to have stemmed from a heartfelt need to get horrific images of starving people off nightly television newscasts. So far, this has been our only success. Somalia remains off the airwaves. It is only when U.S. soldiers have been shot and killed (not even shot and wounded) that broadcasts reluctantly swing from Bosnia back to the Horn of Africa.

Yet this rapidly achieved silence (implying success, but hiding failure) came at the price of not bothering to understand the fundamentals of what was occurring in Somalia. For instance, our assumption that a country with no government would be easy to enter was correct, but our assumptions about restoring order so that we may leave again have been pitifully naive. Even worse, we have never successfully convinced the people we intervened to help that we have had their best interests at heart. Rather, a nagging suspicion for many Somalis (and—not uncoincidentally—many of the soldiers we have sent to Somalia) has been that we seek something more: oil, a military base, a stop to the rise of Islamic fundamentalism, an affirmation of our superpower status, a policeman's trial run at creating order out of lawlessness.

Indeed, such suspicions—that we have ulterior motives and that Somalis themselves are incidental to larger goals—fuel some of what now goes on in Mogadishu. Why should Somalis trust our intentions, particularly when these intentions have yet to be clarified? In this sense, Mohamed Farah Aideed does not deserve all our blame. Or if he does, it is in large measure because he personifies our mistakes in once again treating with and then treating badly someone whose power we initially enhanced but now can't control.

So what should we do?

If we withdraw from Somalia, we must realize we lose more than just face. We potentially lose the ability to intervene easily in countries where other peoples will need us in the future. And we potentially destroy what remains of the Somalia we have been shoring up.

However, if this is the decision that is in the best interests of this country, then for the sake of Somalis all forces should be withdrawn from that country, including all humanitarian assistance organizations. It was the aid agencies that supplied bandits with just enough food and money for ammunition and arms to keep them going and at one another's throats before we intervened. Without their assistance, maybe Somali suffering won't be quite so prolonged, and Somali might will be able to make Somali right much more quickly. Two regions of Somalia (the northeast and the self-declared northern country of Somaliland) already prove this point.

But if it is our might that should make right, then we need to do it with a different attitude. We need to take charge. Critics abroad and in universities here will scream neocolonialism, while many Americans will rightly wonder why we are helping reengineer a remote African country when we have so many dire social problems of our own.

Nevertheless, if our position in the world requires us to help police it, then Somalia is the place to begin because—like it or not—we are already there.

However, should this be our choice, we must recognize that we are already at a disadvantage. Recent history should have taught us to first understand Somalis and Somalia, and sooner rather than later. Still, it might not be too late if we address the hard questions now and answer them honestly.

 Suggestions for Further Reading

<biblio>

Simons, Anna

1995 Networks of Dissolution: Somalia Undone. Boulder: Westview Press.

1998 The Company They Keep: Inside the U.S. Army Special Forces. New York: Avon Books.

</biblio>

 Chapter 14: Increased U.S. Military Aid to Colombia Won’t Curb Drug Trafficking

San Francisco Chronicle, August 19, 1999

WINIFRED TATE

In the 1990s, the official justification for U.S. involvement in many Latin American countries shifted from the Cold War struggle against communism to the “war on drugs.” This shift resulted largely in efforts to eradicate sources of narcotic drugs—especially marijuana, coca, and poppy plants.

The “war on drugs,” like any conventional war, has relied upon military personnel, equipment, and tactics. In the 1990s, more than fifty thousand U.S. troops passed through nearly every country in the region and approximately fifteen thousand Latin American military and police agents were trained in the United States. Yet evidence indicates that many of the armed forces receiving U.S. assistance have dismal human rights records and that the war on drugs may be a cover for destroying opposition groups and insurgents.

Colombia, which produces much of the cocaine consumed in the United States, is a case in point. For more than thirty-five years the Colombian military and right-wing paramilitary groups have fought a guerrilla war against the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC, which have proposed state control over the economy. All sides have used drug money in varying degrees to finance the war, and all have reportedly engaged in human rights abuses, including assaults upon civilians, kidnappings, torture, rape, and extrajudicial executions. According to recent reports, some U.S. contractors have helped plan and support these operations.[40]

The following article, by Winifred Tate of the Washington Office on Latin America, was written as the Clinton administration proposed an escalation of military support for Colombia.

The long-neglected conflict in Colombia is emerging as Latin America's major crisis and pulling the United States ever more deeply into an unwinnable war. Escalating political violence, an entrenched insurgency, increasing illicit drug production, and growing concern from Colombia's neighbors about the conflict spilling over have policy makers in Washington searching for a solution to the problems besetting Colombia.

Many U.S. policy makers and military leaders are calling for increased U.S. aid for the Colombian military. But this will only serve to pull the United States closer to the most abusive military forces in the hemisphere without reducing illicit drug production or contributing to stability and democracy in that beleaguered country.

Though the Colombian army has declared itself "reformed," the nation's military is far from a new institution. Military collusion with paramilitary activity on a local and regional level continues, and paramilitary violence has escalated in the past six months. These groups target alleged guerrilla sympathizers, but their net of terror has been cast wide over a growing number of Colombian peace leaders and members of civil society. More than 400 people have been killed or "disappeared" in the first three months of this year alone, and tens of thousands more have been forced to flee their homes.

Two generals have been cashiered because of evidence of participating in human rights abuses, but the army continues to harbor many officers linked to rights violations, including high-level commanders. General Rafael Hernández López, for example, was named chief of staff of the Colombian Armed Forces, despite a pending investigation for his alleged participation in the 1996 kidnapping and murder of a guerrilla leader's family member. Human rights organizations and Colombian judicial authorities have gathered extensive evidence of his implication in numerous human rights violations, including summary executions, forced disappearances, rape, and torture committed by soldiers under his command. Increased military aid is not likely to improve the military's human rights performance.

In 1990, the United States sent a team of military advisers to Colombia to review that country's military intelligence organizations and recommend changes. Colombia's military intelligence apparatus was reorganized, and clandestine intelligence networks were established that, in at least one case, functioned as paramilitary death squads. One such group, Naval Intelligence Network No. 7, was responsible for the murder of more than 50 civilians. Five military officials, including Lt. Col. Rodrigo Quiñónez, were found guilty last year of creating and financing this paramilitary group in order to murder local opposition leaders and union organizers. Quinonez remains on active duty, with only a letter of reprimand in his file.

Now, drug czar Barry McCaffrey has requested $40 million in aid for "regional intelligence programs," part of a nearly $600 million emergency aid package for Colombia. This despite concerns substantiated by a General Accounting Office report revealing that U.S. intelligence shared with the Colombian military lacks mechanisms "to ensure that it is not being used for other than counternarcotics purposes."

Support for the Colombian military is pulling the United States into the quagmire of a protracted and dirty counterinsurgency struggle, with no clear policy objective. There is no evidence that focusing counternarcotics efforts on battling the country's largest guerrilla group, the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia or FARC, will reduce coca production. In fact, right-wing paramilitary groups, linked to the Colombian security forces, are more deeply involved in drug trafficking. Aerial fumigation has pushed a desperate peasant population further into the jungle—or into the arms of the insurgency.

While only Colombians can resolve their crisis, the international community—and particularly the United States—can and should do much to support an eventual negotiated settlement. We should begin by correcting the overwhelming imbalance in U.S. aid: more than $230 million in predominantly military assistance for counternarcotics operations, less than $10 million for development, judicial and law enforcement, and human rights.

On March 10, President Clinton apologized for the U.S. role in Guatemala’s long internal conflict, saying that “support for military forces or intelligence units which engaged in violent and widespread repression... was wrong, and the United States must not repeat that mistake.” Now, a matter of months after the president’s historic apology, we risk repeating that mistake by intervening in a counterinsurgency war that the United States cannot win.

Clear support for human rights and civilian democracy will prevent the need for future apologies to Colombians who have suffered enough in the name of misguided counternarcotics policies.

[40] See T. Christian Miller, “Colombia: Videotape Shows Americans’ Role in Village Bombing,” Los Angeles Times, March 16, 2003, p. A4.

 Chapter 15: Colombia: Rules of the Game

Foreign Policy in Focus, February 16, 2001

[[http://www.foreignpolicy-infocus.org][www.foreignpolicy-infocus.org]]

WINIFRED

In July 2000 the U.S. Congress passed the Clinton ad- TATE ministration’s “Plan Colombia,” a $1.3 billion three-year program to ratchet up U.S. military aid and training to Colombia. Colombia is now the third-largest recipient of U.S. military assistance. In this article, Winifred Tate cautions against the possible consequences of increasing such aid, given the miserable human rights record of the Colombian military.

When the U.S. and Colombia meet on the soccer field in Miami this Saturday, the rules are clear, the time is fixed, the game is officiated, and one team will win. In contrast, the U.S. is playing a far different game in Colombia: there are no rules, no referee, a maze of different “teams,” and no clear end. The playing field is a battlefield. No one wins; everyone loses.

I have just returned from a five-day fact-finding trip to Colombia’s southern state of Putumayo, where U.S.-trained army battalions have been deployed since December and where thousands of acres are being sprayed with herbicides.

The results are not good. Indigenous and peasant farmers have had their food supply destroyed by U. S.-funded aerial spraying. A grade school garden and a government-sponsored alternative agriculture project designed to teach peasants to grow cash crops other than coca were destroyed by fumigation. Paramilitary gunmen have gone on killing sprees whose total toll will never be known.

There are some very unhappy conclusions to be drawn:

First, the U.S. is teamed up with the most abusive military force in the hemisphere. And Colombia’s military, in turn, frequently works hand in glove with brutal paramilitary forces that are estimated to be responsible for three-quarters of the politically motivated civilian murders. Members of the Colombian military help the paramilitaries with intelligence, logistics, and transportation, and by blocking official investigations into their activities. This directly violates the human rights conditions set by Congress as a prerequisite for U.S. military assistance. During the first 18 days of January alone, paramilitary groups committed 26 massacres; in one incident paramilitary thugs beat more than 20 people to death with sledgehammers and stones. Yet U.S. aid continues to flow.

Second, there’s no clear end. The $1.3 billion extraordinary aid package passed by Congress last July was sold as a one-time emergency appropriation, a part of “Plan Colombia” that would end the civil war and bring peace and economic growth. Now the U.S. military is asking Congress for an additional $1 billion a year, continuing into the foreseeable future.

Third, the strategy is unclear. While Plan Colombia was sold to the American public as a counter-drug plan, U.S. funds were earmarked primarily for military aid to train, equip, and transport three new Colombian army battalions, blurring the lines between counterinsurgency and counternarcotics missions. U.S. policy makers are desperate to appear hard on drugs; but for Colombians this is not a war on drugs, it is the fifth decade of a counterinsurgency struggle.

Fourth, there aren't two sides: there's a maze of intertwined, overlapping, and heavily armed competitors. The drug cartels, under the protection of paramilitary forces, have diversified their operations, finding new production and trafficking routes. Colombian guerrillas, primarily the Revolutionary Armed Forces (FARC), have financed their expansion through profits from the drug trade, but their objective is territorial control and pursuing a war against the state. After more than 40 years, this war will not be won on the battlefield, but at the negotiating table.

Fifth, there are no winners. Ordinary Colombians lose. Human rights lose. Peace loses. The region loses. There have already been clashes between guerrillas and paramilitaries in surrounding countries. And the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees has begun preparing camps along the border for thousands of displaced persons. The U.S. war on drugs is pushing drug cultivation and trafficking into floundering Ecuador, Peru, and the fragile Amazon ecosystems.

The U.S. loses. Our most important interests and objectives in the region—including strengthening democracy, promoting human rights and the rule of law, and fostering trade and investment—are being severely undermined. Treatment programs for addicts go underfunded at home, and, despite spending some $19 billion a year on the war on drugs, illegal narcotics remain cheap and plentiful within America.

It's time for a new U.S. game plan in Colombia. First, we must send an unequivocal message to the Colombian military that it must cut its ties with paramilitary forces. Second, we must put our money into proven programs of supporting human rights, rule of law, and economic development. Finally, we must solve our drug problem at home with effective medical treatment and educational solutions to this largely public health problem.

If the U.S. team played soccer the way we're engaging Colombia, we'd score minus 50 goals, the team would be billions of dollars in the red, and 10 percent of the spectators would wind up dead. Maybe it's time for a new game plan.

 Chapter 16: Unveiling U.S. Policy in Colombia

Foreign Policy in Focus, April 19, 2002
[[http://www.foreignpolicy-infocus.org][www.foreignpolicy-infocus.org]]

LESLEY GILL

Lamentably, the Bush administration has not only maintained the levels of military support established under Plan Colombia but expanded funding to other South American countries. Under the Andean Regional Initiative, military funding has been expanded to six neighboring countries.

By February 2002, when peace talks between the Colombian government and FARC leaders collapsed, it was clear that U.S. involvement in Colombia was likely to expand beyond the realm of counternarcotics efforts, especially in the post-September 11 climate. In this article, Lesley Gill describes the potential pitfalls of labeling the FARC a terrorist group while ignoring the violence perpetrated by right-wing paramilitaries. Her commentary is a sharp condemnation of U.S. aerial fumigation policies that destroy the livelihood of peasant farmers in the name of counterterrorism.

As the drumbeat in the "war against terror" becomes louder in Washington, the Bush administration is prepared to involve the U.S. more directly in Colombia’s 40-year civil war. President Bush now advocates the use of U.S. advisers and equipment in a campaign against guerrillas who want to overthrow the Colombian government. Although the U.S. has already been tacitly supporting counterinsurgency operations in Colombia, Bush’s initiative would up the policy ante by openly committing the U.S. to the defeat of the guerrillas and eliminating the distinction between counternarcotics and counterinsurgency operations.

The September 11 tragedy provides the administration with the rationale to directly target guerrilla insurgents, whom it labels “terrorists” and blames for the recent collapse of peace talks. As I discovered on a recent fact-finding trip to the coca-growing region of southern Colombia, however, the aims of U.S. policy have been evident to peasants there for some time. It is here that indiscriminate aerial spraying of coca fields serves less to promote alternative development than to displace peasants from an area controlled by the FARC, Colombia’s oldest and largest guerrilla organization.

In the department of Putumayo, over half of the 350,000 inhabitants depend on coca for a livelihood. It is the only crop that can be marketed in a region where stable roads do not exist, and it provides some families with a modest living that would be unobtainable by other means. But coca—the basis of cocaine—also exposes them to intense levels of violence, as profits from its cultivation are sustained by the illegal drug traffic. Families are therefore eager to adopt viable alternatives.

Yet alternative development has always been subordinate to a repressive military and fumigation strategy. The U.S. seems less interested in assisting peasants to find substitutes for coca than in reducing the area under cultivation by almost any means necessary. The U.S. government now states that it will no longer promote alternative crops to peasants whose coca fields are eradicated in U. S.-financed fumigation operations. Only $145 million of Plan Colombia—a $1.3 billion, mostly military aid package approved in mid-2000 by President Clinton—is dedicated to crop substitution programs, and a coercive system of social pacts, designed to channel aid to peasants who agree to manually eradicate coca, has little credibility with local people.

In the southern department of Putumayo, where most of Colombian coca is produced, some 37,000 growers consented in 2000 to destroy their coca within six months after the arrival of financial assistance or face the fumigation of their fields with herbicide. Peasants soon discovered that financial assistance was either slow to arrive or never came, and by the end of 2001, the U.S. Agency for International Development had spent only 10 percent of what it had allocated for alternative development. To make matters worse, adhering to the terms of the government's pacts turned out to be no guarantee against fumigation.

The first round of aerial fumigation took place between December 24, 2000, and January 7, 2001, and, according to the U.S. embassy, it destroyed 30,000 hectares in the municipalities of Orito, San Miguel, and Valle de Guamuez. The Catholic Church, however, stated that coca represented only 15,000 hectares; the rest of the area was planted in food crops. In November 2001, spraying began again in San Miguel and Valle de Guamuez, even though little or no U.S. government aid had reached pact signers who remained in compliance with the eradication agreements.

The experience of one peasant whom I met in Putumayo reflected those of many others. This individual signed a pact along with 70 members of his community, but, because he never received the promised development aid, the man borrowed $12,000 to plant black pepper and offset the imminent loss of his coca. Then he stuck a white flag in the field to signal that the black pepper crop was legal. When the spray planes returned on November 24, 2001, they destroyed the entire pepper field as well as fruit trees, coffee bushes, cassava, corn, and pasture. All of this raises disturbing questions both about Washington's commitment to alternative development and about the real aims of its fumigation program in guerrilla strongholds.

A U.S. embassy official who requested anonymity told me that reducing the total area under coca cultivation—not alternative development—is the cornerstone of U.S. policy in Colombia. "It may be best that people simply abandon the area or make their own decisions about how to survive," he said. "People need to understand that the [U.S.] government absolutely will not tolerate coca cultivation." Yet since the fumigation operations began, coca cultivation has increased rather than decreased. In addition, a U. S.- trained counternarcotics force has been unable to dislodge the FARC from rural areas of Putumayo.

When confronted with evidence of food crop destruction, embassy officials explain that, although aerial spraying is supposed to be done from 30 feet up, the presence of guerrillas in Putumayo forces planes to 90 feet, which causes the herbicide to drift onto neighboring fields. But though drift may explain some of the damage, it does not account completely for the level of destruction in Putumayo. Independent Colombian and U.S. observers have reported the devastation of food crops that are far from coca fields. In these cases, one Colombian expert on alternative development notes, “the only explanation is that [fumigation] was intentional,” calculated to destroy peasant morale in areas under FARC control and displace them to other areas of the country. In fact, analysts and peasants alike conclude that displacement has long been a strategy, not an effect, of Colombia’s civil war. The fumigation campaign has unfolded in a context in which the Colombian government cannot defeat the guerrillas militarily and peace talks have collapsed.

Guerrillas control nearly half of the national territory, and last year alone, they repeatedly attacked an oil pipeline operated by Occidental Petroleum. For the U.S., protecting the supply of Colombian oil is especially important as conflicts in the Middle East worsen, and President Bush recently requested $98 million to train and equip Colombian counterinsurgency battalions who guard the pipeline. In addition, the administration’s $882 million “Andean Regional Initiative,” which was approved last December, earmarked 63 percent of the Colombia funding for military uses.

The portrayal of the FARC as international terrorist “evil doers” is simply the latest in a series of Washington’s label shifts. During the cold war, Washington defined the FARC as “communist subversives,” but this label became obsolete with the collapse of the Soviet Union and the expansion of the drug war in the 1990s, when U.S. propagandists deployed the more politically expedient term “narcoguerrilla” to delegitimize the rebels. Although today both the FARC and the other main guerrilla group, the National Liberation Army (ELN), benefit from coca production and processing, they do not control the major national and international drug trafficking networks.

Moreover, the narcoguerrilla concept blurs the social and political differences that distinguish the two guerrilla groups from the drug traffickers and from each other. It also obscures the involvement of the paramilitaries, sectors of the military, and members of the political establishment in the drug traffic. Since September 11, new portrayals of the FARC as an international terrorist organization have not been supported by evidence. Although guerrilla tactics against Colombian citizens and select foreigners working in Colombia expose the insurgents to charges of terrorism, the FARC's military operations beyond Colombian borders are restricted to occasional forays into the sparsely populated border regions of neighboring countries.

Equating the FARC with international terrorism creates a double standard with respect to other armed actors in the Colombian conflict. Washington policy makers say relatively little about the Autodefensas Unidas de Colombia (AUC), a federated organization of local paramilitary groups allied with the U. S-backed Colombian security forces. Although the State Department lists the AUC, along with the FARC and ELN, as a terrorist organization and agrees with human rights groups who blame paramilitaries for 70 percent of Colombia's human rights violations, U.S. policies largely ignore the AUC's links to the Colombian military, which uses the organization as an ally in the battle against leftists. The AUC is therefore relatively free to expand its power and to murder ordinary Colombians, as Bush's war on terror targets the FARC.

The U.S. should stop using the threat of terrorism to justify its involvement in counterinsurgency operations in Colombia. Colombia is in the middle of a complex civil war, and the Bush administration needs to recognize the differences between this 40-year-old domestic conflict and global terrorism.

 Chapter 17: The Price of Free Trade: Famine

Los Angeles Times, March 22, 2002

MARC EDELMAN

This article focuses on another part of Latin America undergoing rapid upheaval—Central America. Marc Edelman examines the negative impact of “free” trade agreements on the livelihood of farmers struggling to survive in an era of economic deregulation. International coffee prices are at forty-year lows, due largely to the World Bank’s promotion of coffee cultivation in Vietnam and Indonesia. This has led to a global glut that undermines the ability of millions of Latin American farmers to provide their families with an adequate cash income. At the same time, local markets have been flooded with U.S.-produced corn (which is heavily subsidized by taxpayers), making it unprofitable to cultivate the region’s most important subsistence crop.

The appearance of this article in March 2002 was especially timely, since the Bush administration was promoting the idea of a “Free Trade Area of the Americas,” designed to further lower tariff barriers in the region.

Increasingly, Central Americans face two choices: migrate or starve. Edelman’s piece may be read as a diagnosis of a steadily deteriorating situation in the United States’ own backyard.

Central America is in the grip of famine, and if President Bush mentions it when he visits El Salvador on Sunday, he will likely suggest that free trade is the solution.

Yet Bush’s proposed Central American Free Trade Agreement is hardly going to remedy the worsening disaster in rural Guatemala, El Salvador, Honduras, and Nicaragua. Unregulated markets are a large part of the reason why 700,000 Central Americans face starvation and nearly one million more suffer serious food shortages.

Hardest hit are coffee plantation workers and maize farmers. Coffee prices have spiraled downward since the 1989 collapse of the International Coffee Agreement, which assigned countries production quotas. In the past few years, prices plummeted further with a surge in exports from Vietnam and Indonesia, where the World Bank encouraged expansion of coffee acreage.

With the market glutted, many coffee farmers did not bother to harvest this year. The result has been evictions from plantation housing, increased migration to teeming slums, and severe hunger among unemployed coffee workers.

Maize farmers too have been feeling the free-market squeeze. Since 1992, Central America has had intra-regional free trade in grains and almost no tariff protection against low-cost imports. Forced to compete with highly subsidized U.S. farmers, many Central American farmers have abandoned food production, gone bankrupt, and lost their land.

Some of Central America's most conservative figures—Guatemalan President Alfonso Portillo and Nicaraguan Cardinal Miguel Obando y Bravo—acknowledge that the intensity and suddenness of the food emergency make it a famine, worse than the hunger characteristic of the region.

Famine is always rooted in economic policies and political decisions, as Amartya Sen, the 1998 Nobel Prize winner in economics, has long maintained. Sen also points out that famines do not occur in democracies, where contested elections and vigorous journalistic oversight force policy makers to try to prevent occurrences that might threaten constituents or allow opponents to make political hay.

U.S. policy makers should ask, then, what the widening famine says about Central American democracy, for which Washington spent billions of dollars and waged three proxy wars during the 1980s.

Apparently, the gap between rulers and ruled in the four affected countries is so large that policy makers feel little pressure to address the crisis. No wonder polls show that a mere 35 percent of Hondurans, 24 percent of Nicaraguans, 21 percent of Salvadorans, and 16 percent of Guatemalans say they are “satisfied” with how democracy functions in their countries.

Right now, tens of thousands of Central Americans are heading north. In contrast to the 1980s and early 1990s, most are not escaping war and repression. Many are abandoning farms that failed because of globalized trade and the dumping of U.S. grain. Others are fleeing liberalized interest rates so high that they have no hope of ever starting a small business. Still others are trying to escape life in the free trade zones, where factory owners enjoy huge public subsidies and workers face immense obstacles in organizing for a living wage.

Central American land could produce decent living standards for small farmers if they could obtain small-scale irrigation systems, better access to land, secure title to property, low-cost credit, and shelter from unfair competition and the ravages of global market forces.

These measures would give even the poorest of the poor a stake in their societies, but they would require elites to take popular needs seriously. Public sectors eviscerated by privatization and budget cuts can’t address the inequalities that globalization generates.

Rural Central Americans are already reeling after a decade or more of free-market reforms. President Bush’s trade proposals could be the knockout blow.

 Suggestions for Further Reading

<biblio>

Edelman, Marc

1992 The Logic of the Latifundio. Stanford: Stanford University Press.

1999 Peasants against Globalization: Rural Social Movements in Costa Rica. Stanford: Stanford University Press.

</biblio>

 Chapter 18: How Two Truths Make One Tragedy

The Independent, October 22, 2000

ALI QLEIBO

On September 27, 2000, Ariel Sharon, then leader the of the Israeli opposition Likud party, entered the Haram al-Sharif in East Jerusalem, the site of the gold Dome of the Rock that is among the holiest Islamic shrines. The esplanade is also revered by Jews, who call it the Temple Mount after a temple destroyed there in A.D. 70. When Sharon, who was protected by hundreds of Israeli riot police, descended nearly an hour later, he was met by Palestinians who heaved chairs, trash cans, and stones at the Israeli forces. The latter retaliated by firing tear gas and rubber bullets. Predominantly Arab East Jerusalem has been under illegal Israeli occupation since 1967.

Sharon’s unannounced visit provoked outrage on the part of Palestinians because of his leading role in the 1982 Sabra and Shatila massacres in the Palestinian refugee camps of Beirut, in which Lebanese militiamen—allied with and armed by the Israeli Defense Forces—killed more than 1,000 men, women, and children. At the time, Sharon was defense minister. Not surprisingly, his visit to the Haram al-Sharif sparked a spontaneous popular uprising that has now become known as the Second Intifada.

The following article, written by Palestinian anthropologist Ali Qleibo weeks after the beginning of the Second Intifada, examines the dilemma faced by Palestinians in the wake of escalating violence. His words speak of the extreme forms of everyday violence suffered by the people of the region, of hopelessness, despair, and courage.

As the violence continued last week, Palestinians could be divided into two groups—those who feel that if they don't fight they will be overlooked, and those who feel that to resort to violence is to undermine their human dignity.

But what is the same for all Palestinians is that they have sustained a major blow. Any sense of security they could have entertained has faded. "El-hamdillah ala Salamtak" ("Welcome back to safety") has replaced the more traditional greeting "Salaam aleik'um" ("Peace be upon you").

As people adjusted to the upheavals of the past three weeks they started to leave their houses. In a state of shock they wandered around, searching for familiar faces, reassuring themselves that life still went on, that our city was still there and that others had survived the disaster.

I remember the night, three weeks ago, after Ariel Sharon, the Israeli opposition leader, had visited the Muslim shrine, the Haram al-Sharif. Violence had broken out. I went into the old city to visit my neighbors. All my friends had survived the ordeal unscathed.

"Did you go and defend the Haram al-Sharif [Temple Mount]?" I asked. Ghassan, a friend and once an activist, said: "If Arafat needs martyrs, the politicians ought to send their own sons. I am happy my son is in medical school in Cairo. Before, I would gladly offer my children as martyrs. I would still offer them provided the leaders stand with their children next to us."

Everyone I knew faced things with disengaged interest. The "stone throwing" was seen as a political contrivance to prod the stalling peace talks. The news leaked out that the Israelis were planning to take over a part of the mosque as a synagogue. Danger threatened our Haram al-Sharif. The Palestinians split into two groups. As I waited in line to buy bread, I overheard a middle-aged man lecture a youth. “If we do not protect the Dome of the Rock,” he said, “who would?” The young man answered: “A good Muslim is one who does his Muslim duties and stays alive.” The older man explained: “This is not a question of nationalism, it is a matter of faith.” The young man retorted. “The Noble Sanctuary has a God to protect it.” Before the Oslo peace talks everyone would have rushed to the Noble Sanctuary. Most people I ran into had turned skeptical, suspicious of dubious politics, and apathetic.

At this critical point the picture of Mohammed el-Durrah came into the foreground. This was the boy whose father, trying to avoid the fighting at Natzarim, led him home from school through a short cut, only to get caught in the crossfire. The sight of the boy being shot dead hit a deep chord.

The Oslo agreement has actually made it worse for Palestinians, because it appeared to the outside world that we were enjoying peace. All that has happened is that Israeli occupation has become the status quo. Palestinians continue to suffer—they are harassed, their travel is restricted, their land confiscated, unemployment is high, salaries are low.

It was after the burial of one of the Palestinian martyrs that “the lynching” took place. Two Israeli soldiers were caught and it was immediately assumed that they were “Arabists”—Israelis who disguise themselves as Arabs and infiltrate the protesters, planting bombs, shooting, and killing. The soldiers were escorted to the police station past the funeral parade.

My friend Khalil was horrified. “It is not Muslim, it is not Arab, it has nothing to do with our culture,” he said. Victims to the mob, victims to corrupt leadership, victims to military occupation; blind hate triumphed momentarily.

Remorse followed. In Ramallah vigils have been held for the past two nights. Candlelit “peace parades” have taken place in which people walk mournfully past el-Manarah square. A voice mumbled: “But no one cares about our hundred martyrs. Settlers attack helpless farmers. Last week they stoned one to death.” Another voice answered: “It is our dignity as human beings that we must struggle for.”

Israeli occupation puts the Palestinian in a dilemma: if he is quiet he is overlooked; once he expresses resistance he is condemned.

 Suggestion for Further Reading

<biblio>

Qleibo, Ali H.

1992 Before the Mountains Disappear: An Ethnographic Chronicle of the Modern Palestinians. Cairo: Kloreus Books.

</biblio>

 Chapter 19: The Matrix of Control

Media Monitors Network, 2001 [[http://www.mediamonitors.net] [www.mediamonitors.net]]

JEFF HALPER

The following piece was written in the months following the second Palestinian intifada, which began in September 2000 in response to the provocative visit of Ariel Sharon to the Islamic shrine of Haram al-Sharif, in East Jerusalem (see Chapter 18). At the time, Sharon was leader of the Israeli right-wing opposition party.

In this piece, Jeff Halper describes the Israeli strategy of maintaining control over the West Bank and Gaza by means of a matrix of roads, checkpoints, settlements, waterways, and other barriers that segment the Palestinian territories. This matrix, he argues, is crucial to understanding why Palestinians are unwilling to accept Israel's offer to give back 94 percent of the Palestinians' pre-1967 borders—the 6 percent would effectively slice the West Bank and Gaza into a series of isolated islands, not contiguous territories.

Such an arrangement violates U.N. Security Council Resolution 242, which calls for an end to Israeli occupation of the West Bank and Gaza and the reestablishment of the pre-1967 borders between Israel and the Palestinian territories. Although Israel has not complied with this resolution, the United States currently provides the country with more than $3 billion annually in aid, most of which is used for military purposes.

The Japanese and East Asians have a game called Go. Unlike the Western game of chess, where two opponents try to defeat each other by taking off pieces, the aim of Go is completely different. You win not by defeating but by immobilizing your opponent by controlling key points on the matrix. This strategy was used effectively in Vietnam, where small forces of Viet Cong were able to pin down and virtually paralyze some half-million American soldiers possessing overwhelming firepower.

In effect, Israel has done the same thing to the Palestinians on the West Bank and Gaza and in East Jerusalem. Since 1967 it has put into place a matrix, similar to that of the Go board, that has virtually paralyzed the Palestinian population. The matrix is composed of several overlapping layers.

First is the actual physical control of key links and nodes that create the matrix of control—settlements and their extended “master plans”; a massive system of highways and bypass roads (including wide “sanitary” margins); army bases and industrial parks at key locations; closed military areas; “nature preserves;” control of aquifers and other natural resources; internal checkpoints and control of all border crossings; areas A, B, C, D, H-1, H-2, and much more. These define the matrix of constricted Palestinian enclaves and effectively divide them from one another. They also give Israel control of key nodes.

The second layer of the matrix is bureaucratic and legal—all the planning, permits, and policies that entangle the Palestinian population in a tight web of restrictions. These include political zoning of land as agricultural in order to freeze the natural development of towns and villages; a politically motivated system of building permits, enforced by house demolitions, designed to confine the population to its constricted enclaves; land expropriation for (solely Israeli) “public purposes”; restrictions of planting and the wholesale destruction of Palestinian crops; licensing and inspection of Palestinian businesses; closure; restrictions on movement and travel; and more. Although Israel is careful to present its policies as “legal,” in fact they are not. The failure to guarantee Palestinians the basic human rights provided by the Geneva Convention and other international covenants—upon which Israel has signed—is patently illegal. The extensive use of the Israeli court system, which invariably rules against Palestinians, as a means of controlling the local population makes a mockery of the link between law and justice. All these confine Palestinians to isolated cantons, control their movement, and maintain Israeli hegemony.

The third layer of the matrix involves the use of violence to maintain control over the matrix—the military occupation itself, including massive imprisonment and torture; the extensive use of collaborators to control the local population; pressures exerted on families to sell their lands; the undemocratic, arbitrary, and violent rule of the Military Commander of the West Bank and the Civil Administration. What Israelis know of this system they justify in terms of “security.”

The average Israeli has no concept of this matrix, and so for most Israelis "peace" means simply giving up the minimum territory that would "satisfy" the Palestinians and ending "terrorism." Average Palestinians are highly attuned to the presence of the matrix, since they hit up against it every time they move. But it is crucial to the achievement of a just and viable peace that the nature of the matrix as an integrated system of control be fully comprehended. The Palestinians can wrest 95 percent of the Occupied Territories from Israel, can oversee the dismantling of almost all the settlements, and can establish a recognized state, but unless they effectively dismantle the matrix of control a viable Palestinian state will elude them. It is not control of territory alone that is important; it is identifying and neutralizing the key nodes of the matrix.

The structure and workings of the matrix—and especially its controlling nodes—are subtle and require careful analysis. Some of its control points are obvious. The E-1 area of 13,000 dunums [41] between Jerusalem and Ma'aleh Adumim that was recently annexed effectively cuts the West Bank in two and is antithetical to any notion of a viable Palestinian state. Still, Barak apparently promised the National Religious Party that the order would not be rescinded, and not much protest to that has been voiced. Other nodes are less obvious. The Israeli-conceived road system of Jerusalem and the West Bank, for example, converges in the area of Ma'aleh Adumim. Even if the Palestinians gain control of the surrounding region but leave that one settlement, Israel simply has to declare Ma'aleh Adumim a "closed military area" in order to paralyze movement within any Palestinian entity. Even more subtle nodes of control exist elsewhere. Only a several-meter-wide strip between Ramallah and Bir Zeit, just enough for one Israeli military jeep, is sufficient for controlling movement in that area. A narrow Israeli strip between Bethlehem and Beit Sahour, as well as similar slivers all over the West Bank, contribute to the matrix of control.

Settlements are crucial to preserving the matrix, not so much because of the land they occupy, but because of the control mechanisms that necessarily surround them. Thus, while the settlements take up only about 1.5 percent of the West Bank, their master plans cover more than 6 percent. Add to that the supporting infrastructure of roads (bypass roads, conceived in Oslo as being only minor roads connecting settlements, have become a major mechanism of control), of industrial areas, of military installations and other "security" arrangements, of checkpoints and so on, and it becomes obvious that leaving a tiny yet strategically located settlement in place effectively nullifies the gaining of territory around it.

The only meaningful way to dismantle the matrix is to eliminate it completely. That means removing all the settlements from Palestinian territory, replacing closure and checkpoints by normal (and minimal) border arrangements agreed upon by both sides, and removing Israeli military presence to agreed-upon security points on the external borders, only for a limited period of time. But if this turns out not to be possible and an Israeli presence remains, it is imperative that it not constitute a matrix of control.

Understanding the matrix and its workings is critical for Palestinian success in the negotiations. The very gap between Israel and Palestinian map-making abilities and uses is worrying. As an Israeli who seeks a just and viable peace between our peoples, I hope the Palestinian negotiating team utilizes all the expertise at its disposal to avoid concessions that will in the end leave Palestine little more than a Bantustan.

[41] Equivalent to 13 square km.

 Suggestions for Further Reading

<biblio>

Carey, Roane, Jonathan Shainin, and Tom Segev, eds.

2002 The Other Israel: Voices of Refusal and Dissent. New York: The New Press.

Halper, Jeff

1990 Between Redemption and Revival: The Jewish Yishuv of Jerusalem in the Nineteenth Century. Boulder: Westview Press.

Said, Edward W. and Christopher Hitchens, eds.

1988 Blaming the Victims: Spurious Scholarship and the Palestine Question. London and New York: Verso.

</biblio>

 Chapter 20: After the Invasion: Now What?

CounterPunch, April 12, 2002

JEFF HALPER

As this book is going to press, it is clear that Halper’s words have accurately predicted the escalation of the conflict. The Israeli Defense Forces mounted bloody invasions of the West Bank and Gaza beginning in March 2002. Dozens of Palestinian suicide bombers retaliated with brutal attacks upon densely populated civilian and military areas. This article was written after U.S.-made Apache helicopters attacked Palestinian refugee camps in the towns of Jenin and Nablus, in March and April 2002. More than 50 Palestinians were killed in Jenin alone.[42] In July 2002, 15 people—nearly all women and children—were killed in a nighttime F-16 missile attack on a crowded Gaza apartment building.[43]

Two years after the beginning of the Second Intifada, approximately 2,000 Palestinians and 300 Israelis have been killed. There is no immediate end in sight to the Middle East crisis.

The fall of the Jenin refugee camp and the crushing of resistance in the casbah of Nablus, April 9—the twelfth day of the Israelis' final push to defeat the Palestinians—marks the end of yet another stage of the Palestinians' struggle for self-determination. On April 10, when Powell meets the Spanish president of the European Union, it will become clear whether the "political process" that must now emerge will lead to a viable and truly sovereign Palestinian state or to the dependent ministate Israel has had in mind since the start of the Oslo process in 1993.

This is an either-or situation; nothing can bridge the fundamental interests separating the two sides. The Palestinians, who have already agreed on a demilitarized and semisovereign state on only 22 percent of mandatory Palestine, must receive a state that is territorially coherent, economically viable, and in control of its borders and natural resources, with full access to Jerusalem and a meaningful degree of sovereignty. Israel, which needs a Palestinian ministate to "relieve" it of the 3 million Palestinian residents of the Occupied Territories who pose a threat to the "Jewish character" of the state, will not agree to relinquish control or to fully dismantle its infrastructure of settlements and bypass roads. It is determined to maintain its occupation in one form or another. Only one of these two options is possible: either a viable Palestinian state or a dependent Bantustan.

With the breaking of Palestinian resistance on April 9, Sharon would appear to have reasons to rejoice. The multipronged strategy of his "national unity" government to force the Palestinians to accept a Bantustan seems to have achieved its major goals:

1. A campaign of attrition has steadily eroded the Palestinians' ability to resist the occupation. The demolition of hundreds of Palestinian homes, massive expropriation of fertile farmland, a permanent economic "closure" that has imprisoned and impoverished the population, curfews and sieges lasting months, induced emigration of thousands of middle-class families, and the widespread use of collaborators to undermine Palestinian society have all taken their toll.

2. Massive military actions against the fragile Palestinian infrastructure and population centers using the most sophisticated and powerful of U.S. conventional weapons—F-16s, Apache helicopters equipped with laser-guided missiles, tanks and artillery—culminating in the current all-out invasion of Palestinian areas—are intended to beat the Palestinians into submissiveness. Although seemingly in response to Palestinian terrorist attacks and carefully cast as part of America's War against Terrorism, these military actions are proactive, exploiting terrorist attacks to achieve political goals of continued domination.

3. Delegitimizing Arafat, whom Sharon has called "our bin Laden," "irrelevant," and head of a "terror-sponsoring entity" (the Palestinian Authority), is essential if Israel is to install (with American help) a more "compliant" Palestinian leader who will agree to a ministate. Just as South Africa had to find African "leaders" that would lend legitimacy to their Bantustans, so must Israel find a Palestinian figure willing to be president of a ministate, thereby agreeing to and legitimizing Israel's control over most of the West Bank, Greater Jerusalem, and perhaps parts of Gaza.

4. Creating irreversible "facts" on the ground. While deflecting attention to its role as a peace-seeking "victim" of Palestinian aggressiveness, Israel never paused for a moment in expanding settlements and constructing its own infrastructure that would ensure its control over the Occupied Territories, even if a Palestinian ministate were to come into being. The vaunted Mitchell Commission's recommendations of freezing Israel's settlements have already been rendered irrelevant. Israel has all the land, settlements, and settlers it needs. Once it completes the construction its 480 kilometers of highways and bypass roads linking the settlements while creating massive barriers to Palestinian movement—a $3 billion project entirely funded by the United States—its hold on the Occupied Territories may be irreversible.

[[r-j-roberto-j-gonzalez-anthropologists-in-the-publ-5.png]]

5. Reliance on the American Congress to protect Israel from those forces—European, Arab, international (member states of the U.N.)— who would pressure it to dismantle its occupation completely in the interests of a viable

Palestinian state. The uncritical support of Congress is Israel's trump card; it provides it with an impenetrable shelter from outside pressures. The U.S. administration may (only may) press for a meaningful political process following Israel's suppression of Palestinian "violence," but Congress will ensure that it be an open-ended process of negotiations lasting years. At best, Israel strives for interim agreements rather than a final status settlement, for these will preserve its de facto control over the Occupied Territories.

Will Israel succeed? Sharon thinks so. He believes that Europe, critical as it might be, has no independent foreign policy apart from the U.S. The Arab countries have some limited clout—the U.S. will press Israel to make concessions so that the Arabs will submit to an attack on Iraq—but those concessions will stop far from a complete end to the occupation. Both Israel and the Arab world know Congress's "red lines" on Israel, and they fall much closer to a Palestinian ministate than to a viable and truly sovereign one.

Still, it is up to us, the international civil society of NGOs, faithbased organizations, political groups, human rights advocates, and just plain world citizens, to monitor the fateful period we are now entering. April 10 begins our test. Having shed the naïveté of Oslo, we must follow the upcoming political process with eyes wide open and critical. Our goal must be to see a viable, sovereign state emerge in all the Occupied Territories (giving the Palestinians the right to negotiate border adjustments and other compromises they see fit). Unlike Oslo, the political process must have a just peace—a viable Palestinian state and a just resolution of the refugee issue, as well as Israel's security concerns—as its explicit goal. And it must have a binding timetable.

In the Oslo process and during the past year and a half of Israeli repression, the international community let the Palestinians down. It did not insist on negotiations that would lead to Palestinian selfdetermination (after seven years of negotiations, the Palestinians ended up confined to tiny, impoverished islands while Israel doubled its settler population). And it did not provide the protection and support available to the Palestinians through international law, according to which the occupation was illegal, unjust, and immoral in every respect. One cannot criticize an oppressed people's resort to armed resistance—even terrorism—when it finds itself abandoned by the international community that offers its only source of redress. We must not again allow occupation, repression, and violence to overwhelm the progress towards a just peace as we have over the past decade. It is truly time to end the occupation.

[42] See Justin Huggler, “Jenin: The Camp That Became a Slaughterhouse,” The Independent, April 14, 2002.

[43] See John Kifner, “Gaza Mourns Bombing Victims,” New York Times, July 24, 2002.

 Chapter 21: If U.S. Dumps Test Ban Treaty, China Will Rejoice

Los Angeles Times, July 29, 2001

HUGH GUSTERSON

The Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty (CTBT), negotiated in the mid-1990s, completely prohibited the testing of all nuclear weapons. Bill Clinton signed the treaty in September 1996 and although the Senate refused to ratify it, the United States has abided by its terms.

Under the presidency of George W. Bush, the future U.S. commitment to the terms of this treaty is uncertain. During the 2000 presidential campaign, Bush repeatedly voiced his opposition to CTBT, and in the months following his inauguration he continued to express criticism of the treaty.

In this commentary, Hugh Gusterson argues that if the United States buries the CTBT, China, Russia, India, and Pakistan are likely to use this as a pretext to accelerate the development and testing of their own nuclear stockpiles. Gusterson, who was an antinuclear activist in the 1980s, did field research in the town of Livermore, California, the site of a nuclear weapons development facility.

The prescience of the piece is extraordinary in light of recent events. In 2001, the Bush administration commissioned a study to determine how quickly mothballed Nevada nuclear test sites could be made operational. Then, in March 2002, the Los Angeles Times reported that a “Nuclear Posture Review” had been prepared by administration officials, which among other things advocated the development of new, low-yield “bunker-busting bombs” with nuclear warheads.

At approximately the same time, the conflict between India and Pakistan over the Kashmir region led many to speculate that a nuclear war might be within the realm of possibility in South Asia. Although the tension eased somewhat in the summer of 2002, critics argue that a nuclear confrontation still threatens the region.

According to recent news reports, President Bush is looking for ways to bury the Comprehensive Nuclear Test Ban Treaty (CTBT) and has directed the nuclear complex to move into a higher state of readiness for a nuclear test. Chinese President Jiang Zemin and hardliners in his government must be getting ready to break out the champagne, since no country stands to gain as much from a resumption of testing as China— except perhaps Russia, India, and Pakistan. The country with the most to lose is the United States.

When the CTBT was being negotiated in the mid-1990s, some Pentagon officials and scientists within the U.S. nuclear-weapons complex pushed for a treaty that would allow small nuclear tests of a few hundred tons. The Russian and Chinese delegations to the test-ban talks also wanted a treaty that permitted some testing: China wanted to exempt “peaceful” nuclear explosions (for canal and dam construction); the Russians wanted a treaty that allowed tests of a few hundred tons, thinking that this would make it easier to ensure that their aging nuclear weapons still worked and to maintain expertise at their nuclear-weapons laboratories.

After an extensive interagency debate, the U.S. government decided to hold out for a complete test ban. The U.S. concluded that it was much easier to verify such a ban than a treaty that permitted, say, 200-ton but not 300-ton tests. U.S. defense officials also decided that, with 1,030 nuclear tests under its belt (versus 715 by the former Soviet Union and 45 by China), the U.S. had a well-tested and reliable nuclear stockpile that could not be greatly improved. The U.S. feared that further nuclear testing might enable other countries to catch up and hoped that a global ban on nuclear testing would be a daunting obstacle to countries seeking to develop anything but the most primitive and unreliable nuclear weapons. This decision, endorsed by the Joint Chiefs of Staff, was made not by starry-eyed antinuclear idealists but by hard-headed realists in the defense bureaucracy, who saw a test ban as in the vital interest of the U.S. Retired Gen. John Shalikashvili, former head of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, was commissioned by the White House last year to reevaluate that decision. He concluded that “an objective and thorough net assessment shows convincingly that U.S. interests, as well as those of friends and allies, will be served by the treaty’s entry into force.”

Conservative critics of the test ban treaty say that it prevents us from knowing if our weapons still work. While it is true that detonating a weapon provides the most literal assurance that a weapon works (or did until it was destroyed by the test), such tests were infrequent even in the heyday of nuclear testing, when they were mainly used to validate improvements to the arsenal. However, as part of a bargain within the defense bureaucracy, the Clinton administration replaced nuclear explosive testing with a handsomely funded program for simulated testing and nondestructive surveillance of the stockpile. This Stockpile Stewardship and Maintenance Program currently receives about $5 billion a year. No other country’s nuclear-weapons establishment comes close to this.

When the CTBT was negotiated, the Russians and the Chinese grumbled that it put the U.S. at an unfair advantage because its nuclear test experience and top-of-the-line simulation technology would enable it to care for its nuclear stockpile while theirs crumbled.

If the U.S. kills the CTBT, Russia and China will be able to test again. This will make it easier for the Russians, who cannot match the U.S. weapons stewardship program, to ensure that their poorly maintained weapons work and to train a new generation of weapons scientists. It will also make it easier for the Chinese, who currently have only single-warhead missiles, to perfect new missiles with multiple warheads. These will, of course, be a valuable asset against the Bush administration's cherished ballistic missile defense system.

Meanwhile, India, which tried to block the CTBT in the United Nations in 1996, would also welcome a resumption of testing. India's 1998 tests revealed design flaws in its hydrogen bombs, and Indian scientists are eager to test again to find out whether they have succeeded in correcting these flaws. If India tests, Pakistan will follow.

If the U.S. resumes nuclear testing, it will also run the risk of being perceived as what it likes to call a rogue state. When France broke its self-imposed testing moratorium in the early 1990s, it was surprised to find itself the target of protests and boycotts all over the world. President Francois Mitterand hurriedly cut short the series of tests. One of the reasons the five official nuclear powers agreed to surrender nuclear testing in the mid-1990s is that the Non-Proliferation Treaty of 1970— one of the few arms control treaties the Bush administration has not attacked—committed them to "pursue negotiations in good faith on effective measures relating to cessation of the arms race at an early date."

By 1995 the nonnuclear powers, running out of patience, were threatening not to extend the Non-Proliferation Treaty indefinitely without a test ban. In exchange for their extension of the treaty, the nuclear powers made a commitment to end nuclear testing. It would be no small thing to renege on this commitment.

Finally, a resumption of nuclear testing could well reawaken a sleeping giant at home—the domestic antinuclear movement. The Reagan administration's intensification of the arms race in the 1980s brought hundreds of thousands of people into the streets of New York City for a protest in 1982—the largest street demonstration in American history. On a single day the same year, 1,300 people were arrested for civil disobedience at one of the three nuclear weapons laboratories in the U.S. Does the Bush administration want to return us to those days?

If the Bush administration buries the CTBT, it will enable the Russians, the Chinese, the Indians, and the Pakistanis to narrow the gap between their nuclear stockpiles and ours, it will exacerbate international perceptions that the U.S. government lectures others on their behavior while doing as it pleases, and it threatens to unleash social unrest at home. This is a high price to pay for being a little more certain that the greatest nuclear arsenal on earth is still reliable.

 Suggestion for Further Reading

<biblio>

Gusterson, Hugh

1996 Nuclear Rites: A Weapons Laboratory at the End of the Cold War. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press.

</biblio>

* Part III: Prelude to September 11

 Chapter 22: Cut Off the Arms Flow and Let Afghans Unite

Los Angeles Times, February 15, 1989

ASHRAF GHANI

In January 1989, the Soviet army retreated from Afghanistan following a bitter ten-year war to defend the country's communist government against Afghan resistance groups. Many of them were armed by the U.S.-backed Pakistani intelligence agency. Also supported by the Pakistani and Saudi governments were the mujahedeen or "holy warriors," radical Muslim fighters who had come from dozens of countries to drive out the Soviets. Among them was Osama bin Laden, who would spend much of his time in Afghanistan seeking to spread Wahhabism.[44] In 1986, CIA director William Casey personally went to Afghanistan to review the mujahedeen groups who had been supplied with American-made Stinger antiaircraft missiles and trained by U.S. advisers.[45] This war—essentially a Cold War conflict between the Soviets and U.S. mercenary armies—left the country in shambles, with millions of Afghans in dire need of humanitarian aid.

In this commentary Ashraf Ghani, a native of Afghanistan who studied and taught anthropology in the United States before his appointment as Afghan finance minister in 2002, implored the Bush administration to discontinue arms shipments to the region, which was rapidly slipping into political chaos. He also strongly recommended that the United States and United Nations initiate a process of political and economic reconstruction—advice which was effectively ignored.

Ultimately, Ghani's warnings proved to be prophetic.Warring factions terrorized the country for the next five years. Then, at the end of 1994, a radical Islamic organization emerged—the Taliban. Their triumph was due in part to continued military support from U.S.-backed Pakistani intelligence. By 1996 they gained control of the major Afghan cities and ruled the country for the next five years.

The Soviets have left Afghanistan, making the collapse of the besieged puppet regime in Kabul just a matter of time. President Bush has a unique opportunity to define a positive agenda for the future of that country, yet for now he has chosen to merely affirm that the United States will continue to supply the Afghan resistance with military assistance.

Rather than additional means of destruction, the Afghan people are most in need of constructive measures. The Bush Administration could insist that the Afghan people be given the right to self-determination and take the initiative by channeling future economic assistance only to a government so freely chosen. By doing so, it could help thwart blatant Pakistani and Iranian attempts at determining the future of Afghanistan and at fanning the flames of civil war.

The Afghan people have no desire that the United States micromanage their politics. Rather, they wish that the United States would stop colluding with the Pakistani generals in choosing the cast of political actors and writing the script for the future of their country.

Over the years Washington has been entrusting Pakistani military intelligence with the distribution of more than $2 billion in military and financial aid and with the allocation of Stinger missiles to the Afghan resistance.

As long as the Soviet army was occupying their country, Afghan refugees had no choice but to accept the price exacted by Pakistan. Pakistani generals not only insisted on picking seven individuals acceptable to them to act as leaders of the resistance based in Pakistan; they also considered it their privilege to decide how and when to favor any of these groups. Local leaders inside Afghanistan, in need of arms and money, had no choice but to declare affiliation with one of these parties. The departure of the Soviet forces, however, frees the resistance inside Afghanistan from this dependence. Should a legitimate interim government emerge, one reflecting the aspirations of the Afghan people and committed to the reconstruction of the country, the commanders are likely to support its authority.

But the situation as it stands now finds Islamabad frantically trying to give its seven-party alliance the mantle of legitimacy by convening a consultative council, or shoora.

Simultaneously, Tehran is adding a sectarian dimension to the already intricate balancing act by demanding a significant role for eight Shiite parties that are based in Iran. Reports filtering out from inside Afghanistan also tell of Pakistani generals who have been urging resistance commanders to attack the cities, regardless of the bloodbath and the chaos that are sure to ensue. Only the restraint shown by commanders of the resistance has thus far prevented the execution of these plans.

In the absence of an interim government truly representative of the Afghan people, there is no incentive for the peaceful surrender of Kabul and other cities still in the hands of the Soviet-backed regime. Nearly three million civilians, locked in besieged Kabul and already on the brink of starvation, are sure to suffer tremendous losses should the encircling resistance groups attack the capital.

Surely the slaughtering of civilians of Kabul is not what the Bush administration wants its “kinder, gentler America” to contribute to.

There is still time for Bush to act decisively by delaying any shipment of arms and clearly supporting a political solution. The President can call for a referendum under the auspices of the United Nations—a logical choice following the Geneva Accords of last April that made the withdrawal of the Soviet forces possible. The referendum would be held simultaneously in Pakistan, Iran, and the parts of Afghanistan that are free of the Soviet-backed regime.

Such a referendum would ascertain the relative weight of each of the 15 pro-Pakistani or pro-Iranian parties, as well as that of independent groups or leaders. It would allow the emergence of a responsible and accountable leadership that the Afghan people could call their own.

After all, let us not forget that, aside from the nine years of Soviet occupation, Afghanistan can boast of nearly 300 years of recorded history of self-rule. And, as one resistance commander has been quoted by Western correspondents, there can be no compromise on “liberty, dignity and honor.”

If Washington ceases to view Afghans as mercenaries in its anti-Soviet crusade, it might be able to understand their longings for independence, peace, and prosperity.

[44] Wahhabism is a strict and austere form of Islam within the Sunni tradition. It was begun by Abdul Wahab (1703–1792) as a movement to curb the influence of Sufism among the Arab Bedouin, but beginning in the 1970s its spread became an important part of Saudi foreign policy.

[45] See Ahmed Rashid, Taliban: Militant Islam, Oil, and Fundamentalism in Central Asia (New Haven: Yale University Press, 2000), p. 127.

 Suggestions for Further Reading

<biblio>

Ghani, Ashraf

1987 “The Afghan State and Its Adaptation to the Environment of Central and Southwest Asia.” In Soviet-American Relations with Pakistan, Iran, and Afghanistan, edited by Hafeez Malik, pp. 310–33. New York: St. Martin’s Press.

1993 “Gulab: An Afghan Schoolteacher.” In Struggle and Survival in the Modern Middle East, edited by Edmund Burke III, pp. 336–351. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press.

Rashid, Ahmed

2000 Taliban: Militant Islam, Oil, and Fundamentalism in Central Asia. New Haven: Yale University Press.

</biblio>

 Chapter 23: U.s. Can Strengthen African Ties in Wake of Terrorism With Aid, Clear Policies

Harrisburg Patriot-News, August 24, 1998

JAMES MERRYMAN

On August 7,1998, two car bombs exploded outside of U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania. Nearly three hundred people died (nearly all of them Africans) and approximately five thousand were injured in the two blasts. Several months later, investigators concluded that operatives linked to Osama bin Laden had probably orchestrated the attacks.

In this piece, anthropology professor James Merryman (who was in Kenya at the time of the bombings) argues that the “Africans are the major victims, not the cause,” of the attacks. He suggests that U.S. officials provide emergency assistance and continue to promote Africa’s economic development as a way of preventing further instability.

In spite of Merryman’s advice, the Clinton administration responded to the embassy attacks by sending U.S. warplanes on bombing raids in August 1998 to destroy a factory in Sudan and terrorist training camps in Afghanistan. It was alleged that bin Laden operatives were producing chemical weapons at the factory site. The buildings were, in fact, an important pharmaceutical complex that produced medicine for the Sudanese people. Later it was revealed that the United States had no conclusive evidence that chemical weapons had been produced there.[46]

The United States has an obligation to assist Kenya and Tanzania to repair the physical damage to their respective capitals following the insidious terrorist attacks on the U.S. embassies in those East African countries. The U.S. also needs to continue short-term economic and medical aid to the residents impacted by the terrorists' violence.

Following President Clinton's historic visit to Africa, the United States has a unique opportunity to make good on its promises of support. Failure to do so will undermine U.S. credibility and subvert our attempts to work closely with African governments elsewhere to increase U.S. embassy security and ensure the welfare of Americans living abroad in Africa.

The U.S. can have a more secure diplomatic presence and create a productive business climate only by cultivating the best possible relations with each host country in Africa.

Although the Cold War with its ideological struggle for Third World minds has ended, the global community will not allow the U.S. to comfortably slip back into isolation. The mantle of singular superpower means that Africa's problems are not easy for us to avoid, be it the debacle of intervention in Somalia or suffering condemnation by world opinion for refusing early intervention in the genocidal bloodbath of Rwanda.

Economically, Africa holds vast resources including the world's largest reserves of gold and diamonds and a wide array of exotic metals vital to aerospace and information technology. Africa has more than a halfbillion potential consumers of American products at a time when our Asian export markets are weakening.

There are major opportunities for U.S. investment in Africa, along with an increasingly well trained workforce. These potentials, however, can only be realized in the context of political and economic stability. U.S. interests are served by a secure Africa.

Both Tanzania and Kenya have maintained uninterrupted civilian rule since gaining their independence and stand in stark contrast to the model of anarchic civilian rule and the jack-booted oppression of military regimes played out across the continent. Although the U.S. has maintained largely positive relations with Kenya and Tanzania, the political ambience of U.S. foreign policy with the two countries has been mixed over the past 35 years.

U.S.-Kenya relations have been strained in recent years in response to America's persistent insistence on Western-style multiparty elections and linking that position to levels in U.S. economic aid to Kenya. There is growing political unrest, coupled with a runaway population growth rate that has not kept pace with economic growth.

Tourism, based on Kenya's abundant wildlife and majestic scenery, has long been the country's main foreign exchange earner. However, Kenya's position as Africa's premier safari center has eroded due to a somewhat deserved reputation for "iffy" political stability and increasing personal security problems due to regionally unchecked highway banditry and growing bands of urban thieves and hooligans.

Unfortunately, the bombings will undoubtedly have an additional negative impact on tourism, at least in the short run.

In all fairness to Kenya and Tanzania, the U.S. must make its message clear. Africans are the major victims, not the cause, of these atrocities. The terrorists, having inflicted their damage, are unlikely to strike again in these two locations.

The U.S. has a major role to play in promoting Africa's development. Supplying appropriate interim aid to sustain stability in Kenya and Tanzania is a vital piece of this development.

As Americans we owe this much to the 200-plus Africans killed and 5,000 injured for merely being there as innocent bystanders on the battlefield of America’s global war with terrorism.

[46] See Seymour Hersh, “The Missiles of August,” New Yorker, October 12, 1998, pp. 34–41. See also Tim Weiner and James Risen, “Decision to Strike Factory in Sudan Based on Surmise,” New York Times, September 21, 1998.

 Chapter 24: Egyptians Don’t Like Saddam, but...

Austin American-Statesman, January 14, 1991

ROBERT FERNEA

On August 2,1990, Iraq’s armed forces invaded and occupied Kuwait, a small country rich in oil reserves.

Although the U.S. government had maintained exceptionally friendly relations with Iraqi president Saddam Hussein throughout the 1980s—even after he ordered Iraqi troops to use poison gas against Kurdish people in his own country in 1988—the invasion of Kuwait dramatically changed the relationship.

In the tense months that followed, the U.N. Security Council passed resolutions giving Iraq until January 15, 1991, to withdraw from Kuwait. Otherwise, “all necessary means” would be used to ensure compliance. Hussein ignored the resolutions. In the meantime, the Bush administration assembled a coalition of thirty-three countries for military operations, including Saudi Arabia, which allowed the United States to construct military bases on its soil for the first time. (This outraged many Muslims, since Mecca and Medina—both in Saudi Arabia—are Islam's two holiest sites.) On January 17, the U.S.-led coalition attacked Iraq and the first Gulf War had begun.

The following commentary was written by Robert Fernea shortly after a failed January 9, 1991, meeting in Geneva between U.S. Secretary of State James Baker and Iraqi Foreign Minister Tariq Aziz. Fernea, with more than forty years of experience working in the Middle East, gives insight into why many people in the countries of the region feel enmity toward the United States. In particular, he draws attention to the fact that U.S. support for Israel's invasion and occupation of the Palestinian territories—actions which violate U.N. Security Council resolutions—contrasts sharply with the condemnation of Iraq's invasion and occupation of Kuwait.

The collapse of peace talks in Geneva has left my friends here in Egypt convinced that there will be a war between Iraq and, principally, the United States. However, their attitudes toward this vary, just as they have varied toward the gulf crisis since its outset.

Especially among younger Egyptians, a feeling of wanting to get on with a change of the status quo outweighs the more cautious outlook typical of the older generation, who fear the unforeseeable consequences of an armed conflict in this region. Among Egyptians of all ages, the more optimistic see a war ending quickly; the less optimistic are not so sure.

Perhaps these feelings are shared by many Americans.

It may be more difficult for Americans to appreciate how successful Saddam Hussein's repeated attempts to link the gulf crisis with the Palestinian-Israeli conflict have been in this part of the world.

Over and over again, editorial writers and Egyptians of all ages and walks of life point out that while the United States has rushed to the aid of Kuwait, an undemocratic state with an elitist government, we have refused to pressure Israel to follow the many United Nations resolutions unfavorable to Israel's perceived interests. The Gaza Strip and the West Bank, plus the more recently acquired Israeli security zone in southern Lebanon, are all seen by Arabs to be illegal occupations, basically no different from the Iraqi occupation of Kuwait.

Iraq is not popular in Egypt. Many thousands of expatriated Egyptians suffered directly from the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait.

Nevertheless, enmities between Egypt and Iraq are between fellow Arabs, who feel they have a common reason for complaint about Western policies toward the long-standing Arab-Israeli conflict. The old Middle Eastern saying, “My brothers against my cousins, but my brothers and cousins against the world,” should be borne in mind in this regard.

As the likelihood of war increases by the hour, one also thinks of the story about Pandora’s box; what miseries will be released upon the world if the lid is removed from armed conflict by our failure to find a peaceful solution to the present crisis? Will America and the West find itself standing against the whole Arab world? Will Christians and Jews end up pitted against Muslims—everywhere?

So here in Cairo, many hope that President Bush might be flexible about agreeing to discuss all the territorial disputes in the Middle East in return for Saddam’s departure from Kuwait.

The Arab-Israeli conflict has gone on nearly a half-century. Thousands of lives have been lost and the normal course of human lives interrupted. Surely the United States could be responsive to the desire for peace in the Middle East without making a hero of Saddam and without going to war.

 Suggestions for Further Reading

<biblio>

Fernea, Elizabeth Warnock

1969 Guests of the Sheik: Ethnography of an Iraqi Village. New York: Doubleday.

Fernea, Elizabeth Warnock, and Robert Fernea

1985 The Arab World: Personal Encounters. Garden City, N.J.: Anchor Press/ Doubleday.

Fernea, Robert

1970 Shaykh and Effendi: Changing Patterns of Authority among the El Shabana of Southern Iraq. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.

</biblio>

 Chapter 25: Gravesites —Environmental Ruin in Iraq

Depleted Uranium Education Project, ed., Metal of Dishonor, 1997

BARBARA The first Gulf War ended with a full Iraqi retreat from NIMRI AZIZ Kuwait followed by a cease-fire that went into effect on February 28, 1991. In this 1997 commentary, anthropologist and radio journalist Barbara Nimri Aziz focuses on the environmental and human costs of the war. Depleted uranium munitions fired by U.S. tanks and warplanes have irradiated cities and the countryside, and seem to have triggered a chain of diseases including leukemia, cancers, and birth defects. The release of toxic chemicals has also contributed to these problems. And the destruction of Iraq’s infrastructure (including sources of fresh water and hospitals) has also made it more difficult for Iraqis to stay healthy.

Strict economic sanctions imposed by the United Nations in August 1990 soon took a devastating toll on the country. More than one million Iraqis died as the result of the sanctions, which blocked the importation of vital medicines such as chemotherapy drugs and agricultural inputs.

As this book goes to press, Iraq is gripped with the devastation of a second Gulf War, which has left thousands of civilians dead and many others in dire need of humanitarian aid. In addition, U.S. and British forces used depleted uranium shells in March and April 2003, according to reports.[47]

The chain of death created by the [1991] Gulf War is a scary thing. I'm not talking about black skies over the blazing oil wells of Kuwait, or charred remains of soldiers on the sand, or the incinerated families who had sought protection in a bomb shelter. Those are familiar images of death, recognizable, and however painful, they are finite. With the end of hostilities, they disappear.

The really scary part comes later—now—when we find that things which looked alive are really dead or doomed.

I refer to a chain of deadly pollution, the kind that creeps up on us, first with vague complaints, then with the persistence of strange illnesses, then with more testimonials of similar symptoms. We slowly recognize that disparate efforts which first appear unrelated are, in fact, connected.

We have the sickening sense of something spreading, without limits, of something embedded so deep within the system that it's unreachable. Our inquiries are met with denials. So, to begin, all we seek to do is confront it. We just want to stand on the gravesite as if it were a known, finite place.

This is our feeling, I think, as we hear more and more documentation regarding Gulf War syndrome and its link to the use, by the Pentagon, of depleted uranium weaponry during the 1991 war.

Evidence is mounting, and those soldiers who find themselves stricken are growing in number, networking and uniting in a swelling movement of people who refuse to accept government disclaimers that these soldiers might be the victims of some new dangerous materials the Pentagon used. A public movement to ban depleted uranium is growing and attracting more media attention in the U.S.

Many Iraqis were killed outright by the weapons that blew apart their vehicles and their bunkers. Those who survived the onslaught and fled must have ingested and carried with them the fumes and toxic dust created by the bombardments. There is also the uranium waste—three hundred tons of it, according to reports—left on the battlefield.

Today the entire population of Iraq is besieged by diseases. We know that waterborne parasites and bacteria and malnutrition in Iraq are responsible for many recognizable diseases, and for wasting and death. But what about reports of a sharp rise in spontaneous abortions, cancers, and other “new diseases”? The Iraqi Ministry of Health is systematically documenting some of these health problems. Dr. Siegwart Guenther of the Austrian Yellow Cross International is also studying evidence of possible Gulf War syndrome inside Iraq and the high incidence across the country of abnormal births.[48]

 Iraqi Scientists Most Concerned about Radiation

Those most concerned about radiation and other kinds of pollution are Iraqis. Their entire population is probably afflicted. And essential empirical evidence of strange illnesses in the Iraqi population is being gathered by their own scientists. Iraq still has a highly trained community of biologists, environmentalists, energy specialists, cancer researchers, etc., most of whom earned advanced degrees in the U.S. or Great Britain. With access to the entire country, they are capable of conducting the needed research.

Until the embargo and war, these scholars were in the international scientific community; they published widely and they took part in international scientific gatherings.

Because of the embargo, however, their careful on-site work and their disturbing findings are not as widely known as they should be, partly because these men and women are now denied professional contact with their peers overseas and are therefore unable to offer comparative statistics and work together with concerned scientists worldwide to find solutions and recommend treatments.

This is happening when health and environmental conditions inside Iraq are deteriorating, and bad conditions generated by the war are spreading, creating a catastrophe of accelerating proportions and unknown ramifications.

The Pentagon, which has been trying so hard to suppress information about the extent, occurrence, and possible source of Gulf War syndrome among its own personnel, would doubtless want to keep any Iraqi source silent on this matter as well. Even a scientist researching the hazardous effects of the war finds herself or himself effectively blocked from reporting important relevant findings.

Dr. Huda Ammash is one of those Iraqi scientists who should be speaking to her international colleagues. She is presently an environmental biologist and professor at Baghdad University, having undertaken graduate studies in the U.S. where she obtained her Ph.D. from the University of Missouri.

Working with governmental departments of agriculture, health, and environment, Ammash is now undertaking research in Iraq. When I met her in 1995, she kindly shared her report with me. She is most concerned with the enormous energy emission and light energy from the massive bombing in the forty days of war in 1991 and the resulting ionization.[49]

“We know that ionization causes radiation,” she said. “It is now diffused throughout the entire airspace of Iraq and has likely spread to our neighbors as well, possibly as far north as the southern border of Russia.”

Dr. Ammash calculates that “the prolonged effect of this ionization is, over a period of more than ten years, equal to one hundred Chernobyls.”

Dr. Ammash and others note that “an outbreak of meningitis in children concentrated in one Baghdad locality is highly unusual and may be a manifestation of high ionization levels. It has never been seen in Iraq before and, under the circumstances of the embargo, Iraq can provide no immunization against it.” She notes the alarm among doctors she interviewed who report that “99 percent of the victims of this disease are children.” Ammash accumulated reports that show cancer increasing at rapid and abnormal rates; child leukemia is especially rampant, with some areas of south Iraq showing a fourfold rise in these few years. Breast cancer in young women (age thirty and under) is also many times higher than in 1990 in certain parts of Iraq.

In addition, the Iraqi environment is subject to a mass of other chemical and microbial pollutants released into the atmosphere because of indirect results of the war. Ammash points out, for example, how “damage to bombed and crippled industrial plants resulted in the leakage of millions of liters of chemical pollutants—black oil, fuel oil, liquid sulfur, concentrated sulfuric acid, ammonia, and insecticides—into the atmosphere. Fumes created by the bombardment of more than 380 oil wells produced toxic gases and acid rain.”

Bombardment of chemical factories damaged their gas purification units and thus created tremendous air pollution as well. If these filters can’t function, dangerous gases are allowed to escape from cement factories. Up to the present, the imposition of sanctions prevents the repair of these industrial filters. Untreated heavy waters from industrial centers are the media for growth of microbes, mainly typhoid, malta fever, and other pathogenic bacteria.

Ammash also reports fourteen crop diseases—including covered smut, sazamia moth, yellow crust, spickulated drought disease, gladosporium disease, and epical bent—which were never before recorded in Iraq's history. These are now infecting date trees and citrus trees.

When I arrived back in Baghdad, I followed up my research in Mosul with discussions with agriculture officials and with visits to small, local farms engaged in mixed agriculture. I spoke with experts at the Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO), a U.N. agency in Baghdad since before the [1991] Gulf War. Their mandate is to assist any nation to increase its food production, and they are trying to help Iraq in this area. Now, more than ever, with food unobtainable from abroad, Iraq is obliged to reverse its rather neglected agricultural policy with active food production schemes. Since the imposition of the embargo, Iraq has been trying to do so, bringing more land under grain production and improving irrigation.

 Iraq Could Be Self-Sufficient

FAO officials were unequivocal about prospects. "Iraq could be selfsufficient in grain," said director Amir Khalil. "It has the water; it has the land; it has the expertise." Yet, despite efforts and the growing food crisis, production was declining. Why?

For agriculture experts and farmers alike, the explanation is simple: "No herbicides, no pesticides, no fertilizer, no improved seed." The animal husbandry and poultry situation is as severe as the grain crisis. Without vaccines and other medicines, all of which Iraq cannot furnish itself, animals —like people and plants—cannot survive.

According to a 1995 FAO report, dairy herds had gone down 40 percent since 1990. Before the war, dairy cows numbered just over 1.5 million; by 1995, their number fell to only 1 million. Water buffaloes suffered an even worse fate, and goat herds have declined from 1.3 million to fewer than a quarter of a million. Iraq's poultry system with 106 million hatching hens was virtually wiped out overnight by the bombing when electrically run poultry sheds across the country—8,400 units— shut down. Without vaccines and specialized, treated food, moreover, hens cannot survive long.

Why this devastation? Largely because agricultural imports, all essential in food production in any modern state today, are unavailable.

If we are to believe FAO's own reports, it seems that another weapon in this cowardly secret war is the denial of agricultural essentials—a kind of sabotage—to ensure Iraq cannot become food self-sufficient.

It is ominous that it was also during my field research in a farming community that I found the first shocking evidence of a little discussed plague in the human population.

In the course of extended conversations with local farmers after my inspection of the fields, we spoke about social life. One farmer remarked that marriages were fewer now. "Why?" I asked. The answer was straightforward. "Young people fear the birth of malformed fetuses and stillbirths." How was this?

"We look around our village," they said. "Everyone knows couples in the village who had deformed babies in the last four years."

With the help of these farmers and the local schoolteacher, I took an ad hoc survey. They had 160 houses here, and among these they counted 20 households where malformed babies had been born. My hosts noted that most of the fathers of these stillborn and abnormal births in their village are men who served in the army during the [1991] Gulf War. They noted many spontaneous abortions, but we did not include these. I had heard in Baghdad that more spontaneous abortions are reported across the country now than were before 1990.

The Iraqi Ministry of Health could not provide me with any statistics about this development at that time. But my inquiries at five hospitals (in Mosul, Baghdad, and Kerbala) revealed that the number of abnormal births recorded in hospitals had dramatically increased. Recalling their personal experience, all doctors with whom I spoke estimated they see ten times more such births today than five years ago. One doctor in Mosul said she saw two cases a year before 1991; she now sees four or five cases a month. The symptoms?

“Babies born without ears, without eyes, without limbs or with foreshortened limbs, without formed genitalia, with cleft palate, clubfoot, enlarged heads.” One doctor reported her first knowledge of a case of congenital leukemia.

 “How Can I Have Any Plans?”

A professor of poultry science had accompanied us to the fields in Mosul. From seeing how he walked and stood, I already suspected he himself was unwell. Nevertheless, I inquired about his plans for further research. I still remember the bewildered look on his face when I asked him this.

“Plans? Madam,” he said softly, “I am trying to feed my family; I am looking for medicine for my ill father. How can I have plans?”

I asked Dr. Ammash the same question. “It is difficult for anyone to have a plan,” she quietly explained. “You have a plan when you have a settled situation—known circumstances. We don’t have that anywhere in Iraq. My immediate plan is to provide tomorrow’s means for life for my children, to help my students into another successful day. After that, I don’t know.”

[47] See Neil Mackay, “U.S. Forces’ Use of Depleted Uranium Weapons Is ‘Illegal,”’ Sunday Herald (Scotland).

[48] For information on depleted uranium and its effects, see Siegwart Horst-Guenther, “How DU Shell Residues Poison Iraq, Kuwait, and Saudi Arabia,” in Depleted Uranium Education Project, ed., Metal of Dishonor, 2d ed. (New York: International Action Center, 1997). See also Akira Tashiro, Discounted Casualties: The Human Cost of Depleted Uranium (Hiroshima: Chugoku Shimbun Press, 2001).

See also La Guerre Radioactive Secrete [Invisible War: Depleted Uranium and the Politics of Radiation], February 2000; Martin Meissonier, director; Paul Moreira, executive producer. A film produced by Canal+ and available at <[[http://www.canalplus.fr/emissions/90mn/contact.asp][www.canalplus.fr/emissions/90mn/contact.asp]]>. U.S. distributor: Damacio López, 1322 Lopezville, Socorro, NM 84801; tel.: 505-838-0263; e-mail: [[mailto:idust@sdc.org][idust@sdc.org]].

[49] See Huda Ammash, “Toxic Pollution, the Gulf War, and Sanctions,” in Anthony Arnove, ed., Iraq under Siege (Boston: South End Press, 2000), pp. 205215, and Barbara Nimri Aziz, “Targets, Not Victims,” in Anthony Arnove, ed., Iraq under Siege (Boston: South End Press, 2000), pp. 161–170.

 Chapter 26: U.N. Should Act to Protect Muslim Women

Newsday, April 13, 1998

FADWA The civil war that has gripped Algeria for more than EL GUINDI a decade has claimed more than a hundred thousand lives, mostly civilians. Since its independence from France in 1962, the country has been ruled by a single party, the National Liberation Front (FLN). By the mid-1980s an opposition group, the Islamic Salvation Front (FIS), had appealed to Algerians unhappy with the incompetence and religious repression imposed under FLN rule. By the early 1990s, the FIS had gathered a wide base of popular support.

The FIS's popularity pressured the country's leadership to reform the political process, and in 1993 Algeria's first democratic multiparty elections were held. When it was apparent that the FIS would win parliamentary elections, military and secular elites ousted the president, annulled the elections, banned the FIS, and declared a state of emergency. Then the country descended into a spiral of violence from which it has yet to emerge.

Although the Algerian government claimed that operatives from the FIS and the radical Armed Islamic Group (GIA) were responsible for terrorist attacks, massacres, and atrocities, it consistently refused to allow U.N. observers entry into the country to investigate these claims until mid-1998. Human rights groups report that Algerian security forces are responsible for much, if not most, of the violence.

In the following article Fadwa El Guindi appeals for the United Nations and United States to act quickly to improve the Algerian situation. She focuses on the atrocities committed against Muslim women.

Lamentably, the situation has not improved appreciably since the time this commentary appeared. According to a recent Amnesty International report, "A human rights crisis continues to blight Algeria. The number of people killed each month by the security forces, state-armed militias and armed groups in the context of the armed conflict remains shockingly high. Reports of torture and ill-treatment by the security forces—including of women and children as young as 15—continue to be... widespread, even though the climate of fear in the country means that reported cases may represent only the tip of the iceberg." [50]

By 1993, the Islamic Salvation Front had galvanized a wide and popular Algerian base of support and was expected to win elections. The Arab street, a popular and growing force of public opinion and nonmilitant resistance, had expressed desire for political change.

Had the will of the people been allowed to take its course democratically, the world would have seen a different political landscape in Algeria.

Instead, more than 60,000 people have reportedly died in the civil war between the government and the Islamic opposition since the voided 1993 election. In more recent developments, many innocent Algerian civilians in villages—mostly women and children—have been killed in brutal attacks blamed on Islamic groups. There is a clear need for human rights groups and the United Nations to take active roles in seeking to halt such atrocities. The United States has a responsibility to ease regional tensions that contribute strongly to the local instabilities by, for example, putting pressure on Israel to comply with peace agreements and U.N. resolutions. It must also end sanctions against Iraq, which have caused human suffering and bitterness in the region.

For members of Islamic groups to engage in senseless brutalities contradicts patterns of resistance consistent throughout the Arab world among similar organizations. It is also contrary to common sense. After all, the victims in Algeria’s case are the attackers’ own mothers, sisters, wives, and daughters. Why should Islamic groups challenging local undemocratic regimes and simultaneously destabilizing postcolonial forces unleash their anger on their own families? In the past six years, more than 3,700 women were killed in Algerian attacks, including massacres of villagers. Many women, kidnapped and raped, have subsequently been found dead with their throats cut. These brutalities confused observers and analysts of Arab politics.

Rape is an ultimate violation designed to break Muslims by dishonoring their families and humiliating Muslim men. This was the case in the Serbian attacks on Bosnians. But these rapists were considered “enemies from outside the Islamic fold.” It makes no sense for groups whose identity de guerre is Islamic to rape their own Muslim women, whatever the nature of the conflict. And, in the case of Algeria, Muslims around the world dissociated themselves from these un-Islamic brutalities and violations of sanctity.

The questions remain, however: Who is doing this? And why? Recent reports by the U.S. State Department, Amnesty International, and Human Rights Watch implicated Algerian security forces in systematic torture, arbitrary arrests, and summary executions.

The Algerian government has consistently refused to allow an international committee of inquiry access to the country to investigate human rights abuses by both sides in the civil war. The reason is likely that such an investigation will prove embarrassing to the Algerian government.

The gravity of the violations can be explained in cultural terms. In traditional Arab culture, the family is the center around which the sociomoral universe exists. Women are the center of the family's sacred identity and the guardians of the Arab family's honor and reputation. Motherhood is considered sacred. Nationhood is expressed in "motherland" terms. The Arabic words for women, household, and sacred sanctity are close derivatives of the same root.

To undermine or attack the Muslim woman destabilizes the core of the sociomoral system. The Arab-Islamic judicial system long recognized rape as a serious crime that received capital punishment—at a time when rape in America was considered sex, not crime. That is precisely why those at war with Muslims and trying to break them choose the path of raping and killing Muslim women. A cultural strength, Islam's placing women at the heart of sacredness is turned into a grave human rights violation in times of conflict and crisis. These are not random acts. They are systematic, racist, and sexist, and they violate international human rights.

Whether these brutalities are by insiders or outsiders, the world organizations entrusted with protecting human rights and lives must intervene. Just as in Bosnia, the world cannot remain a spectator. The raping of Muslim women must be entered as a crime tried in international tribunals.

Western feminist groups, which on short notice become activated over issues of whether Muslim women have the right to drive cars, unveil, or join the workforce, must now demonstrate compassion for the more serious issue of brutal raping and butchering of Muslim women.

This is particularly significant since the strong destabilizing factor underlying such crises comes from a poorly conceived U.S. foreign policy that consistently underestimates the role of the Arab street and is too static to adjust flexibly to the emergent political (Islamic) landscape in the region.

[50] See Amnesty International Document MDE 28/009/2002 (April 19, 2002). Online version at <http://web.amnesty.org/ai.nsf/Index/MDE280092002?OpenDocument&of=COUNTRIES/ALGERIA>.

 Suggestion for Further Reading

<biblio>

El Guindi, Fadwa

1999 Veil: Modesty, Privacy, and Resistance. Oxford and New York: Berg Publishers.

</biblio>

 Chapter 27: Women Under the Taliban

Dateline (Australia) March 14, 2001

In March 2001 the Taliban provoked widespread outrage when they sent fighter planes to destroy two colossal statues of Buddha in Afghanistan’s

Bamiyan province, approximately one hundred miles northwest of Kabul. One of the statues, thought to have been constructed in the seventh century A.D. (during Central Asia's pre-Islamic era), measured more than fifty meters high.

In the following interview, Zieba Shorish-Shamley, anthropologist and executive director of the Washington, D.C.-based organization Women's Alliance for Peace and Human Rights in Afghanistan, notes that the destruction of the statues was a loss to humanity, but so too are the Taliban's human rights violations against women and ethnic minorities. Women in particular have become "ghosts" in their own country.

In the late 1990s, Shorish-Shamley persuaded the Feminist Majority to organize a petition drive to garner support for Afghan women living under the Taliban regime. Her efforts eventually helped to pressure the Clinton administration to take a tougher stance against the Taliban, who were once unconditionally accepted by most U.S. policy makers.

The destruction of two stone Buddhas in Afghanistan this week has cast new light on the Taliban regime which now claims control of 90 percent of the country. While thousands of people have been killed in more than 20 years of war in Afghanistan, it seems that no single act has so outraged the world community. Even fellow Muslims have condemned the destruction of the Bamiyan Buddhas as not sanctioned by the Koran. Ironically, it has taken this very public and defiant act of cultural vandalism to draw new attention to the plight of the Afghans themselves.

JANA WENDT: Zieba Shorish-Shamley, there has been an international outcry over the Taliban's destruction of the Bamiyan statues. As someone who's been working for women living under the Taliban, what did you make of all this attention?

ZIEBA SHORISH-SHAMLEY: I think the attention is great in the sense that as an anthropologist, obviously I care a great deal for our national heritage and historical artifacts.

However, I think the world and the international community should have had an outcry such as this when a lot of ethnic people were massacred by the Taliban about two or three times, as well as thousands of Afghan women that have died, and are dying under the Taliban rule because they're not allowed to work, they're not allowed to have equal access to the health care system, and they're virtual prisoners in their own society under the Taliban rule.

I think the genocide and the culture of genocide and human rights violations and war crimes, crimes against humanity—all of this goes together, and the word "outcry" should include all of those atrocities as well.

JW: You've been working for women's rights for a long time. Why do you think that these statues have suddenly captured the imagination and harnessed the outrage of the world?

ZSS: The outcry is because these Buddhas, or the statues, did not belong just to the Afghan people. They belonged to humanity. Afghanistan has been the crossroad of Asia, and during the time of the Silk Route many cultures went through there, so destroying them and denying humanity and future generations such beautiful, irreplaceable works of art is a crime against mankind, humankind.

JW: I wonder if you can give me a brief picture of the life of a woman today under the Taliban.

ZSS: A woman, an Afghan woman, today under the Taliban rule is voiceless, an invisible nonbeing, and does not have the most basic rights that are necessary for human existence. The Afghan women have become ghosts, shadows, and cannot participate in the public sphere of their society. And although they are the majority of the Afghan population, they have no voice.

So they are prisoners, they are virtual prisoners, and most of them are dying —hundreds of times we have appealed to the world, and it seems that the world doesn't hear their cries and their voices. So Afghan women's condition is the most horrible that you can think of or can imagine. That is the [plight of the] Afghan woman.

JW: Is there any way that the world attention to the Bamiyan statues may help you to press the point of women's human rights inside Afghanistan?

ZSS:... My organization, Women's Alliance for Peace and Human Rights in Afghanistan, has called for a tribunal. We want an international tribunal to be formed by the U.N. and to bring the Taliban and other criminals that commit war crimes, crimes against humanity, genocide—cultural genocide—to justice.

However, the issue has to be pushed, and that is why we are appealing to all the people of the world to write to their governments, to urge their governments to put pressure on the U.N. to form this tribunal, an international tribunal, and to find a solution and end the misery of Afghan people. They have been going through this for 23 years of war, and instead of it getting better, it is getting worse and worse, and now under the Taliban rule...itis the darkest moment in the Afghan people's life and history.

JW: Zieba Shorish-Shamley, I appreciate your time this evening.

ZSS: Thank you so much for giving me the opportunity to bring the voices of my suffering people to the people of Australia.

 Chapter 28: Follow the Oil Trail —Mess in Afghanistan Partly Our Government's Fault

Pacific News Service, August 24, 1998

[[http://www.pacificnews.org][www.pacificnews.org]]

WILLIAM O. BEEMAN

In this commentary, anthropologist and Pacific News Service contributor William O. Beeman eloquently traces the complex connections between the 1998 terrorist bombings of U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania (see Chapter 20), the rise of the Taliban regime in Afghanistan (see Chapters 19 and 24), Osama bin Laden, and the economics of oil. He analyzes how pipeline politics in the Caspian Sea—one of the world's richest oil regions—is driving U.S. foreign policy in Central Asia. Beeman's piece is both a critique of American Realpolitik and an appeal for U.S. policy makers to seriously consider the roles played by religion and ideology in the world of politics.

We must face the fact that if President Clinton is right about who bombed our embassies in Tanzania and Kenya, the action came in part as the result of the muddled actions of our own government.

The story is worthy of a Tom Clancy novel.

It is no secret, especially in the region, that the United States, Pakistan, and Saudi Arabia have been supporting the fundamentalist Taliban in their war for control of Afghanistan for some time. The U.S. has never openly acknowledged this connection, but it has been confirmed by both intelligence sources and charitable institutions in Pakistan.

Given U.S. rhetoric regarding the Middle East, the Taliban would seem to be strange partners. They are a brutal fundamentalist group that has conducted a cultural scorched-earth policy for Afghanistan. They have committed atrocities against their enemies and their own citizens—according to extensive documentation. So why would the United States support them?

Middle Easterners understand. As the ancient saying goes, “The enemy of my enemy is my friend.” In Afghanistan the dominant ethnic groups are the Pushtuns, who spill over the border into Pakistan, and the Tajiks, whose language is a form of Persian. The Pushtun Taliban have virtually eliminated their Tajik opposition, which had been heavily supported by Iran. And so, according to this line of reasoning, the United States—as an enemy of Iran—must be a friend of the Taliban.

[[r-j-roberto-j-gonzalez-anthropologists-in-the-publ-6.png]]

But this does not fully explain why the United States would support such a group—or for that matter why Pakistan, itself a fundamentalist Islamic state, would risk the wrath of Tehran’s religious government. The answer to this part of the question has nothing to do with religion or ethnicity—but only with the economics of oil.

To the north of Afghanistan is one of the world’s wealthiest oil fields, on the eastern shore of the Caspian Sea in republics formed since the breakup of the Soviet Union. Here, U.S. oil companies are involved in a boom larger than any in the last 40 years in this region. Untold wealth is at stake—but it depends on getting the oil out of the landlocked region through a warm-water port.

The simplest and cheapest route is through Iran. This route is favored by all oil companies, because it involves building a short pipeline and then transshipping the oil through the existing Iranian network.

The U.S. government has such antipathy to Iran that it is willing to do anything to prevent this. An alternate route would go through Afghanistan and Pakistan—but this would require securing the agreement of the powers-that-be in Afghanistan.

From the U.S. standpoint, the way to deny Iran everything is for the anti-Iranian Taliban to win in Afghanistan and agree to the pipeline through their territory. The Pakistanis would also benefit from this arrangement—which is why they are willing to defy the Iranians.

Enter Osama bin Laden, a sworn enemy of the United States living in Afghanistan. His forces could see that the Taliban would eventually end up in the American camp. Thus his bombing of U.S. embassies in East Africa (there are none in Afghanistan) was accompanied by a message calling for Americans to get out of “Islamic countries.” By this he meant specifically Afghanistan.

The U.S. response was to bomb bin Laden’s outposts while carefully noting that his forces were “not supported by any state.” This statement is an attempt to rescue the Taliban relationship, while sending Taliban leaders the message that they must ditch bin Laden. American missiles also took out a factory in the Sudan, but that was only a smokescreen.

Now matters are really in a mess. Iran has actually issued a statement supporting the U.S. actions. The Taliban are angry, and American citizens across the globe are now the targets of the most fanatical of Islamic militants. The U.S. may even lose control of the pipeline.

Every time the United States attempts one of these slick back-door deals, U.S. citizens get burned. Our foreign policy community never seems to learn that religion and ideology are as strong a force in this region as money or guns.

We underestimate these factors every time, and this gets us in trouble every time.

* Part IV: Anthropological Interpretations of September 11

 Chapter 29: Our Legacy of War

Chronicle of Higher Education, September 28, 2001

CATHERINE LUTZ

In the 1990s Catherine Lutz conducted anthropological research in Fayetteville, North Carolina, near Fort Bragg, one of the largest military bases in the United States. Her work has focused on the effects of militarism at home, and in the book Homefront she notes that the United States has been in a permanent state of war for most of the last century—although rarely has this been visible to most Americans since World War II.

Now, as she argues in this response to the attacks of September 11, the war has finally come home.

Although I was deeply saddened and angered by the horrific events of September 11, I was not shocked, because in the decade I have spent studying American society and its military, I have learned that we have already been in a permanent state of war since the late 1930s. Mainly outsourced to the global south since 1945, this war has now come home to roost.

While this long war has sometimes drawn on elevated ideals like antifascism, more often it has been carried on in the name of stability for any regime that would don an anticommunist mantle and allow American business access, hiding a rotten core of systematic terrorism against its own people, often with our weapons and training. Those terrorists were labeled realists, and the long reign of nuclear terror by the Soviet Union and the United States—who together took aim at millions of people in skyscrapers and hovels—was called defense, or even peace. Its architects were called men of honor.

This new war that President Bush has declared can draw on the decades-long public-relations campaigns intended to convince us that the larger the American arsenal, the safer we are, and on the idea that war elevates moral character in its supporters.

[[r-j-roberto-j-gonzalez-anthropologists-in-the-publ-7.png]]

But my research has shown me that many American soldiers and veterans are not nearly so sure. Some have been among war's most ardent critics, and some remain soul-wounded and attached to each other in fellowships of affliction. Their experiences will never match the rhetoric and safety of the elites now planning a conflagration.

As Bush talks about hunting the terrorists from their holes, and begins to elide terrorists and whole populations, I am reminded of the racial hatred that has preceded, stoked, and been inflamed by nearly every one of the twentieth century's wars. But over the past several days, hope has overtaken my pessimism as I've talked with students. So far, they have refused the simplicities and the vengefulness of the voices on television, whose framing devices overwhelmingly ask when and where the United States will strike, not how that could possibly accomplish a safe future.

Instead, students are questioning and seeking meaning in these events. The instructor of one class I attended as a guest speaker described how angry she was at the perpetrators and asked people to say if they were, too. Many hands went up along with mine, but when asked why, their reasons were many and nuanced. One was angry that the New York and Washington victims had not been protected (despite a $300 billion military budget), another that human beings continue to stoop to violence, another that her world had lost its security. While the administration has reduced all this into a single feeling, with one swift sword attached, those students' thoughtful, passionate varieties of anger are openings to reflection, learning, and a response more ethical than indiscriminate force.

The parallel of this day of infamy is not Pearl Harbor—in 1941, a colonial outpost in a once-sovereign Hawaiian nation. It is 1947, when a new kind of war was also declared, via executive orders and the National Security Act—a war, it was said, in which the enemy would no longer fight in the open, a war requiring the sacrifice of some freedom and principle. It gave birth to McCarthyism, to slaughters in places like Vietnam and Guatemala; and it took the fruits of our labor and our children.

The perpetrators of this latest terror should be identified in an open process and imprisoned. If one is Osama bin Laden, send the international police for him, and pick up Henry Kissinger and Augusto Pinochet on the way home. The weeping, surviving families of New York, Washington, Chile, Haiti, South Africa, the Somme, Ukraine, Cambodia, and Vietnam call us to bring their murderers to account, not to send legions more to join them in their grief.

 Suggestions for Further Reading

<biblio>

Lutz, Catherine

1984 Micronesia as a Strategic Colony: The Impact of U.S. Policy on Micronesian Health and Culture. Cambridge: Cultural Survival.

2001 Homefront: A Military City and the American Twentieth Century. Boston: Beacon Press.

</biblio>

 Chapter 30: Local Horror/global Response

Chronicle of Higher Education: Colloquy, September 2001 [[http://www.chronicle.com][www.chronicle.com]]

This article, written days after the September 11 attacks, reflects the horror and outrage felt by many Americans in the aftermath of the tragic events of that day. But the authors—most of whom are affiliated with the anthropology program at City University of New York—are also critical of the “erroneous policies and practices” of the United States around the globe.

This is a difficult time for those of us who are deeply critical of U.S. military, financial, and commercial policies and practices around the globe. There is, we categorically insist, nothing, absolutely nothing, in those policies and practices that would even remotely justify the insane horror unleashed in the United States on September 11. We share the sense of shock, outrage, sadness, and anger felt in New York and Washington, around the country, and across the globe.

By the same token, there is nothing in these horrendous events to justify the continuation, let alone the intensification, of erroneous policies and practices. The catalog of flaws that have for so long distressed us still stands. The callous disregard shown by U.S. financial and commercial interests for global poverty and suffering; the militarism that backs authoritarian regimes wherever convenient to U.S. interests; the broad indifference (widespread throughout the U.S.) to the death and suffering inflicted on repressed, marginalized, or minority populations around the globe; the insensitivity of U.S.-led globalization practices to local cultures, interests, and traditions; the failure to act to prevent genocidal practices (in Rwanda, for example); the disregard for environmental degradation and resource depletion; irresponsibly selfinterested behavior with respect to a wide range of international issues such as missile defenses, global warming, AIDS, and labor rights; the use of international institutions such as the IMF and the World Bank for partisan U.S. political purposes; and the shallow and often hypocritical stances with respect to human rights—none of these can be justified by last week’s events.

We wish to reaffirm our critical postures with respect to all such issues no matter how difficult it may be to articulate them freely in these times.

The sheer horror and insanity of what happened last week is a crushing burden on rational thought and reasoned action. Signs of distinctively American brands of zealotry and fanaticism, of ethnic scapegoating, of authoritarianism to the detriment of basic freedoms and civil liberties, abound. Such trends must be resisted. It is also our fervent hope that the righteous wrath and indignation felt around the country (understandable sentiments which we share) might mature into serious reflection on how to make the world a decent habitation for all, how to make real democracy work everywhere, how to make freedom mean something more than freedom of the market, and how to create a more egalitarian and caring world characterized by justice, tolerance, diversity, and love.

This, far more than any amount of saber rattling and military action, is, surely, a far more constructive way to secure a safer and juster world for our children.

 Suggestions for Further Reading

<biblio>

Asad, Talal, ed.

1973 Anthropology and the Colonial Encounter. London: Tavistock. Harvey, David 2000 Spaces of Hope. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press.

2001 Spaces of Capital: Towards a Critical Geography. London: Routledge.

Owen, Roger, and Talal Asad, eds.

1983 The Middle East. New York: Monthly Review Press.

</biblio>

 Chapter 31: A War Our Greatgrandchildren Will Be Fighting—Understanding Osama Bin Laden

Pacific News Service, September 14, 2001 [[http://www.pacificnews.org][www.pacificnews.org]]

WILLIAM O. BEEMAN

This piece by William O. Beeman was among the first anthropological commentaries that appeared nation ally in the wake of the September 11 attacks. Based upon his research on the Middle East, terrorism, and U.S. foreign policy, he succinctly outlines why bin Laden and his associates might have been involved in orchestrating the attacks, and describes the structure of their organization. He suggests that the brutality of the acts of September 11 is an indication of the level of anger and frustration generated abroad by U.S. actions that restrict movements for self-determination in other parts of the world. By drawing examples from Saudi Arabia, Israel, and the Palestinian territories, as well as other countries, Beeman outlines some of the possible motives for the attacks.

The United States risks a severe miscalculation in dealing with the destruction of the World Trade Center and the attack on the Pentagon on Tuesday.

This event is not an isolated instance of violence. This is not an act of war. It is one symptom of a cancer that threatens to metastasize. The root cause is not terrorist activity, as has been widely stated. It is the relationship between the United States and the Islamic world. Until this central cancerous problem is treated, Americans will never be free from fear.

Merely locating and hunting down a single guilty party in this case will not stop future violence: Such an action will not destroy the organization of terrorist cells already established throughout the world. Of greater importance, it will do nothing to alleviate the residual enmity against America that will remain at large in the world, continuing to motivate violence.

The perpetrators of the first attack on the World Trade Center, in 1993, were caught and convicted. This did not stop the attack on Tuesday.

The chief suspect is the Saudi Arabian Osama bin Laden or his surrogates. He has been mischaracterized as an anti-American terrorist. He should rather be thought of as someone who would do anything to protect Islam.

Bin Laden began his career fighting the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan in 1979, when he was 22 years old. He has not only resisted the Soviets but also the Serbians in Yugoslavia. His anger was directed against the United States primarily because of the U.S. presence in the Gulf region, more particularly in Saudi Arabia, the site of the most sacred Islamic religious sites.

According to bin Laden, during the [1991] Gulf War, America coopted the rulers of Saudi Arabia to establish a military presence in order to kill Muslims in Iraq. In a religious decree issued in 1998, he gave religious legitimacy to attacks on Americans in order to stop the United States from occupying the lands of Islam in the holiest of places. His decree also extends to Jerusalem, home of the second-most sacred Muslim site, the al-Aqsa Mosque.[51]

The depth of his historical vision is clear when, in his decree, he characterizes Americans as crusaders, harking back to the Medieval Crusades, in which the Holy Lands, then occupied by Muslims, were captured by European Christians.

He will not cease his opposition until the United States leaves the region. Paradoxically, his strategy for persuading the United States to do so seems drawn from the American foreign-policy playbook. When the United States disapproves of the behavior of another nation, it turns up the heat on that nation through embargoes, economic sanctions, or withdrawal of diplomatic representation.

In the case of Iraq following the Gulf War, America employed military action, resulting in the loss of civilian life. The State Department has theorized that if the people of a rogue nation experience enough suffering, they will overthrow their rulers or compel them to adopt more sensible behavior. The terrorist actions in New York and Washington are a clear and ironic implementation of this strategy against the United States.

Bin Laden takes no credit for actions emanating from his training camps in Afghanistan. He has no desire for self-aggrandizement. A true ideologue, he believes that his mission is sacred, and he wants only to see clear results. For this reason, the structure of his organization is essentially tribal-cellular, in modern political terms. His followers are as fervent and intense in their belief as he is. They carry out their actions because they believe in the rightness of their cause, not because of bin Laden’s orders or approval.

Groups are trained in Afghanistan, and then establish their own centers in places as far-flung as Canada, Africa, and Europe. Each cell is technologically sophisticated, and may have a different set of motivations for attacking the United States.

Palestinian members of his group see Americans as supporters of Israel in the current conflict between the two nations. In the Palestinian view, Ariel Sharon’s ascendancy to leadership of Israel has triggered a new era, with U.S. government officials failing to pressure the Israeli government to end violence against Palestinians.

Palestinian cell members will not cease their opposition until the United States changes its relationship with the Israeli state. The mujahedeen fighters in Lebanon also direct their hostility against Israel and the United States. They also operate against the Maronite Christian community in their own country, who were supported by the French from World War I until the end of World War II. They will not cease their operations until the region is firmly in Islamic hands.

Above all, Americans need to remember that the rest of the world has an absolute right to self-determination that is as defensible as our own. Despicable acts of mayhem such as those committed in New York and Washington are a measure of the revulsion that others feel at our actions that seemingly limit those rights. If we perpetuate a cycle of hate and revenge, this conflict will escalate into a war that our greatgrandchildren will be fighting.

[51] Also known as Haram al-Sharif (see Chapters 18–20).

 Chapter 32: What Have the 9/11 Investigators Overlooked?

Christian Science Monitor, July 11, 2002

JANET MCINTOSH

In May 2002, reports surfaced indicating that the FBI, the CIA, and members of the Bush administration failed to “connect the dots” regarding specific clues and warnings which might have prevented the September 11 attacks. In this commentary, Janet McIntosh argues that the administration also suffers from a “lapsed ability to see the global political landscape from any perspective” outside its own—that is, ethnocentrism. Based on her research and experience in a predominantly Muslim area of Kenya, she suggests that each act of hypocrisy, false denial, or fabrication made by U.S. officials can potentially fan the flames of terrorism.

McIntosh's article implies that the ongoing international "war on terror," focused on disrupting terrorist plots, is a short-term palliative likely to exacerbate anti-U.S. sentiment over the long run.

Last month, we heard quite a furor about how the FBI and CIA failed us in the months leading up to September 11. How, like children wielding a dull crayon, they failed to "connect the dots." Congress is probing; the media is probing; even Egypt and Britain claim that they warned the U.S. about terrorist attacks. And now the government is gearing up for a new federal information clearinghouse: the freshly empowered and consolidated Department of Homeland Security.

While pundits consider the nuts and bolts of such a proposal, we seem to have forgotten that the administration was ill informed, not only about the means of terrorism, but about one of the deepest motives behind it.

The USA is widely loathed, but our leaders never fully grasped that before last September. Shortly after the attacks, President Bush claimed to be "amazed" that anyone hates America, because "I know how good we are." This naïveté is a failure of "intelligence"—not the kind the FBI and CIA specialize in, but a lapsed ability to see the global political landscape from any perspective outside one's own.

My own exposure to such alternative perspectives was painfully enhanced during my fieldwork as an anthropologist in East Africa. I happened to be living in a Muslim area of coastal Kenya in 1998 when the U.S. embassies were bombed in Nairobi and Dar-es-Salaam. The FBI swarmed to the Muslimized areas of the coast, eventually arresting a man (Mohammed Sadiq Odeh) who had circulated through the same towns, even the same apartment buildings, where I did my research.

The vast majority of my Muslim Swahili friends and acquaintances would never dream of committing such vicious acts and were sorry for the loss of life. At the same time, however, a conspiracy theory began to billow through the community: the United States, through a CIA operation, had willfully obliterated its own embassies in order to have an excuse for open season on Muslims. President Clinton's subsequent bombings of a pharmaceutical company in Sudan and an Al Qaeda training site in Afghanistan (back when Al Qaeda was not so infamous) merely confirmed my friends' impression that Muslims worldwide were victims of a capricious American bully.

Conspiracy theories, it turns out, were hardly new to them; several Swahili men bolstered their case by showing me a photocopied letter ostensibly written by then British prime minister John Major to his Foreign Office minister, Douglas Hogg, in 1993. In the letter, Major describes colluding with the United States and other Western nations to ensure that the Muslim population are "totally displaced" from Bosnia-Herzegovina to prevent the emergence of a "possible Islamic state in Europe." These harsh prescriptions, he writes, emerge from a "real-politic [sic]" based on a broader European "Christian-Civilization and ethic [sic]."

At first, I was maddened by what I saw as the paranoid slant of these narratives, and I argued vigorously against them. I pointed out the wild exaggerations and near-hilarious grammatical solecisms in the "John Major" letter that clearly indicate it wasn't penned by an elite Englishman. I argued that while the CIA is hardly a compassionate body, it would never cost the U.S. so much financial damage and inconvenience only to justify Clinton's haphazard retaliatory gestures. My friends were unmoved. Why?

Conspiracy theories say a lot about their perpetrators. They are weapons of the weak, usually circulated by subordinate groups who feel oppressed. They don't require evidence to make the rounds; what they need is perceived plausibility. My Swahili friends pointed to the scores of children who have died in Iraq because ofU.S. sanctions. They pointed to Western media bias that favors Israel over Palestine and even to the sixteenth-century Portuguese destruction of Muslim towns on the East African coast, a historical moment that stands, to them, as a synecdoche for Western/Christian hostility.

They are knowledgeable about world history (even if such knowledge is marred by bias and fear), well connected to Muslim communities in other nations, and, as a result, highly suspicious of the United States government. The conspiracy theory surrounding the embassy bombings seemed like one way of saying: We may not have direct evidence for our claim, but judging from your track record, you might well have done it.

President Bush might be baffled by such accusations, but they are a potent symptom of the low regard in which our country is held. I wonder, furthermore, if our future attackers are aggrieved, not only by U.S. political actions, but also by the failure of our country to validate their feelings of oppression. Dare I say, in fact, that the despicable final videotape of Daniel Pearl contains a vital clue about terrorism that has been overlooked.

Pearl's murderers force him to say that he had come to a new understanding of their point of view, and to compare his anguish in captivity to that of the prisoners in Guantanamo Bay. The video-makers interspersed Pearl's scripted words with images of dead and weeping Middle Easterners, presumably victims of U.S. political and military actions. In crafting this pastiche, it is as if they were splicing together a fantasy world in which Americans finally understood, in the depths of their hearts, the suffering and resentment of some Muslim peoples.

Our government should know that fathoming the point of view of potential terrorists is not the same as approving of their acts, but it became "un-American" right around the time Lynn Cheney's ACTA task force spit-roasted a list of academics for pointing out why the U.S. is so reviled. Yet to refuse to grasp terrorists' perspective is to encourage a shortsightedness that will cost everyone dearly.

So what solution could possibly remedy this problem? I don't aspire to fix a global mess, but my experiences in Kenya provided a sharp reminder of the fact that a vast number of Muslims across the world (most of them peaceful, humane people, and a few of them not) are weighing our country's actions.

Every U.S. hypocrisy, fib, or denial is registered; every U.S. policy is picked over for the way it affects Muslims on political, economic, and humanitarian grounds. A just foreign policy then, especially on issues like sanctions against Iraq and the U.S. support for Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon, is the avenue to peace.

Social justice and fairness have not yet motivated the United States government to overhaul such policies, but perhaps, once it realizes this is the only long-term solution to terror at home, it will be willing to do so on grounds of self-defense.

 Chapter 33: We Need a Global Declaration of Interdependence

International Herald Tribune, July 6, 2002

WADE DAVIS

In this article, Canadian anthropologist Wade Davis reflects upon the events of September 11 to explore a potential source of further conflict—the deepening rift between the world's rich and poor. Western development models have often led to "disparity, dislocation, and dispossession" in the Third World, which may well be among the most profound dangers to world peace in the coming years. Davis informs readers that "anthropology suggests that when peoples and cultures are squeezed, extreme ideologies sometimes emerge."

When President George W. Bush asked, after September 11, "Why do they hate us?" this was not a rhetorical question. Americans really wanted to know, and still do, for their innocence had been shattered.

The president suggested that the reason was the very greatness of America, as if the liberal institutions of government had somehow provoked homicidal rage in fanatics incapable of embracing freedom.

Other, dissenting voices claimed that, to the contrary, the problem lay in the tendency of the United States to support, notably in the Middle East, repressive regimes whose values are antithetical to the ideals of American democracy.

Both sides were partially right, but both overlooked the deeper issue, in part because they persisted in examining the world through American eyes.

America, of course, has always looked inward. A nation born in isolation cannot be expected to be troubled by the election of a president who has rarely been abroad, or a Congress in which 25 percent of members do not hold passports. Wealth too can be blinding. The United States with less than 5 percent of the world’s population produces 21 percent of the global economic output.

[[r-j-roberto-j-gonzalez-anthropologists-in-the-publ-8.png]]

Such a country does not easily grasp the reality of a world in which 1.3 billion people get by on less than $1 a day. A land wired for the Internet readily forgets that the majority of the world’s population has never had a phone call, let alone sent an e-mail.

A culture that celebrates the individual at the expense of family and community has difficulty understanding that in most of the world the community still prevails, for the destiny of the individual remains inextricably linked to the fate of the collective.

Even as the United States came to dominate the geopolitical scene, as it has since 1945, the American people resisted engagement with the world. Such cultural myopia was rendered obsolete in an instant on September 11. In the immediate wake of the tragedy, I was often asked, as an anthropologist, for explanations.

Condemning the attacks in the strongest terms, I nevertheless encouraged people to consider the forces that gave rise to Osama bin Laden's movement.While it would be reassuring to view Al Qaeda as an isolated phenomenon, I feared that the organization was a manifestation of a deeper and broader conflict between those who have and those who have nothing.

I also encouraged my American friends to turn the anthropological lens upon their own culture, if only to catch a glimpse of how Americans might appear to people born in other lands. When the rest of the world looks to the West, and to America in particular, they see many wondrous things. But they also see a culture that reveres marriage yet allows half of its marriages to end in divorce; that admires its elderly yet permits grandparents to live with grandchildren in only 6 percent of its households; that loves its children yet embraces a slogan—"24/7"— that implies total devotion to the workplace at the expense of family.

Technological wizardry is balanced by a model of production and consumption that compromises the life supports of the planet. Extreme would be one word for a culture that does little to curtail industrial processes that threaten to transform the biochemistry of the atmosphere. The American way of life, brilliant and inspired in so many ways, is nevertheless not the paragon of humanity's potential.

For much of the Middle East in particular, the West is synonymous, not only with questionable values and a flood of commercial products, but also with failure. Gamal Abdel Nasser's notion of a pan-Arabic state was based on a thoroughly Western and secular model of socialist development, a dream that collapsed in corruption and despotism. The Shah of Iran provoked the Iranian revolution by thrusting not the Koran but modernity as he saw it down the throats of his people.

The Western model of development has failed in the Middle East and elsewhere because it has been based on the false promise that people who follow its prescriptive dictates will in time achieve the material prosperity enjoyed by a handful of nations of the West. Even were this possible, it is not at all clear that it would be desirable.

To raise consumption of energy and materials throughout the world to Western levels, given current population projections, would require the resources of four planet Earths by the year 2100. To do so with the one world we have would imply so severely compromising the biosphere that the Earth would be unrecognizable.

Given the values that drive most decisions in the international community, this is not about to happen. In reality, development for the vast majority of the peoples of the world has been a process in which the individual is torn from his past, propelled into an uncertain future, only to secure a place on the bottom rung of an economic ladder that goes nowhere.

Anthropology suggests that when peoples and cultures are squeezed, extreme ideologies sometimes emerge, inspired by strange and unexpected beliefs. However unique the circumstances that forged its abominable impulses, Al Qaeda is nevertheless reminiscent of these revitalization movements. We must strive to understand its roots, for the chaotic conditions of disintegration and disenfranchisement that led to Al Qaeda are found among disaffected populations throughout the world.

We live in an age of disintegration. At the beginning of this century there were 60 nation states. Today there are 190, most of them poor and highly unstable. The real story lies in the cities. Throughout the world urbanization, with all of its fickle and forlorn promises, has drawn people by the millions into squalor.

The nation-state, as Harvard sociologist Daniel Bell wrote, has become too small for the big problems of the world and too big for the little problems of the world. Outside of the major industrial nations, globalization has not brought integration and harmony, but rather a firestorm of change that has swept away languages and cultures, ancient skills and visionary wisdom. This is the hidden backdrop of our era.

In the immediate aftermath of September 11, I was asked at a lecture in Los Angeles to name the seminal event of the twentieth century. Without hesitation I suggested the assassination of Archduke Ferdinand in 1914.

The question then turned to September 11, and it struck me that a hundred years from now that fateful date may well loom as the defining moment of this new century, the day when two worlds, long kept apart by geography and circumstance, came together in violent conflict. If there is one lesson to be learned from September 11, it is that power does not translate into security.

The voices of the poor, who deal each moment with the consequences of environmental degradation, political corruption, overpopulation, the gross distortion in the distribution of wealth and the consumption of resources, who share few of the material benefits of modernity, will no longer be silent.

True peace and security for the twenty-first century will only come about when we find a way to address the underlying issues of disparity, dislocation, and dispossession that have provoked the madness of our age. We desperately need a global acknowledgment of the fact that no people and no nation can truly prosper unless the bounty of our collective ingenuity and opportunities are available and accessible to all.

We must aspire to create a new international spirit of pluralism, a true global democracy in which unique cultures, large and small, are allowed the right to exist, even as we learn and live together, enriched by the deepest reaches of our imaginings. We need a global declaration of interdependence. In the wake of September 11 this is not idle or naive rhetoric, but rather a matter of survival.

 Suggestion for Further Reading

<biblio>

Davis, Wade

2002 Light at the Edge of the World. Washington: National Geographic Society.

</biblio>

* Part V: on Afghanistan, Central Asia, and the Middle East

 Chapter 34: Nation is Home to Afghans, Mujahedeen, Taliban, Afghan-Arabs, to Name a Few

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, September 23, 2001

ROBERT CANFIELD

Immediately following September 11, U.S. media attention zeroed in on Afghanistan, whose Taliban government hosted Osama bin Laden and members of the Al Qaeda network, prime suspects in the World Trade Center and Pentagon attacks.

In this piece, anthropology professor Robert Canfield provides a wealth of background information for understanding the linguistic, ethnic, religious, and political complexity of Afghanistan. In describing the rise of the mujahedeen (holy warrior) groups in the 1980s, he reminds readers that these organizations were officially supported by Pakistan and the CIA in an effort to repel the Soviet army and defeat Afghanistan's communist government. When the United States withdrew support without any plan for helping to reconstruct the country, rival factions began fighting for control. Out of this chaos emerged the Taliban.

Two weeks after the publication of this commentary, U.S. forces initiated a massive bombing campaign that killed thousands of Taliban troops, Al Qaeda fighters, and Afghan civilians.

No Afghans participated in the bombings of September 11 and only one kind of "Afghan," the Taliban, has any connection with Osama bin Laden (the presumed mastermind). The Taliban are not typical "Afghans" anyway.

Afghanistan, which may be a crucial target of U.S. forces, is notoriously diverse. Almost two dozen language groups exist in that country, which is divided religiously among Sunni, Shia and Ismaili Muslims, along with a few historically accepted Hindus (and now a tiny group of Christian converts from Islam, most of them fearful and secretive).

Indeed, the Muslims are subdivided in their orientations toward Islam and even Islamic radicalism comes in several varieties.

Scarcely any Muslim in Afghanistan would have approved of the bombings of September 11. Most Afghans' commitment to Islam has never been particularly shrill, perhaps because Afghanistan was never under sustained colonial domination.

The places where radical Islamic ideologies developed, notably Egypt and India, were long subject to European control. The radical Islam that exists in Afghanistan was imported during the anti-Soviet struggle of the 1980s. And the Islam of the notorious Taliban is something else, a creation of special circumstances after the Soviet-Afghan war.

The term “Afghan” originally referred to a particular ethnic type, who are otherwise known as “Pushtun” or (in Pakistan) “Pathan.” These “true Afghans” speak Pushtu (Pashto) and are organized tribally, at least in many rural areas. The elite of the country have typically been of Afghan extraction.

Some of the peoples in the country have resented and resisted Pushtun domination and call themselves by their ethnic and linguistic identities —“Hazara,” “Uzbek,” “Tajik,” etc.—to distinguish themselves from the Pushtun. They nevertheless identify themselves as “Afghan” to people (like most Americans) who know little about internal Afghanistan affairs.

Mujahedeen means “holy warriors” and was claimed, especially after 1980, by those people who opposed the Afghan communist government and its Soviet sponsors. Seven of the many mujahedeen organizations were supported officially by Pakistan and the CIA, which tried (with only moderate success) to orchestrate the resistance activities against the communist regimes.

The mujahedeen were able to force the Soviets out of Afghanistan in 1989 and eventually to bring down the Afghan communist government in 1992. Between 1992 and 1996 they fought fiercely among themselves over control of Kabul. Elsewhere in the country they carved the landscape into their own respective fiefdoms, effecting a widespread collapse of social order.

The Taliban arose in the context of that disorder. They are the products of the Islamic schools that were set up among the Afghan refugees during the war. Most of the schools were small and taught by local mullahs, but they were a useful escape from the refugee camps, as they provided food and lodging for the boys that their own families could scarcely muster.

The Taliban are mostly Pushtun and generally they have little understanding of the other groups in the country. In truth, they know nothing about the history of Afghanistan, even of the recent Soviet-Afghan conflict.

Centered on the religious schools and their dormitories, the Taliban (“students”) had a different understanding of the world from their families in the refugee camps. Journalist and author Ahmad Rashid calls them “orphans” of the war whose essential anchorage was the “puritan Islam” they were taught. Most of the Taliban speak only Pushtu and Urdu—an indication that in fact they are (at least culturally) Pakistanis, not Afghans.

Arab-Afghans, including Osama bin Laden, joined the resistance against the Soviets. They were accepted among the Pushtun parties, especially those favored by the Pakistanis and Saudis, but were rebuffed by the Persian-speaking parties of the north. Many of them were trained during the war and dispersed into other parts of the Arab world after the war, where they became active in radical movements.

In recent years, however, as the Taliban have been fighting what is left of the mujahedeen, now known as the Northern Alliance, many Arab-Afghans have become allied with the Taliban. These Arab-Afghans are the only elements in the country that have any affinity with or commitment to the destruction of Western society and culture.

It remains to be seen which, if any, of them were involved in the bombing on September 11.

 Suggestions for Further Reading

<biblio>

Canfield, Robert, ed.

1991 Turko-Persia in Historical Perspective. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Hauner, Milan, and Robert Canfield, eds.

1989 Afghanistan and the Soviet Union: Collision and Transformation. Boulder: Westview Press.

Shahrani, M. Nazif, and Robert Canfield, eds.

1984 Revolutions and Rebellions in Afghanistan. Berkeley: Institute for International Studies.

</biblio>

 Chapter 35: The Folly of Quick Action in Afghanistan

Financial Times, September 27, 2001

ASHRAF GHANI

In this article, published days before the U.S. military initiated bombing raids over Afghanistan in an effort to destroy the Taliban and Al Qaeda, Ashraf Ghani warns of the possible consequences of a hastily planned war. He notes that the rise of the Taliban can be linked to ill-devised U.S. policies in the region in the 1990s, and that only a credible U.N. plan for reconstruction will succeed in gaining the trust of the population.

By November 2001, the Taliban had abandoned Kabul and Kandahar, their last remaining strongholds. After Hamid Karzai was elected president at a meeting of elders in May 2002, he appointed Ashraf Ghani as finance minister.

As this book goes to press, much of the international support recommended by Ghani has not been forthcoming. Only a fraction of the $2 billion pledged by donor countries for reconstruction has arrived, and this may represent one of the greatest challenges facing the new administration.[52] Although international peacekeepers have achieved relative tranquility in the capital city of Kabul, other regions remain unstable as local bosses struggle for power.

The battle of Afghanistan is the Bush administration’s to lose. The Afghan population is ready for change. The networks of support from Pakistan that have been the mainstay of the Taliban regime are disrupted. Afghanistan’s neighboring countries and the Arab and Islamic regimes would all be pleased to see a change of regime.

Afghans are poor but have sophisticated notions of legitimacy. Compared with the average American, the average Afghan is keenly interested in world events that affect them and do not miss a single broadcast of the BBC.

Most are disenchanted with the Taliban for its failures to address the well-being of the people, its subordination of the internal needs of the country to external adventurism, and for bringing confrontation with the U.S.

Having witnessed massive use of force by the Red army and the destruction wrought by a long civil war, Afghans are fearful of anarchy and a new phase of warlordism supported by the U.S. Should use of force lead to large-scale civilian casualties, disruption of the lives of people, and a new exodus of the Afghan population to neighboring countries that do not want them, the disenchantment with the Taliban could easily be turned into sympathy and then support for a new militant movement in the region.

The U.S. administration has two options. It can either deal with the symptoms and the visible symbols of the extremist movement or it can address the underlying causes of terrorism and support forces that would be willing to disrupt and destroy the networks that have turned Afghanistan into a launching pad for isolationist and extremist movements.

Dealing with the symptoms would involve military assaults within days or weeks, funneling large amounts of money and matériel to warlords opposed to the Taliban and the creation of alliances with neighboring regimes that could use the opportunity to deny the aspirations of their own people for democratic change. Such an approach would enmesh the U.S. in a series of very complicated relationships in the region. These relationships could in turn spawn networks that could be turned against the West in the longer term.

A more methodical approach would begin from the premise that the fundamental issue in Afghanistan is the creation of a state that would have legitimacy at home, in the region, and internationally. Only a nationalist state would have the capacity and commitment to break and destroy the networks of terror.

There is a significant asset and a central constraint in addressing this issue. In spite of nine years of civil war, no group in the country has asked for the dismemberment of the country. Afghan nationalism is strong and a potential basis for the creation of a stable and legitimate government that would offer a formula for accommodating the aspirations of various linguistic and regional groups. Yet no group or individual commands sufficient legitimacy or has articulated a vision and concrete program of action to convince the population that their aspirations for peace and prosperity can be addressed.

[[r-j-roberto-j-gonzalez-anthropologists-in-the-publ-9.png]]

Forging a methodical approach would require acting on lessons from past U.S. engagement in Afghanistan. First, dealing with Afghanistan cannot be outsourced to one of the governments in the region. The U.S. outsourced the management of the resistance to the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan to Pakistan, and the current situation is a tragic consequence of that decision.

Second, the U.S. cannot funnel large amounts of money and arms to discredited warlords who are now lining up to offer their services. This approach has been tried and resulted in the destruction of the capital city and the emergence of the Taliban.

Third, an interim Afghan government cannot be cobbled together in a couple of weeks. That was tried and led to the civil war among armed factions that had little unity of purpose or sense of accountability.

Fourth, funneling resources to political parties or nongovernmental organizations that are not willing to be accountable to the people for the use of those resources can only lead to alienation of the population. Adoption of that strategy during the Soviet occupation brought little benefit.

Fifth, the United Nations cannot play a constructive role if it does not receive the full backing of the U.S. In recent years, there have been several very capable special envoys whose efforts have not succeeded because of the lukewarm support of the U.S. and the opposition of regional governments.

Establishing a legitimate government in Afghanistan requires a multipronged approach. To gain the trust of the population, a credible program for reconstruction of the country has to be offered. This would require assembling the younger group of Afghan technocrats who have gained success in industrialized countries, as well as many agencies that have had the commitment to stay through the course of the events in Afghanistan.

Critical to the success of this effort would be to design mechanisms for accountability and transparency of management of resources to be provided for reconstruction. Pakistan and the neighboring states should be persuaded to accept and support the creation ofa broad-based Afghan nationalist government. The role of the U.N. special envoy could be enhanced to help establish a transitional government composed of a cross-section of Afghans. This process would only be credible if officials in the U.S. government avoided the temptation of imposing lists drawn on the basis of their personal contacts or insistence on giving Afghanistan’s octogenarian former king a decisive role in the process.

Establishment of the transitional government would also require the establishment of an army and a police force. Once these arrangements are in place, the use of military force against Osama bin Laden and the hard core of his Taliban allies could be followed by an orderly process of transfer of power.

The administration has an option. It can act quickly, or wisely. The world prays that wisdom may guide policy.

[52] See Ian Fisher, “Ready to Rebuild, Afghans Await Promised Aid,” New York Times, August 25, 2002.

 Chapter 36: Afghanistan Can Learn From Its Past

New York Times, October 14, 2001

NAZIF SHAHRANI

Even before U.S. war planes began bombing Taliban positions in October 2001, concerned observers asked: Who will rule Afghanistan once the Taliban is gone?

In this article, Professor Nazif Shahrani argues that the country will enjoy a democratic government only if a decentralized political system is established. He warns that “the painful lesson of Afghanistan’s history has been that strong centralized government in any form leads to abuses of power” because the country is marked by ethnic divisions.

The context of Shahrani’s editorial is important. There was great concern at this time that the U.S. government would seek to reestablish the octogenarian former monarch, Muhammad Zahir Shah, who had been living in exile in Italy for twenty years.

The people of Afghanistan, after a century of misrule, are in desperate need of a way to govern themselves that will offer some defense against the abuses of power that have marked Afghan history. Now that President Bush has acknowledged the need to help build a stable government in Afghanistan, perhaps under leadership of the United Nations, many are asking: Who should rule? Once the Taliban are defeated, several parties want to rule: the ex-king, Muhammad Zahir Shah; the Pashtun ethnic group; the opposition Northern Alliance; and of course the Taliban. But the better question is: How should Afghanistan govern itself?

The mechanism most often being mentioned is centralized government controlled by an alliance of some combination of ethnic groups. Yet the painful lesson of Afghanistan’s history has been that strong centralized government in any form leads to abuses of power. The United Nations special envoy, Lakhdar Brahimi, is probably in the best position to sort out the complex inner conflicts and alliances inside Afghanistan. But everyone concerned should realize that democratic governance cannot be achieved by handing power over to a party, tribe, or group, or a combination of these, no matter how broad-based.

Instead, what Afghanistan needs is a loosening of centralized power and help in envisioning and creating a decentralized government with a strong national constitution. Providing this help could be the longest-lasting accomplishment the antiterror coalition could make, not only for Afghanistan, but in the service of its own wider goals.

Modern Afghanistan was cobbled together as a buffer state in the late nineteenth century by British India and czarist Russia, with its first modern ruler, Amir Abdur Rahman Khan, picked from among the princelings of a warring Pashtun clan. In return for giving up control of the country's foreign affairs to Britain, he received arms and money to conquer various ethnic and linguistic groups: other Pashtuns, Tajik, Farsiwan, Uzbek, Turkmen, Baluch, Hazara, Aimaq, and others. Infamous for his cruelty and dubbed the Iron Amir by his colonial masters, he established a firm foundation for an oppressive, corrupt centralized system. A brief experiment with constitutional monarchy from 1965 to 1973, under Zahir Shah, was aborted by a palace coup, followed in 1978 by the Soviet-inspired communist regime that plunged the country into an abyss of continual proxy wars culminating in the rise of the Taliban.

The aims of the Taliban under Mullah Muhammad Omar are similar to those of the British-installed Iron Amir: the military conquest and subjugation of all the self-governing non-Pashtun territories. And like him, they use an extremist form of Islam as a justification for terrorizing those they assume to be enemies into submission. What is novel in the Taliban's effort is their alliance with international terrorism.

The old monarchy and Taliban regimes also share the common myth, first fabricated by British India, that the Pashtun have the exclusive right to rule in Afghanistan. This myth, echoed approvingly today by Pakistani generals and politicians, has brought Afghanistan to disaster.

The international community should encourage the creation of a government that recognizes the crucial role of the local and regional communities in self-governance, as existed in earlier eras in Afghanistan. Indeed, these kinds of local governing structures reemerged in the period of anti-Soviet and anticommunist jihad during the 1980s and early 1990s. Areas then controlled by mujahedeen groups established rudimentary governments that ran schools, police units, and courts; these local groups evolved into five major regional coalitions of communities, consisting of several provinces each. The new government of Afghanistan should embrace the principles of community selfgovernance at village, district, and provincial levels.

Local autonomy and the political integrity of every ethnic and sectarian segment of Afghan society should be guaranteed by a national constitution and a decentralized federal governance structure.

Giving Afghanistan a functional and stable governing system will require patience and an honest transitional government. It will also require the supervision of a United Nations-mandated international peacekeeping force in Afghanistan. While the ex-king should be allowed to play a role in such a transitional government, every effort must be made to keep his old corrupt cronies from infiltrating the new government. Care must also be taken to keep Pakistan from dictating the shape of the new government and to keep the corrupt elements of the mujahedeen groups and the previous communist regime from any positions of power.

The task is daunting, but the rewards are liberation from terror for the people of Afghanistan and a new precedent for combating the conditions that give rise to terrorism elsewhere.

 Suggestions for Further Reading

<biblio>

Shahrani, M. Nazif

1979 The Kirghiz and Wakhi of Afghanistan: Adaptation to Closed Frontiers. Seattle: University of Washington Press.

Shahrani, M. Nazif, and Robert Canfield, eds.

1984 Revolutions and Rebellions in Afghanistan. Berkeley: Institute for International Studies.

</biblio>

 Chapter 37: Women in the New Afghanistan

Democracy Now! (Pacifica Radio), December 4, 2001

By mid-November 2001, U.S. and British forces had ousted the Taliban from power. In the final days of that month, the United Nations convened a series of meetings in Bonn, Germany, between Afghan factions to create a political plan for the future. Despite protests from many organizations, all buta handful of the participants in the conference were male.

On December 4, anthropologist and activist Zieba Shorish-Shamley of the Women’s Alliance for Peace and Human Rights in Afghanistan was interviewed from Brussels, Belgium, by Amy Goodman. There, approximately fifty representatives participated in an Afghan women’s conference to discuss unified demands on women’s issues in post-Taliban Afghanistan. Shorish-Shamley emphasizes the need for women to participate in all phases of the reconstruction process.

AMY GOODMAN: The four Afghan factions holding talks in Bonn, Germany, have reached agreement on a U.N. blueprint for rebuilding the country’s political system. The deal came early yesterday morning after the Northern Alliance, the largest delegation, finally submitted a list of its candidates for a 29-member interim administration to rule Afghanistan. The next step, expected to begin immediately, will be to choose which factions get which jobs. The interim administration will rule for six months, until a commission is formed to convene a loya jirga, a traditional grand assembly. The assembly would then elect a transitional government to rule for about two years, until a constitution is drawn up and elections are held. Under intense international pressure, the interim administration is expected to include at least one woman as one of the five deputy prime ministers and several other women as ministers. While talks continue in Bonn, talks of another sort are under way in Brussels, Belgium, where the first Afghan women's summit is being held. Fifty Afghan women representing a wide range of ethnic and religious groups and political views have gathered, supported by women's rights groups from around the world. They are working to forge unified demands on the need for women's equality and for their full participation in conflict resolution efforts and in the formation of a future Afghan government. We go now to Brussels, to Zieba Shorish-Shamley, with the Women's Alliance for Peace and Human Rights in Afghanistan. Thanks for stepping outside the meeting. Can you tell us what the situation is there?

ZIEBA SHORISH-SHAMLEY: The gathering at Brussels is for Afghan women to come up with a blueprint of their own as to what they want and their involvement in the peace process, as well as reconstruction of the future government of Afghanistan. In other words, whoever the Afghan government may be in the future, our message is that there has to be a proportionate representation of women in every aspect of the Afghan future—not only [in] the reconstruction [but in] the government [as well], because the women were not really represented proportionately at the Bonn process. So at this [meeting] the women are talking about what they want, and hopefully by the end of this summit we will have come up with a declaration of what their requests are and what their demands are.

AG: But this summit isn't binding in any way?

ZSS: No, it is not binding, but we will try to push what comes out of this summit at the U.N. (international level), as well as [with] the key government players, Six plus Two,[53] ... who are involved in Afghanistan. Afghan women's rights have been violated for too long; they have been kept out of the reconstruction and actually ... everything has been stripped from them, all the basic human rights that are required for human existence. So, therefore, without the Afghan women I do not think that Afghanistan will be adequately reconstructed, because 55 to 60 percent of the population of Afghanistan are women. And there won't be any peace without justice and the Afghan women demand to be involved in every aspect of their society.

AG: Zieba Shorish-Shamley, what do you think of the formulas they came up with in Bonn? The interim administration of Afghanistan is expected to include at least one woman as one of the five deputy prime ministers, and several other women as ministers.

ZSS: Well that tells you right there, it doesn't represent Afghan women. Afghan women are up to 55 percent or 60 percent of the population of the country. I do not understand, as an Afghan woman, why the U.N. and other countries always tell us Afghan women... [have] to please the warring factions and the political parties who have been in power who were the cause of the oppression of Afghan women. Somebody has to listen to the Afghan women because they... [are] not going to be satisfied with one woman represented in the interim government. They would not be represented proportionately; by that I mean there should be more women than the men in the loya jirga. So again I say there will not be peace without justice and we will demand and we will deliver our message to the future so-called government of Afghanistan, whoever it may be ... Another message—I am talking about Women for Peace and Human Rights in Afghanistan—if they do not include proportional representation of Afghan women in the government in the reconstruction and future of Afghanistan... we will resist them, we will mobilize the world as we did against the Taliban, and we will mobilize it against them as well. So we are determined on this, and we will not compromise these rights, because the rights are not only given to us by Islam, they are also given to us by the United [Nations] charter. So we want these rights, and we want full participation, and we want the restoration of Afghan women's rights, and that is our demand, and we will not budge.

AG: Is the U.N. participating in your talks?

ZSS: Yes, the [OXFAM] executive director, Ms. Heizer, is here, as well as Ms. Angela King, who is representing the Secretary-General, Kofi Annan. So they are here as well as people from the European Parliament or Union. So there are many important women here and as I said, we don't have any problem with the women [who are] important people, we have a problem with the men in the U.N., as well as in Afghanistan, as well as in governments, because they seem to be selling us out to please the warring factions who have abused our rights and who have caused the severe oppression of the Afghan women. So they should negotiate with us, with the Afghan women, as well as with the people of Afghanistan. And another demand that we have is that the local autonomy of Afghanistan—the local populations' autonomy—must be respected. No one can impose a government from outside onto Afghan people.

AG: To what extent are you, the Women's Alliance for Peace and Human Rights in Afghanistan, communicating with or possibly negotiating with the Afghan military, the Northern Alliance— those that are going to be in power now?

ZSS: They haven't contacted us. I don't think they care for us because we ask for something that is ours, we ask for justice. Neither have the other political parties who are involved in the Bonn process. They know that we would not compromise the rights of Afghan women for anything... We haven't been contacted, and that doesn't bother us. We want the rights of the women to be restored, so we go to the international community and we go to the people of Afghanistan... If this government or future government is elected, [if] it's democratic, representing all women, all different ethnic groups of Afghanistan as well as women, and women are included in reconstruction and every other aspect of the public domain, [then] we don't have any problem with that government, we will support it 100 percent. But if they're going to play the game again, and just hang on to the power and do not share the power with more than half of the society, that's not going to work out— that's going to fail. And the reason the U.N. peace negotiations so far have failed in Afghanistan is because the U.N. has always negotiated with the warring factions, the people in power, or countries surrounding Afghanistan who supported the warring factions and caused all the misery... So what we want is for the U.N. and U.S., which is a key player, and the other Six plus Two [countries] who are involved in Afghanistan to... stop negotiating with them.

They should negotiate with the people of Afghanistan—the people ... have the right to self-determination. And I don't think the people of Afghanistan in any way are against women's involvement in the reconstruction and other building of our country, or in the government of Afghan society.

AG: Zieba Shorish-Shamley of the Women's Alliance for Peace and Human Rights, when the Northern Alliance took Kabul, the women, a group of about 100 women led by Suralia Perlika attempted to march to the United Nations demanding their rights and lifting up their burqas.[54] They were stopped, not by the Taliban, but by the Northern Alliance. What do you know of the group in Kabul right now?

ZSS: Well there are some elements within the Northern Alliance that are not bad, but there are elements in the Northern Alliance [who], according to ... Women's Alliance for Peace and Human Rights in Afghanistan, are war criminals. We have ...calledontheU.N. to investigate and bring to justice the war criminals of the Soviet era, war criminals during the mujahedeen, and war criminals during the Taliban... Well, that tells you by itself [what happens] when the women are stopped from demonstrating and from expressing themselves, which is their right. Not only the U.N. rights which came fifty years ago... these rights were [also] given to the Moslems, to the Afghan women in sixth century A.D. When the Northern Alliance does that, not only does it violate the international law, it violates the Islamic law...Wehavetogetwomen involved and we have to struggle for full restoration of Afghan women, it doesn't matter who the government is.

AG: Finally, how do you see women on the ground in Afghanistan building up civil society right now?

ZSS: Well they are trying in this meeting that we have. There are women already in the refugee camps, and some inside Afghanistan, that are trying to put their lives together, trying to educate children, to help on many, many issues that are too vast to talk about. What is happening in Afghanistan to Afghan women right now [is that] Afghan women and children need food, shelter, and medical care. Many women are dying, and the latest report...by the World Health Organization last week [reported that] because of wearing the burqa, the rate of tuberculosis has risen very high among Afghan women, because they were denied sunshine under the Taliban rule. As well... there are 300,000 to 400,000 pregnant women inside Afghanistan without any prenatal, delivery or postnatal care...Sothattells you how dire the need is for medical attention in Afghanistan. At the same time, what we want is for the U.N. to move and demilitarize the city of Kabul. The peacekeeping forces of the U.N.—or as they decided, of some Moslem countries that have offered [to participate]—should move into the city of Kabul. There has to be security, and security for women. For the women of Afghanistan, there is no security... there is no sense of peace. So they should be protected, but the first thing that I urge the international community [to do] is to get food to them as soon as possible...

AG: Zieba Shorish-Shamley, thank you for taking time—coming out of the meeting where you are in Brussels—to speak with our listeners and viewers around the country on the “War and Peace Report.” Thank you.

[53] “Six plus Two” countries are the six countries bordering Afghanistan (Iran, Turkmenistan, Uzbekistan, Tajikistan, China, and Pakistan), plus the two Cold War superpowers (United States and Russia).

[54] The burqa is a garment for women that covers the entire body, including the face. Under the Taliban’s rule, Afghan women were required to wear burqas, which became a symbol of the government’s repression of females.

 Chapter 38. Enlisting Afghan Aid

People’s Geography Project, September 2001
[[http://www.peoplesgeography.com][www.peoplesgeography.com]]

In this article, which appeared in late September 2001, anthropologist David B. Edwards and Afghan journalist Shahmahmood Miakhel argue that U.S. leaders may be stepping into a trap if they attack Afghanistan. Rather than see Afghans as enemies, the Bush administration should see them as potential allies against the Taliban regime. They conclude by emphasizing the need to create a secure future for Afghanistan as a strategy to avoid future terrorist infiltration there.

Osama bin Laden is waiting for George Bush to attack Afghanistan. It is the response he expects, and he can't wait. For him, this is a holy war, a clash of civilizations, and he has no compunction about using Afghans as kindling to start a conflagration that would involve the entire Muslim world. One hopes the policy makers in Washington realize where bin Laden's strategy leads and will think carefully about how to avoid his trap.

To develop a strategy that confounds bin Laden's plans, we must begin by thinking of Afghans not as enemies but as potential allies. It is no coincidence that none of the names so far identified in the list of hijackers are Afghans. Bin Laden and his Arab followers live in restricted enclaves, and few Afghans outside the Taliban regime itself harbor any sympathies for his cause. Afghanistan now, no less than during the decade of Soviet control, is an occupied nation, and we must enlist in our struggle the many Afghans inside the country and out who would welcome the opportunity to unseat the Taliban and get rid of the Arab interlopers in their country. Two steps must be taken to draw these people into the international community in its attack on bin Laden and his supporters.

First, the international community must assemble experienced Afghan leaders to provide the nucleus of an interim government. This group should include exiled moderates who were forced out of the political picture first by the extremist resistance parties in Peshawar back in the 1980s and then by the Taliban. They must be joined by the handful of moderate commanders forced into exile by the Taliban that Afghans still trust. The number of recognized Afghan leaders who have managed to both survive and maintain their reputation in the polarized politics of the last two decades is small, but they exist and must be persuaded to put aside their partisan disputes and participate in a transitional coalition to govern Afghanistan until democratic elections can be held. As this group is brought together, Afghans generally must be convinced that these leaders will not be puppets of the United States or any other foreign power. Similarly, Afghanistan's neighbors must understand that the interim government will avoid foreign entanglements and dedicate itself to the immediate goals of reestablishing the foundations of government, helping the Afghan people become economically self-sufficient, and preparing the ground for general elections.

The second step is an international commitment made up front to provide a massive influx of development assistance to reconstruct the economic and social infrastructure of Afghan society. After 23 years of foreign occupation and civil war, the country's roads, irrigation systems, and electrical grid are in a state of ruin, and Afghanistan now is in the grip of a drought that has turned much of the region into a desert. Afghans remember well that the international community largely forgot about them after the Soviets withdrew from their country, and they must be assured that this will not happen again and that we will work with them to rebuild the vibrant and modernizing society that existed prior to the Marxist revolution of 1978. Without such commitments, Afghans will find little reason to take the risks that opposing bin Laden and the Taliban will entail. On the other hand, the promise of sustained international support for Afghanistan will send a message not only to Afghans, but to Muslims generally that the West is committed to their welfare rather than their destruction.

No group has suffered more in the last quarter century than the Afghans, but they are a resilient people and will be a formidable foe again if they believe themselves to be under invasion from a foreign enemy.

We must frame our response to the terrorist outrage not as an assault but as a liberation—from oppressive rulers, unwanted guests, and the economic calamity that is their everyday reality. Respected Afghan leaders must be at the forefront of our efforts, and it must be clear that our intentions are to help rebuild rather than to destroy. Those of us who have enjoyed the prosperity of the last two decades must recognize that terrorism is born of political and economic despair. If we fail to take into account Afghanistan's future, as well as its past and present, Afghanistan will remain a place where terrorists can find safe haven, and all the military might in the world won't make us safe again.

 Suggestions for Further Reading

<biblio>

Edwards, David B.

1996 Heroes of the Age: Moral Fault Lines on the Afghan Frontier. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press.

2002 Before Taliban: Genealogies of the Afghan Jihad. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press.

</biblio>

 Chapter 39: Pakistan’s Dilemma

Middle East Report Online, September 19, 2001 [[http://www.merip.org][www.merip.org]]

KAMRAN ASDAR ALI

Throughout the late 1980s and into the 1990s, Afghan resistance fighters and mujahedeen groups received funding and support channeled through the Pakistani intelligence agency from CIA sources (see Chapter 28). The Pakistani government provided the Taliban with support after their rise to power in the mid-1990s, and was one of only two countries to grant the Taliban government formal recognition (the other was Saudi Arabia). The Bush and Clinton administrations, seeking to undercut Iran’s role in Afghan politics, largely ignored the Taliban’s repressive policies and Pakistan’s responsibility in supporting them.

This article by Kamran Asdar Ali describes the dilemma faced by Pakistani officials in the critical days following September 11, when the Bush administration began shifting its focus away from the alleged suicide hijackers (nearly all of whom were Saudi nationals legally in the United States) to toppling the Taliban regime, hosts of Osama bin Laden. U.S. officials sought Pakistani support for the impending Afghan war, and placed that country's leaders in the position of alienating orthodox Muslims outraged by the possibility of aerial attacks that would eventually inflict thousands of civilian casualties.

As this book goes to press, political instability continues to plague Pakistan. U.S. special forces began operating within the country's borders in February 2002, allegedly in search ofAl Qaeda members, to the dismay of many Pakistanis. Hardly a week goes by without news of attacks on civilian targets by Muslim extremists. President Pervez Musharraf has responded with increasingly repressive policies that may further undermine the country's stability.

Pakistani media reports indicate that on the evening of September 14 the president, General Pervez Musharraf, met with his cabinet and national security team in a marathon session lasting until the early hours of the next morning. The task at hand was to decide if the Pakistani government should accede to the demands made by the United States in the aftermath of the September 11 tragedies, demands related to the still-emerging U.S. policy toward Afghanistan, accused of harboring prime suspect Osama bin Laden. The U.S. request came in the form of a virtual threat. Media reports tell us that the Pakistani government has been asked to restrict the movements of goods and supplies to Afghanistan, seize the assets of Afghan/ Taliban leaders, provide logistical support to the U.S. armed forces along with the use of Pakistani airspace if the need arises and, most importantly, share up-to-date intelligence on bin Laden and his followers in Afghanistan.

In the late 1970s, another Pakistani general, Zia ul Haq, must have convened a meeting similar to Musharraf's. Then, the military junta was asked to play a crucial role in support of the U. S.-financed resistance to the Soviet forces occupying Afghanistan. That decision was undoubtedly an easier one for the dictator Zia ul Haq and his advisers. The general had been in power for two years, and his religiously conservative regime was already unpopular at home and abroad. Supporting the U.S. would grant his government badly needed legitimacy on the world stage. Zia ul Haq also anticipated a U.S. aid package to help the Pakistani state address its perpetual social and economic problems.

To the skeptical Pakistani population, the military regime portrayed its intervention in Afghan affairs as humanitarian and political assistance to fellow Muslims. But the junta's decision to play ball with the U.S. was also taken for geostrategic reasons. Since Pakistan's independence in 1947, relations between Afghanistan and Pakistan had been strained, due to boundary disputes and the feared spillage of Pashtun nationalism across the border. Afghan rulers and elements of Pakistan's Pashtun population in the North West Frontier Province (NWFP) bordering Afghanistan periodically questioned the artificial line that the British had drawn to divide a culturally and ethnically continuous area into parts of British India and Afghanistan in the mid-nineteenth century. On occasion Afghanistan presented arguments for a greater Pashtun state, to include parts of Pakistan's northern territory.

Hence, with openly hostile India on their eastern flank, Pakistani military strategists have also regarded their not-so-friendly western neighbor with anxiety. This state of affairs was aggravated by the communist-led coup in Afghanistan in 1978, and the subsequent Soviet invasion of that country in the winter of 1979. The U.S.-backed resistance to the Afghan regime guaranteed, at least in the minds of the Pakistani military leaders, a somewhat concrete resolution of their Afghan problem.

The mass displacement of the Afghan population, the destruction of their homes and villages, and the loss of 1.5 million Afghan lives during that country's long civil war have somehow been erased from the consciousness of the Western media. Nor do many outside Pakistan remember the Afghan war's impact on Pakistani civil, cultural, and political life.

The Pakistani military used the infusion of international aid to strengthen its Inter-Services Intelligence Directorate (ISI), which became the principal liaison between U.S. intelligence agencies and the varied factions of the Afghan resistance movement known as the mujahedeen. The ISI assumed a lead role in suppressing democratic dissent within Pakistan. With well over 90,000 men under its aegis, the ISI remains an independent power base within Pakistan's government structure. There are no constitutional checks and balances on its operations. Its leadership consists of highly motivated and, in most cases, religiously zealous officers who are concerned with safeguarding what they consider to be the spatial and ideological boundaries of the Pakistani state. Hence, the ISI has been directly or indirectly involved in all major domestic and international decisions made by successive military and civilian governments over the last two decades.

On the political level, the economic and development aid helped Zia ul Haq to consolidate his plan for Islamization of the country. Some of the legacies of this era are evidentiary laws based on the Koranic law or sharia, the creation of sharia courts, laws that discriminate against minorities and women, and the dreaded blasphemy laws which continue to restrict the civil and political rights of Pakistani citizens. Development funds were also used to establish and maintain madrassas (religious schools) in different parts of the country. Zia ul Haq and his junta considered the students and graduates of these schools the foot soldiers who would support the dictator as he pressed ahead with his agenda to build an Islamic polity and a theocratic state. Another legacy of the war was the unprecedented infiltration of Pakistani society by drugs and arms. Profits from drug and weapons trafficking helped finance the covert war in Afghanistan, while funneling enormous wealth to a section of the Pakistani military brass.

But the triumph of the Afghan resistance forces in 1992 did not result in what the Pakistani military had always desired: a stable Afghanistan following the dictates of Islamabad. With the Cold War already a fading memory, the U.S. and other Western countries virtually abandoned the victorious mujahedeen, making only vague promises of development aid to rebuild war-ravished Afghanistan. In subsequent years, infighting among the new Afghan leadership—and their growing independence from the ISI—led Pakistan to intensify its involvement in the affairs of this struggling state. The Taliban, a radical faction of madrassa students under the guidance of Mullah Mohammed Omar of Kandahar, were bankrolled by the Pakistani military on their path to victory in 1995–1996.

From the perspective of the generals in Islamabad, the Taliban's loyalty to and dependence on them, at least, would guarantee a safer and less volatile western border. In addition, the Pakistanis were interested in secure routes to the landlocked Central Asian states. A stable Taliban-led Afghanistan would contribute to a larger geopolitical strategy wherein Pakistan, the U.S., and international petroleum companies envisioned multiple pipelines transporting oil and natural gas from the mineral-rich Central Asian countries to Pakistani ports on the Persian Gulf. But the strongly independent and unpredictable nature of the Taliban regime, and the continuing war in northern Afghanistan, have over the last two few years dampened the initial excitement that these schemes had generated in Pakistan and elsewhere.

More than a decade after his death in an airplane explosion, Zia ul Haq's ghost lingers on, as Pakistani cultural life shifts toward embracing orthodox Islamic values in both public and private spaces. Further, as the state has forsaken the task of providing systematic educational and employment opportunities to its constituents, the madrassa system has become an avenue for a large percentage of the rural and urban poor seeking social and cultural advancement. The millions trained in the madrassas have emerged as highly organized and violent power brokers who can destabilize any regime that manages to take power. The Pakistani state and military have cynically deployed these forces against internal opposition and recruited them for the state's other covert war, in Kashmir. The price of such manipulation is that, a decade after Zia's death, Pakistan remains today a politically unstable place, rife with growing ethnic and sectarian violence.

The differences between the late 1970s and September 2001 far outweigh the similarities. Musharraf has also been in power for two years, and he is also unpopular domestically and internationally. But Musharraf's military junta may not be able to push its new Afghan policy as easily as the previous dictator did. The same madrassa-trained forces that were nurtured by Zia ul Haq, and used to bolster the rule of governments since he died, could now meet Musharraf with sharp and violent resistance.

Meanwhile, the indices for health and education in Pakistan are among the lowest in the world. Violence and lawlessness are endemic, and most people eke out a living under the official poverty line. Combined with religious militancy and the easy availability of weapons, this puts Pakistan in a socially explosive situation. By accepting the U.S. demands in exchange for fresh promises of international largesse, the Pakistani military may be saving its own skin from the wrath of a U.S.-led coalition. But in the process, the regime once more appears willing to plunge Pakistan into an uncharted future, with no regard for such stability as remains in Pakistani social life.

Among most Pakistanis and Afghanis, the promise of U.S. assistance in exchange for strategic support falls on deaf ears. These people remember a series of broken Western promises, most recently when the U.S. and its allies did not provide much-needed development assistance in the early 1990s. When the Berlin Wall fell, it seems, so did U.S. and Western interest in countries which had done the West’s bidding to accelerate the Cold War’s demise. One hopes against reason that in its current high-stakes game the Pakistani military does not take the long-suffering populations of Pakistan and Afghanistan on yet another disastrous ride.

 Suggestion for Further Reading

<biblio>

Ali, Kamran Asdar

2002 Planning the Family in Egypt: New Bodies, New Selves. Austin: University of Texas Press.

</biblio>

 Chapter 40: War Destroyed Chechnya’s Clan Structure

Middle East News Online, January 5, 2002

The people of Chechnya, in the Northern Caucus region, have been seeking independence from Russia since the dissolution of the Soviet Union more than a decade ago. In an effort to maintain control over Chechnya, Russia has engaged rebel fighters in a bloody war that has devastated the predominantly Muslim society.

This article by Francesca Mereu appeared two months after Russian president Vladimir Putin announced that the war in Chechnya was also a “war on terrorism.” The piece contains a great deal of information about the disintegration of Chechen social structures, which is described by Russian anthropologists Sergei Arutyunov and Ian Chesnov. According to Arutyunov, the destruction of traditional clans, or taips, has increased the influence of Wahhabi leaders advocating an extremely strict form of Islam.

With the world’s attention largely focused on the U.S-led military campaign in Afghanistan, Russia’s two-year-old war in the breakaway republic of Chechnya—which it defends as a battle against terrorism— continues unabated. The Russian military said on 3 January that it had killed more than 100 rebels in a special operation that ended a week of fierce fighting.

The war—Chechnya’s second such conflict with Russia in a decade —has claimed thousands of lives and has irreparably altered the traditional bonds of religion and family structure that shape Chechen society...

The Chechens of Russia’s North Caucasus region are a tight-knit society based on extended families, or clans, guided by a council of elders. These clans, which traditionally lived together in a single village, are called taips. During Stalin’s infamous deportation of Chechens to Central Asia, the links remained strong between members of a single taip; and even now, as war and social unrest have forced thousands of Chechens to leave their home villages and scatter throughout the republic or abandon the region altogether, the links continue to endure.

There are more than 150 taips in Chechnya, each with its own traditions and council of elders. Respect for elders is paramount in Chechnya, where a clan's oldest members traditionally have the final say. But in recent years, the elders' absolute authority has given way to an arrangement of making recommendations to the taip that can be, but are not always, followed.

According to Sergei Arutyunov, a member of the Russian Academy of Sciences and the head of the Caucasus department at Moscow's Ethnology Institute:

[A] clan may have more or less informal elders. These elders may form a kind of council—a clan council—which may give nonobligatory recommendations. [The elders] have no power to enforce these recommendations. But they may give some valid recommendations, which will probably be more or less followed by the majority of clan members.

Ian Chesnov, an anthropology professor at Russia's State Humanitarian University in Moscow, has spent several years in Chechnya studying cultural traits. Chesnov says that according to Caucasus tradition, a member of a taip is never abandoned in time of trouble. To the contrary, a taip acts as a kind of family network that makes sure all members have the support they need.

The taip forms the core of Chechen society—and, many Chechens believe, predetermines the characteristics and personalities of its members. The perceived link between clan and character type is so strong that taips are considered a key aspect of the region's political life as well.

Chechen warlord Salman Raduev, who in late December was sentenced to life in prison for terrorism and murder, is a member of the Gordaloy taip. His crimes, including a 1996 raid on the southern Russian town of Kizlyar in which 78 people were killed, dishonored all the members of the taip—including Chechen president Aslan Maskhadov, whose wife is a member of the Gordaloy taip.

Valery Batuev, a reporter on Caucasus issues for the Vremya MN, a Russian daily, says Maskhadov—often criticized for what is seen as an inability to maintain control over rival factions within Chechnya—was unable to arrest or condemn Raduev, since doing so would have meant conflicts within the taip.

Chechnya's taips fall into nine distinct "tukums," or tribes. Legend holds that all Chechens descend from an original family of nine brothers, a belief represented by the Chechen symbol, which depicts a wolf encircled by nine stars. Batuev describes the tukums' function:

The taips are organized into nine tukums. A tukum is a politicalmilitary union meant to function in cases of [outside] threats or aggression. [The tukums] used to unify all the [Chechen] nation and the taips.

A tukum has no leader and is composed of a loose group of clans that share a common ancestry. Batuev says that although in the past tukums were able to organize fighting in case of war, in recent times they have played a role that is more symbolic than military. During Chechnya's two latest military conflicts, the tukums had little influence over events.

Together, Chechnya's two wars with Russia have cut its population by half. Many Chechens have fled their homes to escape the bloody conflict, and many have died—some 50,000 in the 1994–1996 war alone. Before that war, Chechnya's population stood at some 1.2 million. By 1999, estimates had dropped to between 600,000 and 780,000 people. The capital city of Grozny once had 400,000 residents. Now, analysts say, there are fewer than 40,000 people remaining.

Such drastic demographic shifts have inevitably left their mark on Chechnya's tukum and taip structures. According to Arutyunov, the republic is undergoing a severe identity crisis.

Just 10 years ago, he says, Chechnya's younger generations had every reason to expect that their lives would progress much as their parents' had—with marriage, children, and the building of a career. This meant that young people still turned to their fathers or taip elders for advice, and the clan's older generations helped arrange good marriages and interesting, well-paid jobs for the young. But now, Arutyunov says, Chechen society has changed:

Now, in most cases, the influence of [older] people is lost, and as a rule—except for some very rich and influential people—a father is hardly in a position to arrange a decent and profitable marriage for his son. He is in no position to put him into any good job. And so the authority, the prestige, the influence of this elder generation is destroyed.

Chechnya's younger people, Arutyunov continues, are disoriented, and are now looking for new authority figures—a search that in many instances leads them to the radical Wahhabi Islamic sect or leaders of criminal rings. The generation gap has gotten so severe, Arutyunov says, that there have been several reported cases of young Chechen men beating their fathers to death. Just a few years ago, this was the strictest taboo in the Chechen social code.

... Islam was introduced into Chechnya over a period of centuries, gaining a number of converts by the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries but not taking firm root until well into the eighteenth and mid-nineteenth centuries.

The Chechens were converted to the Sunni branch of Islam, with particular emphasis on its mystic Sufi form. Sufism has come to mean those who are interested in finding a way or practice toward inner awakening and enlightenment...

More than 800 mosques and numerous Islamic schools were located in Chechnya at the turn of the twentieth century. But from 1928 to 1941, Soviet dictator Josef Stalin tried to eliminate the country's Islamic traditions. Most mosques were closed, and Muslim clerics and believers in the Chechen and Ingush republics were arrested, deported, or executed—in all, some 14,000 people. Sufi spiritual leaders and believers were labeled “counterrevolutionaries”...

In Chechnya and Ingushetia, the control of the organs of Soviet power remained in Russian hands, with no concessions to local authorities, as in other Soviet Muslim republics. Only in 1979 did Soviet authorities allow the opening of a few mosques, to stop the growth of clandestine Sufi brotherhoods. Indeed, the orders themselves organized their own clandestine Arabic classes and schools where the Koran was taught. In Chechnya and Ingushetia, there were 5 legal and 292 clandestine mosques.

When Mikhail Gorbachev’s program of economic, political, and social restructuring, or perestroika, began in 1986, it also brought about wage cuts, price hikes, food shortages, and unemployment. The North Caucasus republics were not spared. On the one hand, massive unemployment caused the rise of criminal structures, destabilizing Chechen society. On the other hand, people enjoyed more religious freedom.

... Sufi brotherhoods were unable to function in the new conditions. The sheiks were able to exercise their moral authority only in conditions of relative social peace. But from the start of perestroika, that peace was under threat. This situation encouraged the spreading of a fundamentalist movement called Wahhabism.

Said Yakhyev is a Sufi spiritual leader who teaches Islam at Moscow State University. Yakhyev lived in Chechnya during perestroika. He explains how and why this radical Islamic religious movement took easy root in Chechnya:

Wahhabism in Chechnya began to spread in the 1980s in the period of glasnost, when [new] things were allowed. And people who got freedom [for the first time] began to think about a new kind of religion, about new ideas. It was very fashionable at the time. Wahhabism was able to spread in Chechnya because at the time nobody was able to face it and to negate its false dogmas.

There was no real religious opposition to it, and now it is the same...

The Wahhabis' influence became stronger in Chechnya after the Russian military campaigns in the republic. Many years of war impoverished and destabilized Chechen society, and the Wahhabis used this situation to their advantage...

Today, many families have lost everything in the wars. Few can afford to continue the burial tradition. Some families are forced to borrow money for funeral banquets. According to Arutyunov, it is now common for young members of a family to tell people who arrive for a funeral to leave. And these impressionable young people, after listening to Wahhabi leaders, begin to believe that the burial tradition is wrong and in opposition to real Muslim principles. According to the Wahhabis, Islamic law forbids rejoicing or eating at the funeral of a fellow Muslim.

Arutyunov says many young people are beginning to think the Wahhabis teach principles that have more relevance to current life in Chechnya.

It is strongly contrary to [Chechen] customary laws and habits, but many people will listen and say, "This guy [a Wahhabi leader] is right." He has reasons to talk so. Indeed, the custom is bad, because fulfilling the custom means to ruin his family.

In 1999, correspondent Oleg Kusov interviewed young people in Gudermes, the second-largest town in Chechnya. They told him they would follow the Wahhabi principles because the Wahhabis gave them $100 a month—a large amount of money the traditional Sufi orders are unlikely to be able to pay.

... The differences between the Wahhabi followers and the Sufi can best be understood in their differing concepts of the jihad:

Wahhabis follow the old concept of jihad, meaning the holy war to convert the infidels. The Sufis have another interpretation of jihad. They see it not as a war against the infidels, but as a war that a Muslim has to fight against his own defects to try to reach perfection.

The Russian military refers to Chechen field commanders as Wahhabis. But Anna Politkovskaya, a journalist with Novaya Gazeta who has covered the Russian-Chechen conflict, contends that this is a mistake.

According to Politkovskaya, Chechen field commanders loyal to Chechen leader Aslan Maskhadov defend Chechen national traditions and oppose fundamentalist groups like the Wahhabis, since they believe they will destabilize Chechen national unity. Another group, according to Politkovskaya, consists of those who surround field commanders like Shamil Basaev and Khattab. This group seeks an Arab-style Islamization of Chechnya.

The Sufi brotherhoods try to keep their distance from the conflict. With no end to the war in sight, many believers and spiritual leaders have left Chechnya for neighboring Ingushetia or Russia...

 Suggestions for Further Reading

<biblio>

Holloman, Regina E., and S. Arutyunov, eds.

1978 Perspectives on Ethnicity. The Hague: Mouton.

Wehling, Fred, and S. Arutyunov, eds.

1995 Ethnic Conflict and Russian Intervention in the Caucasus. La Jolla: University of California, San Diego Institute on Conflict and Cooperation.

</biblio>

* Part VI: Examining Militarism and the “War on Terror”

 Chapter 41: U.S. Anti-terrorist Message Won’t Fly in Islamic World

Pacific News Service, October 11, 2001 [[http://www.pacificnews.org][www.pacificnews.org]]

WILLIAM O. BEEMAN

Many anthropologists use historical analysis to help understand contemporary human cultures and soci eties. In this article, William O. Beeman explains that for many people in the Islamic world—particularly in the Middle East—the “war on terror” declared by George W. Bush in the days following the September 11 attacks may appear continuous with centuries of colonial domination at the hands of British, French, Russian, and American empires.

President George W. Bush has stated that the United States is fighting terrorism—not Islam—in its military response to the September 11 attacks. But Muslims throughout the world dismiss this admirable notion, perceiving America’s deeds to be at odds with its words. They say the United States is continuing a familiar pattern of exploitation by Western nations in the Middle East.

The colonial powers of Europe—Great Britain, France, and Russia— began their exploitation of the Islamic world shortly after the establishment of the industrial revolution in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Before that time, Middle Eastern nations had an arguably superior civilization to that of Europe. But the industrializing Europeans suddenly leapfrogged over the rest of the world with superior transportation, military power, and economic institutions. They made incursions into the Islamic world, gobbling up territory and bankrupting traditional manufacturing, such as textiles. With faster ships and advanced financial institutions, they bypassed Middle Eastern middlemen in trading with East and Southeast Asia.

The Middle Eastern rulers were desperate for cash to modernize their nations. They therefore entered into a devil's bargain with Europeans, selling "concessions" to the agricultural, mineral, financial, and transportation rights of their nations. The rulers were enriched in these deals, and so were the Europeans.

However, the people of these countries lost their patrimony.

This touched off two great Islamic anticolonial movements. One was led by Jamal al-Din al-Afghani, an Iranian, who preached Islamic reform and resistance to colonial powers in the late-nineteenth century. The other movement was led by the Jadidists—intellectuals in Tataristan, a Turkic region in southern Russia, who encouraged the peoples of the Caucasus and Central Asia to break away from Europe and establish their own national identities.

The Islamic resistance did not stop the Europeans from pursuing military and economic dominance in the Middle East until the end of World War II. Adding insult to injury was a perceived contempt on the part of Europeans for Middle Eastern civilization.

Following World War II, a series of coups and revolutions brought nationalist governments to the fore throughout the region. The Islamic resistance had begun. The West reacted by identifying compliant rulers with a talent for autocratic rule and propping them up with guns and financial support. This seemed to perpetuate the nineteenth century pattern of alliance between Europeans and corrupt local rulers with the aim of exploiting local people.

After 1972 Great Britain withdrew entirely from the region, and the United States, fearful of Soviet influence, stepped up its presence with military, political, and economic support for local rulers in Iran, Egypt, Saudi Arabia, and Kuwait, among others.

Now in America’s fight against terrorism, its principal partners are again Great Britain and Russia. People in the Islamic world look at this current alliance and immediately see the same nineteenth-century actors carrying out the same pattern of damaging behavior. Even the current rulers of the region realize this, and have backpedaled and equivocated to avoid appearing to be pawns of the United States. No matter how much President Bush protests that we are not attacking Islam, his credibility in the Middle East is zero.

To make the American message believable, Washington must at least acknowledge the unfortunate historic pattern of colonialist exploitation, with which it has become linked, and make a plausible declaration of a break with the past. The people of the region would greet an appeal for a new era in U.S.-Middle East relations with understandable skepticism at first. However, if America followed these words with credible deeds—such as full internationalization of military forces in the Gulf region, and provision of strong leadership to solve the dilemma of Israeli-Palestinian relations—President Bush might be able to persuade the Islamic world to believe his sentiments.

 Suggestion for Further Reading

<biblio>

Beeman, William O.

1986 Language, Status, and Power in Iran. Bloomington: University of Indiana Press.

</biblio>

 Chapter 42: Terror and Indigenous Peoples: War Without End

CounterPunch, November 3, 2001

[[http://www.counterpunch.org][www.counterpunch.org]]

DAVID PRICE

After George W. Bush declared a vaguely defined “war on terrorism,” he immediately began seeking new international allies. Russia, China, and Israel quickly adopted the language of antiterrorism to condemn the self-determination struggles of the Chechens, Uighurs, and Palestinians, respectively—all groups that have legitimate territorial disputes with the nation-states that rule them.

In this selection David Price warns that some nation-states could use the war on terrorism as a pretext to initiate or intensify the repression of indigenous people and ethnic and religious minorities around the world.

When President Bush declared war on terrorism with his neo-McCarthyistic threat to the world that “you are either with us or with the terrorists,” he struck a chord with many frightened Americans, but other peoples around the world heard other important harmonics within this chord. For many of the world’s indigenous peoples, these words brought terror and anticipation of new levels of outright oppression from the nation-states that repressively surround and manage them.

In the time since this declaration, the president has not clarified who these new terrorist enemies are, and the administration and its allies have since carefully avoided defining just who is and who isn't a terrorist—beyond this initial defining claim that they are those who are against "us." The administration understands that any behavioral definition of terrorism risks exposing the nonsense of behaviorally distinguishing between such categories of actors as terrorists, freedom fighters, and military forces. The relativist adage that the difference between a terrorist and a freedom fighter depends on who owns the newspaper that reports on their actions, seems to be forgotten by many on the American left who watched Washington play roughshod with the self-determination of peoples of Central America in the 1980s. While a few pundits note the dangers of engaging in a war without any identifiable landmark of victory, there are equally real dangers to many minority populations around the world if the governments managing their native lands are given the green light to repress them as "terrorists."

As the United Nations supports new antiterrorist policies, we find new levels of cooperation and agreement among member nations, though these talks occur with an explicit agreement that terrorism shall remain undefined. Concerns are being raised by international human rights groups and the German foreign minister that these policies will usher in high levels of state terrorism against minority populations, but for the most part these objections have been suppressed in the interest of a newfound unity of purpose.

There are growing fears among anthropologists and others who work with indigenous peoples around the world that this new secret war on terrorism will have devastating effects on indigenous peoples' struggles for human rights and political recognition. Many fear that Secretary of State Powell, the coalition builder, will purchase the cooperation and approval of national leaders around the world by adopting policies in which the United States will not protest or intervene when these states suppress and annihilate their own ethnic minority populations. When police and military units use force against these groups, their actions are "legitimate," while the use of these same tactics—even defensively—by indigenous groups, minority populations or separatist groups, become "terrorism."

As Powell signals Russia that the U.S. can learn to see their bloody war in Chechnya as part of the global war on terrorism, this signal is welcomed by other world leaders wishing a free hand to deal with their own domestic indigenous troubles. Most of the world's nationstates maintain hostile relations with one or more troublesome domestic groups contesting power relations; these hostile relations are frequently marked by violence and counterviolence. The idiom of power dictates that the violence of the state is legitimized as peace keeping, while that of the dispossessed becomes terrorism. But acts of "terrorism" are not limited to acts of violence. The range of nonviolent actions that have in the past been defined as terrorism is disturbing and has included teaching native languages and engaging in outlawed religious or cultural ceremonies.

The world is filled with peoples who have legitimate, historical disputes with the nation-states that rule them. Whether it is the Basques in Spain, the Irish in the United Kingdom, the Tamils in Sri Lanka, Zapatistas in Mexico, Chechens in Russia, or hundreds of other groups of native peoples, there are contentious battles for power that will rapidly become even more lopsided if the current hysteria of ill-defined antiterrorism is allowed to continue. The postcolonial wars of Africa smolder along ethnic lines in which minorities and the lesser-armed are freely defined as terrorists. We need to demand that our government clarify what deals have been made with other governments regarding their treatment of native peoples.

While many of the payoffs to client nations for joining the U.S.-led coalition before the [1991] Gulf War were monetary (for example, the U.S. forgave half of Egypt's crippling $60 billion dollar debt for symbolically joining the Western coalition), there are signs that one currency of payoff in the war on "terrorism" will be the granting of a new degree of latitude for coalition members to oppress their troublesome internal resistance groups. Powell seems willing to encourage such potentially genocidal tit-for-tat arrangements if this will buy him a coalition willing to risk the wrath of this new yet-to-be-named enemy.

While the current military focus is on Afghanistan and the surrounding region, the Bush administration's suggestion that this could be a 40-year war on terrorism, much like the Cold War, threatens to bring harm to hundreds of indigenous groups around the world. Currently, many on the American left appear divided in their opposition to and support for this new Afghan war. Be this as it may, the left must resist the temptation to transfer this newfound fear of “terrorism” into support for the oppression of indigenous peoples around the globe.

 Suggestions for Further Reading

<biblio>

Price, David

2002 “Past Wars, Present Dangers, Future Anthropologies.” Anthropology Today 18, no. 1: 3–6.

Sluka, Jeffrey A. (ed.)

2000 Death Squad: The Anthropology of State Terror. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.

</biblio>

 Chapter 43: Afghan War Could Be Recruiting Tool for Terrorists

Syracuse Post-Standard, November 8, 2001

JOHN BURDICK

This piece, written by John Burdick in the weeks following the U.S. air attacks over Afghanistan, sounds a warning call. He argues that if the Afghan conflict results in civilian casualties and exacerbates humanitarian crises, it could help extremists find new recruits among those suffering the consequences of war. The same might be said of the broader international “war on terror” spearheaded by the United States.

Although the demise of the Taliban occurred relatively rapidly (by November 2001 they had abandoned all major Afghan cities), U.S. bombing over targets in Afghanistan—and the resulting civilian casualties—continues as this book goes to press, and political instability bordering on lawlessness plagues much of the country’s territory.[55]

When I watch the news of U.S. military action in Afghanistan, my biggest question is: How does this action make the world safer for my two elementary-school-aged children?

Unfortunately, the more I learn about the situation, the more I believe that attacking Afghanistan is making the world a more, not less, dangerous place, and making terrorist attacks more, not less, likely on U.S. citizens here and abroad.

When I listen carefully to our leaders, the message I hear is that this military action cannot really reduce the power of al-Qaeda itself. They have told us that we are dealing with a loose network of cells with operatives in up to 60 countries who can work independently from multiple locations, and that even as communications are cut from Afghanistan, threats to U.S. citizens are so real and constant that we must learn to live with them “indefinitely.” Our own secretary of defense has said the aim is no longer to get Osama bin Laden, and that he doubts we will ever catch him. We are dealing with a multiple-headed Hydra— hit it in one place and it pops up in another.

Meanwhile, the longer it takes to overthrow the Taliban, the more dangerous this military strategy becomes. Our leaders are telling us that replacing the Taliban may take a very long time indeed. If the fight is going to be long, that means civilian casualties will mount, and the likelihood of many Afghans dying from starvation increases. As the war drags on, more and more people throughout the world are likely to become convinced that this is a war against Muslims. They will respond as they already are doing, by entering a jihad against the United States.

I have read reports that there are thousands of Muslims congregating on the border with Afghanistan, ready to fight the United States; thousands more are signing up in countries like Indonesia, the largest Muslim nation in the world.

The U.S. response so far has simply been to threaten yet more military action, against yet more countries. Do we intend to threaten, simultaneously, up to 60 countries with military action? Even though all the evidence we have is that there is no quicker way to shore up shaky authoritarian regimes than by attacking them—as we have learned in Iraq and Libya, for example? And as civilians die in any such attacks, that the United States is only increasing the will of others to fight against us, expanding the pool of people throughout the world who are so enraged that they line up to enter into terrorist cells?

Our leaders tell us that one of the most important ways to combat terrorism is to “dry up the swamp” in which they operate. That makes sense to me. But that must mean more than cutting off their financial lifelines. It should mean draining the motivations from the people who are now ready and willing to march as recruits in their shadowy armies.

There is a realistic alternative to the present policy. Before October 7, the United States was leading a broad-based effort to form an international coalition that could endure the test of time. Never before had the United States enjoyed so much international sympathy—a sentiment fast disappearing as bombs fall on Kabul. With that sympathy, the United States had already won two unprecedented victories: the withdrawal of many millions of dollars in aid to the Taliban from Saudi Arabia and Pakistan. By freezing bin Laden’s assets and gaining high-quality intelligence from nearby countries, we would have denied the Taliban their main incentive for protecting bin Laden: millions in protection money.

By launching a campaign of words that separated bin Laden as Saudi from the Afghan people, that separated him as a fanatic from peaceloving Muslims everywhere, we could have “drained the swamp” of his supporters and demonstrated to the world that pluralistic democracy, not fundamentalism, enjoys the moral high ground in the world. Backed by a genuine, strong coalition to provide intelligence and cooperation on cutting off aid from the Taliban, and turning to the United Nations for the possible enforcement of international law, we could have pressured the Taliban to turn over bin Laden.

Of course, such a policy would have been slow. But our leaders have urged us to be patient. I take them at their word. If we can be patient while thousands of people are being killed and dying, we certainly can be patient while they are not. If we can be patient while the world is becoming a more dangerous place for ourselves and our children, certainly we can be patient while they are not.

[55] See Dexter Filkins, “Flaws in U.S. Air War Left Hundreds of Civilians Dead,” New York Times, July 21, 2002. See also Robert Fisk, “Afghanistan Is on the Brink of Another Disaster,” The Independent, August 14, 2002.

 Chapter 44: First, Know the Enemy, Then Act

Los Angeles Times, December 9, 2001

DALE F. EICKELMAN

Following the attacks of September 11, the mass media, U.S. policy makers, and others began to focus on a possible culprit: a decentralized international network known as Al-Qaeda, with roots in Afghanistan among the multinational force of mujahedeen fighters once supported by the CIA. In this article, Dale F. Eickelman argues against the “fundamentalist” stereotypes often associated with terrorist attacks against U.S. targets. He maintains that Al Qaeda is thoroughly modern and makes effective use of new media to communicate with millions of people across the Middle East and beyond.

Eickelman concludes with a point emphasized in many of the commentaries in this volume—that the best long-term counterterrorism strategy for the United States would involve encouraging Middle Eastern countries to respond to their populations’ demands for political self-determination.

In retrospect, the December 2000 report of the U.S. National Intelligence Council, Global Trends 2015, was chillingly prescient. It predicted that “terrorist tactics will become increasingly sophisticated and designed to achieve mass casualties.” At the same time, it envisioned a trend away from state-supported political terrorism and toward “more diverse, free-wheeling, transnational networks—enabled by information technology.” It forecast attacks “on U.S. soil.”

Now that those attacks have come, America will have to devise strategies to cope with terrorism—as have, to greater and lesser effect, England, Northern Ireland, France, Spain, Colombia, Peru, Sri Lanka, Japan, Algeria, Turkey, and Israel.

As each of those countries has come to realize, the first step is to know one’s enemy. Al Qaeda differs from other terrorist movements in selecting targets on a global rather than a regional or local scale and in using tactics that initially defied the imaginations of the most experienced counterterrorist specialists. Al Qaeda is also thoroughly modern, representing the dark side of globalization. Its membership transcends national boundaries, drawing from Muslim countries throughout the Middle East and South Asia.

In a strange irony, the group’s multinational makeup has its roots in the U.S. and Saudi-approved recruitment of transnational Arab and other foreign fighters to the cause of expelling the Soviets from Afghanistan after they invaded in 1979. Al Qaeda, whose leadership includes many first drawn to Afghanistan in support of the anti-Soviet cause, has developed into a flexible multinational organization. Despite determined international surveillance, it has moved cash, people, and weapons across frontiers.

Like the drug lords of Colombia in the 1980s, Al Qaeda is defensively organized. Its chain of command is not formal and hierarchical, so it is less open to destruction and interdiction. The Colombian drug lords offered plata o plomo—silver or lead, a bribe or a bullet—to induce cooperation or acquiescence. Al Qaeda, claiming to act in the name of Islam, pays out less than the drug barons because it makes stronger ideological claims. Its message may appeal only to a tiny minority, but, for that minority, Al Qaeda's ideological appeals, calls to action, and track record are convincing.

In part, the group's success can be traced to its ability to effectively use the tools of the pop culture it rejects. An Al Qaeda recruitment video that circulated widely in the Middle East prior to September 11 demonstrated that the group's propaganda skills reached the "Arab street"—its target audience—more effectively than the Western superpowers or many Arab governments. The video begins with the attack on the USS Cole. It then moves to a quick-cut montage of aggression against Muslims in Palestine, Jerusalem, Lebanon, Chechnya, Kashmir, and Indonesia. Many of the images are from Western news clips that still bear the BBC or CNN logos. The scenes are juxtaposed with images ofa scholarly bin Laden, posing in front of bookshelves or seated on the ground like a religious scholar. Then, putting to rest any thought that this is an organization of wimps, come clips of Al Qaeda military training in Afghanistan, including target practice on a projected image of Bill Clinton.

So, knowing the enemy, how do we devise strategies for managing the risk of living in a world with Al Qaeda? The war against terrorism has already brought short-term abridgements of human rights and political liberties, both domestically and internationally—especially in Central Asia and the Middle East. But these are not long-term solutions to reducing the threat posed by Al Qaeda and like-minded groups and may even be counterproductive.

Addressing underlying issues of poverty, unemployment, and global economic imbalances—however desirable—is also not sufficient. Poverty and unemployment do not in themselves breed terrorism. Many of the most dedicated terrorists and advocates of extreme violence are affluent professionals or scions of the middle class. And some members of Al Qaeda's top leadership—including bin Laden and his Egyptian colleague, medical doctor Ayman Zawahiri—come from the wealthiest stratum of society.

Yet, they have grasped what the U.S. and its allies have not: how to appeal to disaffected elements of the Arab street, an increasingly educated public that today has access to a wide range of uncensored media and information that creates a desire for accountability from governments. In villages and small towns in Egypt and Iraq in the late 1960s, I frequently saw men at coffee shops or seated in circles, with one of the few literates reading aloud to the others. In Morocco in the early 1970s, rural people sometimes asked me to "translate" newscasts from the standard transnational Arabic of the state radio into their colloquial Arabic. Today this is no longer required. Mass education and new communications technologies enable large numbers of Arabs to hear and see Al Qaeda's message directly.

The growth—and challenge—of this new public was widely recognized in U.S. policy circles well before September 11. In testimony before the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence in February 2001, CIA Director George J. Tenet cited the Arab street, in explaining that "the right catalyst—such as the outbreak of Israeli-Palestinian violence —can move people to act. Through access to the Internet and other means of communication, a restive public is increasingly capable of taking action without any identifiable leadership or organizational structure."

Because many governments in the Middle East are deeply suspicious of an open press, nongovernmental organizations, and open expression, it is no surprise that the public is increasingly influenced by the often extreme and hard-to-censor "new media." Leadership can remain anonymous, an advantage in the Middle East, which, in general, has a democracy deficit and a demonstrated propensity for cracking down on critics.

One consequence of this democracy deficit is to magnify the power of the street in the Arab world. Bin Laden speaks in the vivid language of popular Islamic preachers and builds on a deep and widespread resentment against the West and local ruling elites identified with it. The lack of formal outlets to express diverse political opinions makes it easier for terrorists like bin Laden, who cloaks himself in religion, to hijack some in his audience and motivate a lethal few to action.

We must accept that there will always be ideas available to justify intolerance and violence, and there will also always be ways for terrorists to manipulate open societies for their own nefarious ends. Countering radical ideologies and theologies of violence is not easy. Yet, the very proliferation of voices arguing in open debate about the role of Islam in the modern world and in contemporary society can contribute significantly to defusing terrorist appeals to the street. Public opinion is easier to hijack in the absence of full debate. Without public discussion, ideas are reduced to their simplest and starkest terms. That is why British prime minister Tony Blair's response to Al Qaeda videotaped propaganda on Qatar's Al Jazeera satellite TV last October—he immediately asked Al Jazeera for equal time to reply—was more appropriate than the first U.S. response, which was to call for censoring the broadcast of Al Qaeda tapes.

The best long-term way to mitigate the continuing threat of terrorism is to encourage Middle Eastern states to be more responsive to their populations' demands for participation. Some countries, including some of our allies, see such "open society" activities as subversive—as Egypt demonstrated in May when a security court sentenced civil rights activist Saad Eddin Ibrahim to seven years of hard labor for criticizing the regime and calling into question the fairness of recent elections.

It is no easy job to convince Arab states that it is in their interest to create open societies. But they must recognize that increasing levels of education, greater ease of travel, and the rise of new communications media are turning the Arab street into a public sphere in which large numbers of people—and not just a political and economic elite—want a say in governance and public issues. Some countries, like Morocco, have been moving steadily in that direction. The terrorist option has no appeal to Moroccans. They have a greater stake in their society. The example of neighboring Algeria offers Moroccans a harrowing example of the alternative, and the Moroccan street speaks of it often.

There are liberal as well as illiberal voices in the Middle East and multiple contenders for the guardianship and interpretation of Islamic beliefs and values. Giving larger numbers of people a greater stake in decision-making in their societies and the opportunity to express their views will undermine the appeal of the terrorist alternative—and diminish its appeal to the street.

 Chapter 45: Sept. 11 Exposes Futile Search for “Perfect” Missile Defense

Syracuse Post-Standard, December 18, 2001

JOHN BURDICK

In this article, John Burdick exposes the folly of George W. Bush’s abandonment of the international Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty in order to pursue the development of a missile defense shield. He reminds us that the events of September 11 demonstrate that low-tech weapons may be deployed with devastating effects, and that the creation of a missile defense program would only encourage China, India, and Pakistan to build up their nuclear stockpiles.

When placed in the context of Bush’s opposition to the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty (see Chapter 21) and the “Nuclear Posture Review” recently prepared by the Bush administration, which recommends research and possible development of “mini-nukes,” Burdick’s message is all the more urgent.

President George Bush’s declaration that the United States will withdraw from the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty in six months’ time is a grave mistake that will have very negative, unanticipated consequences. The president says the United States needs a free hand to develop its missile-defense shield. Many Americans see the attacks of September 11 as justifying missile defense more than ever. Upon more careful consideration, however, I hope they will realize that going ahead with missile defense is wrong.

Is it possible to build an impenetrable missile-defense shield? Some think we could pull it off. After all, if we split the atom and put a man on the moon, why shouldn't we be able to create a system that will distinguish, in a split second, dummy from real missiles thousands of miles away, target them with pinpoint accuracy and destroy them? Maybe we can. The problem is that the task is not just to create a system that can do this, but that can do it flawlessly.

In the history of inventions, there has never been the need to create a perfect system. Putting men on the moon, even splitting atoms, are accomplishments that allow for margins of error. If a moon-ship lands 10 feet off of the bull's-eye, or atoms in an atom-smasher escape being smashed, no cities are thereby incinerated. Never before have scientists and engineers been asked to create a system in which a tiny imperfection could result in the deaths of millions.

[[r-j-roberto-j-gonzalez-anthropologists-in-the-publ-10.png]]

So heavy is this weight that last year, 50 Nobel prize-winning physicists from around the world signed a letter to the president stating their judgment that a perfect shield could not be built, and that therefore no such system should be pursued. Even Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld agrees a perfect system cannot be built; but his conclusion is that "even an imperfect shield can serve as a deterrent."

But is it? Why, in the end, would countries with nuclear capabilities be deterred from shooting an ICBM at us? Quite simply, because of our capacity to retaliate immediately with overwhelming force to easily traced missile launch pads. Some countries might be headed up by madmen willing to sacrifice their people for the joy of seeing a mushroom cloud over the United States. But one cannot have it both ways. If we are dealing with madmen, then why should we expect an imperfect shield would deter them? If we accept that they may be deterred at all, then we should simply rely on the strongest kind of deterrence—the threat of retaliation. That is, we should rely on the basic principles of the ABM Treaty, as we have for the last 30 years.

Now it is said the real threat may in fact no longer be “rogue” states; it is, rather, groups such as al-Qaeda. If Osama bin Laden and his followers were willing to kill thousands, wouldn’t they be willing to kill millions? Certainly. But being willing and being able are entirely different things. Terrorists cannot launch intercontinental missiles; they wreak havoc with low-cost attacks, such as flying airplanes into buildings or releasing biological or “dirty radiation” bombs. The attacks of September 11 have demonstrated that the United States was looking in the wrong place for what threatens us. Low-tech, nonnuclear attacks are the most clear and present danger facing the United States, not nuclear-tipped rockets.

Missile defense could be chalked up as simple misallocation of funds, were not its international consequences so grave. China has already stated that if we start building a defense shield, it will increase its nuclear arsenal in order to overwhelm it. If China does this, India and then Pakistan will feel pressured to follow suit. Russia, in turn, has stated that, faced with the new U.S. policy, it will stop reducing, and may increase its own nuclear arsenal.

In such a world, no country will have an incentive to invest resources in nonproliferation of nuclear materials, making the likelihood of these materials ending up in the hands of terrorists (in the form of “dirty bombs” deliverable in the back of pickup trucks) all the more likely.

A world in which the United States has withdrawn from the ABM Treaty is thus inherently a more dangerous world. It is more urgent than ever that Bush reconsider his stand that the treaty is a relic of the past. It just may be the safeguard of the future.

 Chapter 46: Ignorance is Not Bliss

San Francisco Chronicle, January 2, 2002

ROBERTO J. GONZÁLEZ

Throughout the U.S. military campaign in Afghanistan (which began in October 2001), the mainstream media in the United States effectively ignored the question of civilian casualties—euphemistically called “collateral damage” by Pentagon and Defense Department officials. As in the case of the [1991] Persian Gulf War, the Pentagon maintained strict control over access to battle zones and asked reporters to submit materials for review. But by December 2001, credible reports of high numbers of civilian casualties began to appear in the alternative and European media.[56]

In this article, Roberto J. González draws attention to the issue of civilian casualties and the complacent role played by the corporate media cartel. His piece was published following a U.S. air attack over a village in Afghanistan’s Paktia province, in which approximately fifty civilians were killed.

Since the publication of this article, U.S. attacks on civilians have continued, including most recently a July 2002 bombing raid on a wedding party in the village of Kakrak, in which more than fifty people were killed.

For the past three months, Pentagon officials have veiled an essential aspect of the “war on terrorism”: civilian casualties in Afghanistan. Blocking access to information about the human costs of U.S. bombing—and its consequences—might create a dangerous future for Americans.

Such restrictions keep us from understanding how the rest of the world views the war, and why it might provoke future attacks on the United States. They may also breed complacency, ignorance, and national insecurity.

Measures taken by military officials obscure information about the effects of U.S. bombing.

[[r-j-roberto-j-gonzalez-anthropologists-in-the-publ-11.png]]

For example, since October 11, the Pentagon has purchased exclusive rights to all satellite images from Space Imaging, a U.S. company that produces accurate pictures that might allow independent media to survey bomb damage.

In addition, U.S. bombs destroyed Al-Jazeera's television station in Kabul in October. The Qatar-based independent network reaches much of the Arab world and frequently broadcasts images from Afghanistan.

Official acknowledgment of civilian deaths has been minimal.

Descriptions of heavily bombed frontline positions never mention that they sometimes traverse densely populated neighborhoods. Frequently, officials claim that civilian deaths "cannot be independently confirmed."

Yet, according to a recent report by Professor Marc Herold, an economist at the University of New Hampshire, the number of Afghan civilians killed by American bombs has surpassed casualties from September 11.

Herold's report—the first independent survey of its kind—claims that 3,767 civilian deaths were caused by U.S. bombing between October 7 and December 10. Not included are indirect deaths caused by land mines or lack of water, food, or medicine.

The data, drawn from independent news sources and firsthand accounts, include: dates, locations, types of munitions used, and sources. Much of it is based upon mainstream British, French, and Indian press agencies such as the BBC and the India Times.

While respected news agencies abroad have reviewed Herold’s report, the American media have largely ignored it. Only a few journals and Internet sites and the radio program Democracy Now! have analyzed it.

Why have the U.S. media missed the story?

Part of the explanation may be related to the industry itself. Recent mergers between media corporations have homogenized news, especially television news. AOL/Time Warner, Viacom, News Corporation, Disney, and GE own CNN, CBS News, Fox News, ABC News and NBC, respectively.

Many Americans rely exclusively upon this cartel for information on the “war on terrorism,” which is presented more as entertainment than news.

Broadcasts include repetitive accounts of the search for Osama bin Laden, trivia about weapons, war images that resemble video games, and footage of cheerful Afghans trimming their beards and playing music.

These pictures are punctuated by angry pundits and politicians who reduce complex events to simplified formulas (“good versus evil”) using language reminiscent of Hollywood Westerns (“dead or alive”).

Whether such misinformation stems from Pentagon pressure, fear of offending advertisers, or shabby journalism is largely irrelevant. The effect is the same: Warfare is presented as light entertainment.

While American viewers remain oblivious, Europeans, Asians, and others have access to information about the catastrophic effects of U.S. bombing.

They have seen images of dead and wounded civilians and the many widows, widowers, and orphans created by Operation Enduring Freedom.

Many are convinced that this is a U.S. crusade against Islam, and with each passing week, violent “blowback”—the CIA’s term for unintended foreign policy consequences—appears more likely.

Ignorance may be dangerous in the current climate.

Murky official statements and a distracted mass media deny us information which might help prevent future attacks.

George Orwell once noted that in free societies, censorship is more sophisticated and thorough than in dictatorships because “unpopular ideas can be silenced, and inconvenient facts kept dark, without any need for an official ban.”

But keeping Americans in the dark about inconvenient facts in Afghanistan is reckless at best, and potentially dangerous.

Civilian deaths should be openly acknowledged by the Pentagon and reported by the mass media if we wish to minimize the possibility of future attacks on American soil.

[56] See “Afghan Civilian Death Toll Rises,” Financial Times, December 24, 2001. See also Seumas Milne, “The Innocent Dead in a Coward’s War,” The Guardian, December 20, 2001.

 Suggestion for Further Reading

<biblio>

Herman, Edward S., and Noam Chomsky

1988 Manufacturing Consent: The Political Economy of the Mass Media. New York: Pantheon.

</biblio>

 Chapter 46: Turn Off Your Tunnel Vision

Washington Post, January 6, 2002

MAHMOOD MAMDANI

By the beginning of 2002, the U.S. “war on terror” had expanded to many countries, including the Philippines, Georgia, Afghanistan, Pakistan, Yemen, and Somalia, among others. Professor Mahmood Mamdani cautions that an overly zealous search for Al Qaeda members could negatively affect U.S.-African relations if it leads to repression or state terrorism directed against Africans. He recalls the “American embrace of terrorism” in Angola, Mozambique, and other countries throughout the Cold War, and U.S. complacency in the years following.

The Pentagon’s search for al Qaeda members in Somalia is the latest indication that September 11 could have an adverse effect on U.S. relations with African nations. To understand why, think back to 1975, when the United States was defeated in Indochina and the Portuguese empire collapsed in Africa. The same events that Africans celebrated as ushering in the end of European colonialism opened a new phase in the Cold War: There was a shift, not only in the Cold War’s center of gravity from Indochina to southern Africa, but also in the methods of waging it. Official America harnessed, even cultivated, terrorism in the struggle against movements it saw as Soviet proxies. Yes, I do mean “terrorism,” which Washington supports when it backs groups for whom the preferred method of operation is destroying the infrastructure of civilian life.

The post-Vietnam embrace of terrorism did not end with the Cold War. Right up until September 11, America counseled African governments to “reconcile” with terrorist groups. Since then, that has given way to a demand for justice. But just as reconciliation became a code word for impunity, the danger now is that “justice” will mean bloody revenge.

Reconciliation became a strategy to undermine newly won state independence; the campaign against terrorism risks demonizing dissent.

I was a young lecturer at the University of Dar-es-Salaam in Tanzania in 1975, and I remember well the U.S. approach to southern Africa then and in the years that followed. Faced with the possibility of a decisive victory in Angola by the MPLA, the Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola, which it saw as a Soviet proxy, Washington encouraged South Africa to intervene militarily in support of UNITA, the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola. But South African military assistance only tarnished UNITA with the brush of apartheid and weakened it. Preoccupied with how to bring South Africa out of political isolation to contain movements such as the MPLA, the Reagan administration announced a major policy shift: “constructive engagement” with the apartheid regime.

The American embrace of terrorism was global—in Angola; in Mozambique, where it supported RENAMO, the Mozambique National Resistance; in Nicaragua (the contras); and in Afghanistan (the mujahedeen). Terrorism distinguished itself from guerrilla war by making civilians its preferred target. What official America today calls collateral damage was not an unfortunate byproduct of war; it was the very point of terrorism. And the point of collateral damage was never military, always political.

When South Africa curtailed assistance to UNITA in 1991, U.S. aid was stepped up. The hope was that terrorism would deliver a political victory in Angola, as it had indeed in Nicaragua. The logic was simple: If the level of collateral damage could be made unacceptably high, the people would surely vote the terrorists into power.

Even after the Cold War, the tolerance for terror remained high. The callous Western response to the 1994 genocide in Rwanda was no exception. Nor was January 6, 1999, when Revolutionary United Front gunmen maimed and raped their way across Freetown, Sierra Leone, killing more than 5,000 civilians in a day. The U.S. response was to pressure the government to share power with the rebels.

If the Cold War was an umbrella under which America sheltered right-wing dictators in power and embraced terrorists out of power, the danger is now the temptation to view Africa while preoccupied with a single overriding concern—this time terrorism—and to once again ignore African realities.

 Suggestions for Further Reading

<biblio>

Mamdani, Mahmood

1996 Citizen and Subject: Contemporary Africa and the Legacy of Late Colonialism. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

2001 When Victims Become Killers: Colonialism, Nativism, and the Genocide in Rwanda. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

Mamdani, Mahmood, ed.

2000 Beyond Culture Talk and Rights Talk: Comparative Essays on the Politics of Rights and Culture. New York: St. Martin’s Press.

</biblio>

 Chapter 47: The Roots of Muslim Separatism in the Philippines

AsiaSource, January 2002
[[http://www.asiasource.org][www.asiasource.org]]

In January 2001, the United States announced that it would send six hundred military “advisers” to help train Philippine troops for battle with armed Muslim separatists on the southern island of Mindanao. Critics immediately charged that the “war on terror” might take the form of an American-led worldwide crackdown on separatists challenging the hegemony of U.S. allies, no matter how corrupt or repressive they might be. In the following interview, Thomas McKenna discusses the history of Muslim separatism in the Philippines and also analyzes the effects of Spanish and American colonialism on Muslim identity.

NERMEEN SHAIKH: The South of the Philippines, where the minority Muslim population is concentrated, managed to evade Spanish colonialism for 300 years. Could you please explain the significance of this, if any, for Muslim-Christian relations in the postcolonial context?

THOMAS MCKENNA: Because of their evasion of Spanish colonialism, Philippine Muslims comprise the largest category of unhispanicized inhabitants of the Philippines. Although they live in the only predominately Christian country in Southeast Asia, they share their religious culture with the neighboring majority Muslim nations of Indonesia and Malaysia. They also retain aspects of an indigenous pre-Islamic and precolonial Philippine culture — expressed in dress, music, political traditions, and a variety of folk beliefs and practices—that are similar to those found elsewhere in island Southeast Asia but are today almost entirely absent among Christian Filipinos. Thus, while Philippine Christians and Muslims inhabit the same state and are linked together by various attachments, they are separated by a significant cultural gulf as the result of historical circumstances. I argue in my book that cultural differences do not by themselves create ethnic conflict. However, Christian Filipinos, including representatives of the Philippine state, have often tended to view Philippine Muslims as socially backward and untrustworthy precisely because of their history of resistance to hispanicization. For their part, Philippine Muslims have tended to be highly suspicious of the intentions of the Philippine government and generally wary of Christian Filipinos. These prejudices and suspicions notwithstanding, Muslims and Christians have been able to coexist peacefully in the southern Philippines for most of the time they have lived together.

NS: You suggest in your book, Muslim Rulers and Rebels, that the Muslim nationalist movement emerged out of the period of American colonialism (1899–1946), and not Spanish colonialism, and, in fact, that the American colonial authorities actively encouraged its development. Could you please elaborate on this?

TM: I state in my book that American colonial authorities encouraged the development of a transcendent ethnoreligious identity among Philippine Muslims. That unified identity then formed the basis of the nationalist “Bangsamoro” identity of the Muslim separatist movement, begun in the late 1960s. Philippine Muslim armed resistance to Spanish aggression was very real and obviously effective, but it was not a unified Islamic resistance in the sense sometimes imagined. As elsewhere in Southeast Asia, sultanates just as often fought with one another, sometimes forging temporary alliances with the Spaniards to do so. Nevertheless, the ability of southern sultanates individually to withstand Spanish hegemony for more than 300 years is a testament to their military and diplomatic prowess. As stated in my book, certain perceptive American colonial agents realized that the “Moros” were not unified and thought it would be a good thing to unite them under leaders the Americans regarded as “enlightened” (i.e., Westernized). American colonial intentions were complex, but a primary intention seems to have been to prepare Philippine Muslims for the eventual end of American colonialism and their inclusion in an independent Philippine republic as a consolidated and relatively progressive ethnic minority. It was a naive intention, and events, of course, didn’t work out that way. But colonial practices did have the effect of encouraging the development of a unified Philippine Muslim (or Bangsamoro) identity. Not incidentally, American colonialism also provided a lingua franca—English—for contemporary Muslim separatists. Philippine Muslims are linguistically diverse and, as is the case with Christian Filipinos, English has provided a neutral political language.

NS: You also mention that the Muslim nationalist movement in the Philippines describes itself as both Islamic and anticolonial. Could you explain how this self-conception emerged and whether it is shared by the different factions of the separatist movement today?

TM: The Muslim nationalist movement is anticolonial in the same sense as any other nationalist movement in Southeast Asia, including Philippine nationalism. The difference is that Muslim separatists see Spanish and American colonialism in the Muslim Philippines as having been supplanted by colonial rule from Manila under the Philippine republic. The Islamic aspect is far more complicated, primarily because there are differing interpretations of what it means to be Islamic. The Muslim separatist movement is a self-consciously Islamic movement in the sense that its political fronts, to various degrees, envision that a Philippine Muslim nation (or autonomous region) will be influenced by an Islamic model of governance. To my knowledge neither the MNLF nor the MILF has articulated a detailed plan for governing an autonomous region or independent nation based on an Islamic model.[57] There is no clear model from the history of the Muslim Philippines. None of the Philippine sultanates complied at all closely to Quranic (shariah) law in their legal codes. I have suggested in my book that statements by the leadership of the MNLF and the MILF about the “Islamic” nature of their movement should be interpreted quite generally to refer to the defense of Philippine Muslim territory and traditions, as a response to Philippine Christian chauvinism, and as a desire to strengthen social and political connections between Philippine Muslims and the Islamic world. What [the armed Muslim separatist group] Abu Sayyaf means by “Islamic” is difficult for observers (or at least this observer) to ascertain.

NS: In your book you argue that the remote causes of Muslim separatism in the Philippines may be traced to Western colonizers but the more proximate cause can be found in the policies of the post-1946, Christian-dominated Philippine state. Can you outline some of the policies and practices that may have either exacerbated or created antagonisms between the Muslim minority and the Christian majority?

TM: Until the 1950s, Muslims formed the majority population of almost every region of the southern Philippines. Soon after the founding of the republic in 1946, the Philippine government began to sponsor large-scale migration from the poor and politically troublesome regions of the north and central parts of the country to the agricultural frontiers of the lightly populated southern islands. The large, fertile, and underpopulated island of Mindanao became the primary destination for Christian migration to the southern Philippines, and by the late 1960s Mindanao Muslims found themselves a relatively impoverished minority in their own homeland. While the scale of Christian immigration to Mindanao itself caused inevitable dislocations, the manner of its occurrence also produced glaring disparities between Christian settlers and Muslim farmers. From 1946 onward, the government provided steadily more opportunities and assistance to settlers from the North. By contrast, government services available to Muslims were not only meager, compared to those obtained by immigrant Christians, but were also fewer than they had received under the colonial regime. The new Christian communities became linked to trade centers and to one another by networks of roads, while Muslim communities remained relatively isolated. The late 1960s also saw an unusually antagonistic stance toward Muslims on the part of the new national administration of Ferdinand Marcos.

NS: Could you briefly explain the distinctions between the three principal groups representing Muslim grievances in the presentday Philippines: the Moro National Liberation Front (MNLF), the Moro Islamic Liberation Front (MILF), and Abu Sayyaf?

TM: The MNLF, founded and led by Nur Misuari, is the original underground political front of the Muslim separatist rebellion. Misuari is a signatory to the Tripoli Agreement of 1976, the first peace agreement signed between Muslim separatists and the Philippine government. Until fairly recently, the MNLF was the only separatist armed organization with which the government was willing to negotiate in any substantive way. The MILF dates from 1984 as a separate organization but can trace its roots back to the beginnings of modern Muslim separatism. Its leader, Hashim Salamat, was second in command of the MNLF until 1979. The MILF is headquartered in central Mindanao, is well organized, and has thousands of fighters and broad popular support in rural villages. Although the MILF has stressed the Islamic aspect of the separatist movement, and has somewhat more Islamic clerics in leadership positions (Salamat himself is a cleric), the stated goals and policies of the two groups do not differ significantly. The Abu Sayyaf faction is of relatively recent origin, appearing only in 1995, and is centered on the island of Basilan. They are a small, radical, and somewhat mysterious group with limited popular support. While the Abu Sayyaf faction has garnered more headlines in the past five years with its killings and kidnappings of Christians, it is by far the smallest of the three groups. Both the MNLF and the MILF have condemned the activities of the Abu Sayyaf.

NS: It has been suggested that Abu Sayyaf, the most militant of these organizations, was initially supported by the Philippine military to discredit the separatist movement and create divisions between Muslims. Do you think there is any truth to these claims?

TM: I have heard these sorts of claims myself from Philippine Muslims since 1995, although I haven't seen any credible evidence to support them. It is not surprising that such suggestions have been made. Abu Sayyaf is a very mysterious and perplexing group, and some of the activities credited to or claimed by them seem highly irrational and counterproductive.

NS: In 1996 the Moro National Liberation Front reached an agreement with the government, and the group laid down its arms. Could you explain what became of this agreement and why it is that the Philippine Congress never ratified it? Analysts have suggested that the Autonomous Region in Muslim Mindanao (ARMM), which was established following the agreement, is not working at all. Do you agree with this claim, and if so, why do you think this has been the case?

TM: The 1996 Peace Agreement between the Republic of the Philippines and the MNLF did not require ratification by the Philippine Congress. However, many Philippine legislators did not support the agreement and were able to take a number of steps to limit or eliminate funding for implementation and to pressure the administration to water down the provisions of the final agreement. Opposition in congress to the peace agreement seems to have been led by Christian senators and representatives from Mindanao. The 1996 Peace Agreement arranged for the implementation of the original Tripoli Agreement in two phases. First, it created a transitional administrative structure known as the Southern Philippines Council for Peace and Development (SPCPD). Nur Misuari, the founder and chairman of the MNLF, was made chairman of the SPCPD and won election as governor of the ARMM. The second phase of the 1996 Peace Agreement, which was originally scheduled to begin in September 1999, called for the establishment of a new regional autonomous government.

Despite the initial promise of the 1996 Peace Agreement, it has stalled badly in its implementation and is in serious danger of unraveling altogether. The September 1999 deadline for initiating the second phase of the agreement has come and gone. The autonomy agreement is stuck in its initial transition phase and has made very little progress in achieving either peace or development in the Muslim South. While the reasons for the failure of the most recent attempt to achieve meaningful autonomy for Philippine Muslims are complex, two particular (and indirectly related) problems stand out. First, due in part to congressional opposition, the SPCPD was provided entirely inadequate levels of power and resources. Not only was the SPCPD deprived of any internal taxation authority, its overall authority was severely restricted.

The second particular problem is that the 1996 Peace Agreement has not brought peace to Muslim Mindanao. The Philippine government decided to negotiate only with the main Muslim separatist faction—the MNLF led by Nur Misuari, a signatory to the original Tripoli Agreement. The MILF had sufficient military might and civilian support to wage war against the government but was ignored. After some initial armed encounters with government troops shortly after the 1996 Peace Agreement was signed, the MILF signed a ceasefire agreement with the government, in 1997, and entered into peace talks. Negotiations proceeded slowly and were interrupted by occasional skirmishes. Since late 1999, however, fighting has intensified, and in early 2000 the MILF withdrew from peace talks. At this moment (June 2000), fighting between the MILF and government troops is more intense and widespread than at any time since the signing of the Tripoli Agreement and threatens to erupt into a resumption of war.

NS: What international factors have contributed to the conflict between Muslim separatists and the Philippine state?

TM: Muammar Kadaffi has been involved in various ways, some of them quite positive in terms of seeking a settlement. The original 1976 peace agreement was signed in Libya. Libya has also sheltered and supported MNLF fighters at various times. So have Pakistan and Saudi Arabia. I think, however, that the most substantive and positive contribution has come from the Organization of the Islamic Conference of Foreign Ministers (OIC, for short), a very influential international body made up of foreign ministers of Muslim states. The OIC publicized the grievances of the separatists very early on. It pressured the Philippine government to negotiate with the MNLF and threatened a reduction of oil supplies to Manila. It arranged the first peace agreement and has been very active in facilitating negotiations and arranging agreements, including the most recent, ever since.

[57] The MNLF and the MILF are the Moro National Liberation Front and the Moro Islamic Liberation Front, respectively.

 Suggestion for Further Reading

<biblio>

McKenna, Thomas

1998 Muslim Rulers and Rebels: Everyday Politics and Armed Separatism in the Southern Philippines. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press.

</biblio>

* Part VII: Academic Freedom and Civil Liberties

 Chapter 48: Lynne Cheney—Joe Lieberman Group Puts Out a Blacklist

San Jose Mercury News, December 13, 2001

ROBERTO J. GONZÁLEZ

In October 2001, members of an influential Washington-based organization called the American Council of Trustees and Alumni (ACTA) issued a thirty-eight-page document entitled Defending Civilization, which accused U.S. universities of “failing America.” As evidence, its authors listed more than one hundred allegedly unpatriotic campus incidents. The document accused more than forty professors of engaging in what ACTA called anti-American activities.

The chilling effect of post-September 11 censorship was not limited to the academy. Television comedy shows, books, and even cartoons were subjected to censorship, including Aaron McGruder’s comic strip The Boondocks (see page 240), which editors pulled from several newspapers.

In this piece, Roberto J. González responds to the ACTA report by arguing that universities are among the few remaining institutions in American society in which ideas may be openly exchanged. He argues that debate, critique, and dissent have been vital elements in American democracy.

An aggressive attack on freedom has been launched upon America’s college campuses. Its perpetrators seek the elimination of ideas and activities that place September 11 in historical context, or critique the so-called war on terrorism.

The offensive, spearheaded by the American Council of Trustees and Alumni, a Washington-based group, threatens free speech, democratic debate and the integrity of higher education. In an incendiary report, Defending Civilization: How Our Universities Are Failing America, the American Council claims that “college and university faculty have been the weak link in America’s response” to September 11. It also asserts that “when a nation’s intellectuals are unwilling to defend its civilization, they give comfort to its adversaries.”

[[r-j-roberto-j-gonzalez-anthropologists-in-the-publ-12.png]]

The report documents 117 campus incidents as “evidence” of antiAmericanism. More than 40 professors are named, including the president of Wesleyan University, who suggested in an open letter that “disparities and injustices” in American society and the world can lead to hatred and violence.

Other examples abound. A Yale professor is criticized for saying, “It is from the desperate, angry and bereaved that these suicide pilots came.” A professor emeritus from the University of Oregon is listed for recommending that “we need to understand the reasons behind the terrifying hatred directed against the U.S. and find ways to act that will not foment more hatred for generations to come.”

Dozens more comments, taken out of context and culled from secondary sources, are presented as examples of an unpatriotic academy.

The American Council of Trustees and Alumni was founded in 1995 by Lynne Cheney, the vice president’s wife, and Senator Joseph Lieberman. Its web site claims that it contributed $3.4 billion to colleges and universities last year, making it “the largest private source of support for higher education.” Cheney is cited several times in the report, and is reportedly a close associate of its authors, Jerry Martin and Anne Neal.

Although the council's stated objectives include the protection of academic freedom, the report resembles a blacklist. In a chilling use of doublespeak, it affirms the right of professors to speak out, yet condemns those who have attempted to give context to September 11, encourage critical thinking, or share knowledge about other cultures. Faculty are accused of being "short on patriotism" for attempting to give students the analytical tools they need to become informed citizens.

Many of those blacklisted are top scholars in their fields, and it appears that the report represents a kind of academic terrorism designed to strike fear into other academics by making examples of respected professors.

The report might also function to extend control over sites of democratic debate—our universities—where freedom of expression is not only permitted but encouraged.

At my campus, symposiums, teach-ins, and lectures about religion, terrorism, Central Asia, the Middle East, and U.S. foreign policy have been organized recently. A teach-in entitled "Background for Understanding" drew hundreds of students, faculty, and citizens from many political and intellectual perspectives. The audience had the opportunity to ask questions and comment freely. The discussion was lively and at times contentious.

As a microcosm of society, the university is a place where people of different ethnicities, religions, generations, and class backgrounds exchange ideas and opinions. Anyone who has visited Bay Area colleges knows that they are especially rich places for intercultural exchange.

The vigorous and often heated debates typical of such encounters are a hallmark of democratic processes. On most campuses this can still be done freely, but official accusations of anti-Americanism might intimidate and silence some voices.

That is not patriotism, but fascism. The American Council’s position is inaccurate and irresponsible. Critique, debate, and exchange— not blind consensus or self-censorship—have characterized America since its inception.

Our universities are not failing America. On the contrary, they are among the few institutions offering alternatives to canned mainstream media reports.

The targeting of scholars who participate in civic debates might signal the emergence of a new McCarthyism directed at the academy. Before it escalates into a full-blown witch hunt in the name of “defending civilization,” faculty, students, and citizens should speak out against these acts of academic terrorism.

 Chapter 49: Academia Under Attack Sketches for a New Blacklist

CounterPunch, November 21, 2001

[[http://www.counterpunch.org][www.counterpunch.org]]

DAVID PRICE In this commentary, David Price links the ACTA report Defending Civilization to a pattern of censorship that has appeared in various moments in U.S. history, most notably in the early 1950s when Senator Joseph McCarthy directed a political witch hunt against suspected communist collaborators.

Price’s piece describes how the champions of “civilization” typically claim that “the institutions and practices of the ruling classes and the state are desirable” while condemning other points of view. He notes that the critiques expressed by some academics are contemporary examples of points of view upsetting to those in the higher circles of power.

My office is cluttered with over 20,000 pages of FBI files chronicling the damage inflicted on academic freedom in America by McCarthyism. These hundreds of different files tell divergent stories with various twists, turns, and morals, but most of them are bound together by a simple feature: the names of these individuals whose lives were invaded and altered appeared somewhere, sometime, on lists of subversives, and the FBI read these lists and opened investigatory files (or added to existing files) on these individuals. There were countless lists of suspect academics printed in publications such as the American Mercury, Readers Digest, and newsletters of the American Legion and various religious denominations. Most often these individuals had taken public stands on unpopular issues such as peace and racial, economic, and gender equality.

These lists are making a comeback, as once again intellectuals with minority views are being identified and tracked by censorial groups. One such group is the American Council of Trustees and Alumni (ACTA). The ACTA is a Washington, D.C.-based organization with the proclaimed mission of being “dedicated to academic freedom, quality and accountability.” Oddly enough, its primary means of reaching this stated goal is by intimidating scholars who assert these principles of academic freedom in ways that run counter to the ACTA’s narrow views of the past and present.

The ACTA recently produced a 38-page pamphlet that in many ways reads like a prototype of a neo-McCarthyist blacklist for our new hot war. The pamphlet, Defending Civilization: How our Universities Are Failing America and What Can Be Done About It, compiles 117 quotes from respected American academicians critical of current U.S. policies. These quotes range from gentle questions concerning the propriety of specific actions to radical critiques of American policies and practices, but the quotes lead the ACTA to make the charge that “college and university faculty have been the weak link in America’s response to the attack” of September 11.

ACTA chairwoman emerita and national “Second Lady,” Lynne Cheney, is quoted on the pamphlet’s cover endorsing the need for Americans to study the past—though the envisioned past she’d have us study is clearly compartmentalized in ways that serve hegemonic interpretations of the current crisis. Cheney tells us that “living in liberty is such a precious thing” as the pamphlet compiles a list of Americans whose liberties the ACTA would like to see reduced. But Republicans like Cheney are not alone to blame for this pamphlet designed to threaten those who would actually practice academic freedom.

Besides Cheney, the remaining members of the ACTA governing board are two of Cheney's National Endowment for the Humanities colleagues, Jerry Martin and Anne Neal, and two conservative Democrats, Joseph Lieberman and Richard Lamm.

The pamphlet has a few tantalizingly strident quotes, such as the widely publicized (and later apologized for) quote by University of New Mexico historian Richard Berthold that "anyone who can blow up the Pentagon gets my vote," but most of the quotes are moderate in their view and tenor. In fact, one of the remarkable things about this pamphlet is how relatively tame or even commonsensical many of the quotes are, for example, CCNY sophomore Nuriel Heckler's observation "We don't feel military action will stop terrorism, but it will lead to racism and hate" or Jesse Jackson's statement that we should "build bridges and relationships, not simply bombs and walls."

[[r-j-roberto-j-gonzalez-anthropologists-in-the-publ-13.png]]

To the ACTA, such moderate suggestions are too much and must be shouted down.

This pamphlet title's use of the term "civilization" is significant. As anthropologist Thomas Patterson recognizes, traditionally "civilization's champions have claimed that the institutions and practices of the ruling classes and the state are desirable and necessary in that they maintain order and underwrite the conquest of nature." That academics are not choosing to engage in supporting this modern conquest is indeed disappointing to the ACTA.

That American intellectuals would raise the ire of censor-prone conservatives like those at the ACTA is natural. The refusal of academics to reduce the current war to simplistic analyses of good versus evil, or civilization versus tribalism should be upsetting to those who view intellectuals' chief duty as rationalizing the actions ofstate.TheACTA is opposed to independent thought during this time of war, and it seems to sense no danger in its wish to muzzle and intimidate knowledgeable individuals who are trying to add more information to an ill-informed public during a time a crisis.

The American Association of University Professors (an organization that abandoned many professors during the days of McCarthyism) has thus far come out with strong support for the principles of academic freedom. Last month Mary Burgan, the AAUP general secretary, noted that "a distrust of intellectuals has always lurked beneath the surface of American popular opinion. Now it has begun to leak out again—either through the frontal assault in the partial reporting by the New York Post of a forum at the City University of New York, or the sideswipes at campus teach-ins by a respected columnist like Tom Friedman or others such as John Leo." So far the AAUP is standing on the side of academic freedom, but this is a fight in which we must remain ever vigilant.

There is no criticism too strong for those who would intimidate and stifle free thought and expression—especially during times such as these when knowledgeable scholars' access to the public via the media is being curtailed. That members of the ACTA's board are among those who can bend the ear of our new Homeland Security Office should cause us all grave concern, and we must be doubly vigilant in protecting those of us who exercise our right to dissent.

 Chapter 50: Lynne Cheney's Free Speech Blacklist

TomPaine.com, November 18, 2002
[[http://www.tompaine.com][www.tompaine.com]]

Hugh Gusterson was the first academic quoted in the ACTA report Defending Civilization. In this interview with Sharon Basco, he considers the ACTA's use of intimidation, scapegoating, and propaganda as techniques of control, and reflects upon the historical link between war and repression of dissenters in U.S. history.

Gusterson also makes a point that resonates strongly with many of the articles in this collection: "The role and the purpose of the university in America is not to cheerlead for whatever the chosen policy of the American government is. The role and purpose of the university isto pursue knowledge and to encourage people to think critically."

SHARON BASCO: Professor Hugh Gusterson, you're the first academic quoted in the report entitled Defending Civilization: How Our Universities Are Failing America and What Can Be Done About It.

One of the opening paragraphs of that report says, "While America's elected officials from both parties and media commentators from across the spectrum condemned the attacks and followed the President in calling evil by its rightful name, many faculty demurred. Some refused to make judgments. Many invoked tolerance and diversity as antidotes to evil."

You're the first academic quoted in this report, which states this: "Hugh Gusterson, professor of anthropology and science and technology studies, Massachusetts Institute of Technology: 'Imagine the real suffering and grief of people in other countries. The best way to begin a war on terrorism might be to look in the mirror.' " That's the end of your quote.

HUGH GUSTERSON: One interesting thing I want to observe about that quote is where they chose to begin it. It's a quote from a speech I made at a peace rally at MIT, shortly after September 11. And I took as my theme the difficulty of imagining the real suffering of other people. And just before that quote they select, I talked about how difficult it is for us to imagine the suffering of the people at the World Trade Center as they were dying.

And then I went on from there to invite the audience to try and imagine the suffering of people in Afghanistan if we were to go and declare war on the people in Afghanistan. Of course, the quote is carefully cut so it seems that I only care about the suffering of people in other countries and not about the suffering of Americans as well. That's part of a process of distortion that I think marks the report more generally.

But also more generally I'd like to make a point that universities are not adjuncts of the American government. The role and the purpose of the university in America is not to cheerlead for whatever the chosen policy of the American government is. The role and purpose of the university is to pursue knowledge and to encourage people to think critically. And in my speech at the peace rally I was encouraging students and anyone who was listening to think critically about American foreign policy, about the fact that Americans have not only been victims of violence, but that Americans have often inflicted violence on people in other countries— in El Salvador, Nicaragua, Panama, Vietnam, for example—and the people in those other countries might see U.S. actions as being terrorist actions in their own way.

SB: Have you spoken to anyone at the American Council of Trustees and Alumni about the accusations in the report and about your words being taken out of context?

HG: I haven't spoken to anyone at the American Council of Trustees and Alumni. They never called me to check the quote. And one thing I would like to say. The report makes the argument that political correctness reigns supreme on American campuses today. And the people who do feel inclined to support the U.S. government feel intimidated by the climate of political correctness from giving voice to their true feelings.

And I have to say, looking around me at MIT, this is just complete junk. In their report, they cite five different quotes from people at MIT. Four of those quotes come from the peace rally where I spoke. There's a fifth quote from Noam Chomsky, from a public lecture he gave. And you would think from reading their report that these are the only public statements that have been made about September 11 here at MIT. But it’s just not true. There was a whole series of panel discussions organized by the university administration. So, for example, the Center for International Studies did a panel within a few days of September 11. There were four panelists; only one of those panelists in any way criticized American foreign policy. Two of the others called for assassinating Osama bin Laden, or for declaring war on Afghanistan. When that panel was repeated on two subsequent occasions, the person who had criticized U.S. foreign policy was dropped from the panel. There was another panel discussion called “Technology and Terror.” There were six panelists, including myself. I was the only one of the panelists on that panel who said anything critical about American foreign policy.

So actually, if you look at MIT, there’s a vibrant discussion about the implications of September 11. Many people have called publicly for military action and the people who’ve criticized military action are actually a minority of the recorded statements. You can go to the MIT news service and check this out.

What the authors of the report did is that they very carefully selected only those comments that were critical of American foreign policy and tried to pretend that those comments represented the entire range of debate at MIT. This is a complete distortion and fabrication.

SB: What do you think they’re trying to do with this report? You’re an anthropologist, you study human beings and their culture, their relationships. What’s your professional viewpoint on this Defending Civilization report?

HG: Lynne Cheney has been on a mission for over a decade now to try to clamp down on dissent on campus, and to clamp down on multiculturalist perspectives in education. And I think this fits with a long-term agenda she has. We see at this moment, after September 11, that many groups are opportunistically using the current crisis to try and push an agenda that they had long before September 11. And I think that’s part of what Lynne Cheney and this group are up to.

But more than that, I think that any student of American history can tell you that whenever the country is at war, whenever there is a national crisis, it's very clear that the government attempts to clamp down on dissenters, on aliens and so on. This goes all the way back to the Sedition Act shortly after the founding of the Republic—you see it in the mass deportations around the time of World War I, the trial and execution of Sacco and Vanzetti, you see it in the internment of Japanese Americans during World War II and in McCarthyism.

This fits within that pattern. It's an attempt to intimidate internal critics within the United States, to keep them quiet, to say that in a time of crisis there's only one correct opinion, and it's the official orthodox government opinion. And I find it ironic, actually, that Lynne Cheney and the American Council of Trustees and Alumni are calling in this report for more American history on campus, for compulsory classes in American history. Because I think if you study America history you see quite clearly that they fit into this long-standing historical pattern of scapegoating internal critics in times of crisis. It's a very ugly historical pattern.

SB: The report seems to rationalize and anticipate criticisms from people who don't agree with Lynne Cheney's organization. They say in part: "Let us be clear. This is not an argument for limiting free speech on college campuses. Indeed the robust exchange of ideas is essential to a free society. But it is equally important and never more so than in these unsettling times to insist that colleges and universities transmit our history and heritage to the next generation." And then there's an underlined sentence: "Academic freedom does not mean freedom from criticism."

HG: I take strong exception to this comment for two reasons. First of all, as an academic, I live on debate. I thrive on debate. I love people to argue with me about what I've written, what I've said, and I live to debate with other people.

If anyone from the American Council of Trustees and Alumni wants to debate me on my views on the war on Afghanistan, I will be delighted to debate them.

This is not about debate. It’s about blacklisting people. It’s one thing to do a detailed analysis of someone’s written or spoken opinions, and suggest why you think they’re wrong. That’s not what this report is about. This report is about compiling a list of people who they think are deviants as an attempt to intimidate those people.

The second thing I would say is that the report uses the classic technique of propaganda. In propaganda you impute your own sins to the other side. We saw this with Soviet propaganda, for example. Every time the Soviets invaded a country, they would talk about the other country having committed aggression against the Soviet Union, and the Soviet Union acting out of self-defense.

Cigarette ads do the same thing. They take the perceived weakness of their product, and they turn it around in advertisements. They say that cigarettes make people attractive, cigarettes taste nice, and so on.

And this report uses the classic techniques of advertising and propaganda. They are about intimidation. They are about curtailing the free expression of dissent on campus. Instead, they accuse internal dissenters—who are in a minority in American society— of trying to curtail other people’s free speech.

 Suggestion for Further Reading

<biblio>

Gusterson, Hugh

2001 “The McNamara Complex.” Anthropological Quarterly, Special Section of Social Thought and Commentary (December): 171–177.

</biblio>

 Chapter 51: Harmony Coerced is Freedom Denied

Chronicle of Higher Education, July 13, 2001

LAURA NADER In this piece, Laura Nader applies anthropological theory and research to an important public issue: the emergence of coercive harmony as an ideology of control in American life. She reminds readers that critique, contention, and dissent have a long history in the United States. Abandoning that tradition might mask repression, or disguise injustice and repression as civility, patriotism, or the American Way.

Although this commentary was written months before September 11, 2001, it is more relevant today than when it initially appeared. News editors, college professors, students, employees, and other citizens have reported coming under fire for expressing views critical of the Bush administration. In light of the rapid changes that have curtailed civil liberties, Nader’s words should give us pause.

We have heard a lot recently about the need for consensus, social harmony, and civility. At the end of the presidential election, for instance, both George W. Bush and Al Gore spoke of the importance of unity. But Americans need to remember that our country was founded by dissenters. We need to be reminded periodically of all the good that has come from outrage and indignation, and of what happens to democracy when people don’t speak out.

In “Seduced by Civility,” a 1996 article in The Nation, Benjamin DeMott looks at the current state of political manners and the crisis of democratic values. He points out that in the nineteenth century, people who criticized abolitionists for being uncivil were the ones who were willing to let slavery continue. His conclusion is that we must recognize today's incivility for what it is: a justified rejection of the powers that be, who are more interested in civility than in poverty.

I believe that indignation can make Americans more engaged citizens—and isn't that a basic purpose of most colleges and universities? I am appalled to hear young people speak positively about not being judgmental. (I'm sure that when a student said, in an evaluation of my course, "Dr. Nader is a pretty good professor, except she has opinions," the remark wasn't intended to be a compliment; nonetheless, I took it as one.)

Many college students today were taught dispute resolution in elementary and secondary school, at the cost of trading justice for harmony. Often, what they remember is that they were silenced for the sake of civility. As professors, we ought to encourage our students to express their opinions—with outrage, when it is justified, as it often is. It is our duty to teach students the importance of protest when our society makes the unthinkable appear normal—when we dump nuclear waste on American Indian reservations, broaden the gap between the haves and the have-nots even during a time of plenty, and give Ritalin to millions of American children.

Social scientists are taught to notice patterns that regulate speech or social life. Sometimes we follow such patterns through time and space, to see if we have stumbled upon something of social and cultural significance. In The History of Manners, Norbert Elias examined the links between manners, or etiquette, and social control. He was interested in how "civilizing processes," as he called them, take place and how they are interrelated with the organization of Western societies into states. He believed that the standards for human behavior gradually shift over the centuries toward greater restrictions. For example, he found that people in Western societies became less tolerant of spitting in public when they learned that the practice was acceptable in the non-Western societies they saw as less advanced. My interest in manners as a way of controlling behavior came from my work on village law among the Zapotec Indians of Oaxaca, Mexico. I found that the villagers I studied were highly litigious, yet valued harmony and compromise in the courtroom. I came to see their support of harmony as part of a strategy to preserve their autonomy. As long as the village kept its house in order, there was minimal interference from the Mexican government. Five hundred years of colonization had taught the villagers to use harmony for political purposes.

When I looked at legal reform in the United States, I also found harmony being used as a control, this time by the powerful. In the 1970s, something called alternative dispute resolution was born. It was a reform movement in response to the new cases (proponents of the movement called them “garbage cases”) that were entering the courts after the social turmoil of the 1960s—cases about civil rights, environmental and consumer rights, Native American and gender issues, and so forth. The movement favored compromise over adversarial procedures, harmony over social justice. Its mandatory mediation and binding arbitration cost us our right to sue. It was a war against the contentious.

Since the 1970s, alternative dispute resolution has gone beyond the law, creeping into our schools, places of work, hospitals, and homes. Tracking the spread of such coercive harmony is not easy. Because it has permeated society over time, most people come to take it for granted or assume it is benign. Conversely, conflicts and disagreement have come to seem bad, to be avoided at all costs. I once received a note from a lumber activist thanking me for coining the term “coercive harmony.” It had enabled her to recognize the repression of environmental activism under the banner of consensus and “win-win” solutions in the Clinton administration’s policy on logging.

Coercive harmony has often accompanied large-scale social movements, including Western colonialism, Christian missionary work, and globalization. Historians like Jerold Auerbach, at Wellesley College, postulate that in the United States, the use of harmony as a form of social regulation by the government occurs in cycles. Conflict—for example, during the Civil War and the protests of the 1960s—gets out of control, harmony is imposed, and after a time of calm, dissent erupts again.

Europeans today are less concerned about harmony than Americans are. During last year’s presidential campaign, many Europeans wondered why the candidates did not seem to know how to debate. One reason is that Americans consider it bad manners to be contentious. In fact, the anthropologist Paul Bohannan notes that Americans have two categories of behavior: polite and rude. The British, he says, add a third: civil, meaning that you pull no punches when you criticize, but that you do so without jeering. As he puts it, an American has to be your close friend before giving you anything but praise when he reviews your manuscript. The British don’t make that kind of mistake; they understand that you really want to know the weak points before publication.

The use of coercive harmony in the United States has led us to confuse all criticism with carping and being negative. We don’t share the Europeans’ zest for controversy. As Robin Lakoff, a linguist at the University of California at Berkeley, says, we want to be perceived as nice. And we put up with circumstances that Europeans would consider outrageous—for example, the absence of universal health care or the fact that fewer than 52 percent of eligible voters cast ballots in the last election.

What should be unacceptable has come to strike us as so normal that when we hear someone speaking frankly, we are startled. Not long ago, in an appearance on The NewsHour with Jim Lehrer, Frank Wolak, an economics professor at Stanford University, whitewashed the role of the utilities in the California energy crisis. Not surprising. What did seem surprising was the comment that followed from Bruce Brugmann, editor of the San Francisco Bay Guardian, who said that the professor should be working for the utilities rather than Stanford.

Coercive harmony can stifle dissent for a while. But if dissent is too tightly bottled up, it will explode—as happened in the 1960s riots in Watts, Newark, and other places. And the explosions don’t all come from members of ethnic minorities: Witness the Oklahoma City bombing in 1995.

Academics should not be party to establishing an ideology of consensus on our increasingly corporatized campuses. Instead, we have a duty to investigate the dangers of coercive harmony and to expose repression when it poses as consensus.

 Suggestions for Further Reading

<biblio>

Nader, Laura

1997 “Controlling Processes: Tracing the Dynamic Components of Power.” Current Anthropology 38, no. 5: 711–737.

1997 “The Phantom Factor: Impact of the Cold War on Anthropology.” In The Cold War and the University: Toward an Intellectual History of the Postwar Years, edited by Andre Schiffrin, pp. 107–146. New York: New Press.

2002 The Life of the Law: Anthropological Projects. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press.

</biblio>

 Chapter 52: Unconventional Anthropology Challenging the Myths of Continuous War

ROBERTO J. GONZÁLEZ

The study of man is confronted with an unprecedented situation: never before have so few, by their actions and inactions, had the power of life and death over so many of the species.

—LAURA NADER, “UP THE ANTHROPOLOGIST—PERSPECTIVES GAINED FROM STUDYING UP” (1969)

We must realize that the discourse of technical rationality is part of the problem as well as part of the solution and that, unless we ask fundamental political questions about the relationship between the U.S. and the rest of the world, the U.S. will find the cognitive and technological tools of modernity being used against it.

—HUGH GUSTERSON, “THE MCNAMARA COMPLEX” (2001)

 Anthropology and American Imperialism

Many of the contributors to this anthology chronicle the emergence of U.S. global hegemony over the course of the twentieth century and into the twenty-first. The “American century of war and empire” [58] has had broad repercussions overseas—and also within our country—as communities, economies, and political systems have been transformed and often contended with the imperialist dreams of power elites.

While few would dispute such historical facts, within the United States there are different interpretations of what U.S. imperialism represents. Many neoconservatives wholeheartedly agree that such hegemony exists, yet consider it to be not only justifiable but desirable on grounds that such a system is essentially benevolent, moral, and progressive. Every imperial project has its ideological justifications; “manifest destiny,” “white man’s burden,” “economic development,” and “New World Order” have rationalized civilizing missions in different historical periods. Following an ethnocentric logic, recent attempts by our leaders to encourage “regime change” in such diverse locations as Afghanistan, Iraq, and Venezuela might appear rational and desirable, even when they violate international law.

Where have anthropologists stood on this issue? A generation ago, Kathleen Gough observed that British, French, and American anthropologists had generally not questioned frameworks of colonial power: “Anthropology is a child of Western imperialism... We tended to accept the imperialist framework as given, perhaps partly because we were influenced by the dominant theories of our time, and partly because at that time there was little anyone could do to dismantle the empire.” [59]

Today, after witnessing struggles for independence in Africa, Asia, and the Americas, many anthropologists would likely be critical of any imperial system. Empires have historically denied the right of selfdetermination to colonized peoples and violently repressed them when they challenged structures of power. When anthropologists conducted ethnographic research or extended fieldwork abroad, the brutal political realities of colonialism often appeared in plain view. After the 1960s, the discipline generally became more attuned to global interconnections and inequalities.[60] The fact that participant observation tended to place the anthropologist in personal relationships with ordinary people probably magnified the effects of imperial systems on small-scale societies. By the nature of their work, anthropologists are positioned to grasp the big picture from the perspectives of individual lives, and consequently many have been outspoken in their critiques of imperialism—including the current U.S. version, which starkly contrasts with the principles upon which our country was founded.

Perhaps this is most clearly visible in U.S. military expansion. In recent months—with alarming speed and no public debate—our leaders have deployed military troops and advisers to parts of the world that were previously off-limits, including the Philippines, Afghanistan, Uzbekistan, Kyrgyzstan, Colombia, Yemen, and Georgia.

The case of Iraq provides us with an alarming example of the new U.S. expansionism. When the Bush administration launched an invasion of Iraq in March and April 2003, it dramatically demonstrated the lengths to which it would go to accelerate the U.S. drive for total global dominance. This was clearly foreshadowed by its National Security Strategy, a policy document advocating unilateral military action as the preferred means for projecting U.S. power.

After initially seeking approval from the U.N. Security Council to disarm Iraq (a process which led to the reintroduction of U.N. weapons inspectors to Iraq in late 2002), the U.S. and U.K. eventually abandoned efforts to work within the system of international law. Bush administration officials claimed at various moments that Iraq must be attacked in order to eliminate weapons of mass destruction, for purposes of “regime change,” and to bring democracy to the region.

In response, millions of Americans across the country demonstrated their opposition to war in a series of rallies between October 2002 and March 2003—a sight not seen on U.S. streets since the Vietnam era. Tens of millions more demonstrated around the world.

But in spite of popular opposition, the United States and United Kingdom proceeded to attack Iraq, beginning with massive bombing raids over the city of Baghdad in late March 2003 followed by a blitzkrieg-style land invasion. Although it may be many years before we know the full extent of the destruction and death of the second Gulf War, it is clear that thousands of civilians were killed.

As this book goes to press, the U.S. maintains approximately 150,000 troops in Iraq and has imposed the authority of the Pentagon’s Office of Reconstruction and Humanitarian Assistance. The military occupation and the Pentagon’s rulers resemble a colonial administration in many ways.

In spite of the U.S. troop presence, looters and snipers continue wreaking havoc and instability upon large portions of Baghdad and other Iraqi cities. U.S. troops secured the building housing the Ministry of Oil but allowed thieves (probably members of organized crime rings) to steal thousands of priceless artifacts from the national museum of archaeology. They also allowed arsonists to burn the national library and other buildings containing historic archives and religious texts. The losses are of such significance that eminent scholars have, without hyperbole, compared these events to the burning of the library at Alexandria.

In the political vacuum created by the dismantling of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party, Shiite leaders—some of whom are clerics favoring an Islamic state—are stepping in to fill the void. This is of signal importance, since 60 percent of Iraq's population consists of Shiite Muslims, many of whom were severely limited in expressing their political power (and many of their religious traditions) under Saddam Hussein's secular rule. While the clerics clearly command a great deal of popular support, Bush administration officials have unequivocally stated that they will not accept a theocratic state. Iraq's political future is unclear, but the Bush administration appears determined to maintain tight boundaries around the shape and character of its postwar government. In the meantime, casualities of war mount.

Like the Roman, Spanish, and British Empires of previous eras, the United States has spread its military forces far and wide to maintain global hegemony, but on a scale unprecedented in human history. Today our country spends more each year on the military (approximately $400 billion) than the next nine largest national defense budgets combined. The web of U.S. military bases extends across seventy countries and territories over the globe.

 September 11 and the "War on Terror": The Uses of Continuous War

In a recent lecture, MIT linguistics professor Noam Chomsky noted that "the war on terrorism was not declared on September 11; rather, it was redeclared, using the same rhetoric as the first declaration 20 years earlier." [61] Mainstream news reports indicate a remarkable continuity in the military actions of the United States and its allies against countries deemed to be supporters of terrorist organizations—actions that have included assassinations, torture, mass murder, atrocities, and war crimes in Algeria, Libya, Turkey, Saudi Arabia, Iraq, Indonesia, the Philippines, Haiti, El Salvador, Guatemala, and many other countries. It is also significant that government officials directing the contemporary "war on terror" include many of the same people charged with fighting "terrorist" threats two decades ago: Donald Rumsfeld, Dick Cheney, Paul Wolfowitz, Colin Powell, John Negroponte, and others. From this perspective, recent events resemble a war without end.

The idea of a society engaged in continuous war—what anthropologist Catherine Lutz has called a “form of peacetime that is in fact war” conducted in faraway lands [62]—is reminiscent of both the totalitarian society envisioned by George Orwell in 1984 and recent statements made by our leaders regarding the “war on terror.” By issuing a constant stream of warnings and press releases (some without foundation) about possible terrorist attacks, distorting the truth while subtly and not so subtly threatening dissenters, and directing the fear, wrath, and insecurity of citizens against one another, the leaders of such states sometimes succeed in confounding and manipulating millions of people. This was as true in Nazi Germany as it was in the negative utopia of 1984. We may be witnessing similar processes at work in our country today.

Orwell linked the continuous war between world powers to the manipulation of reality: “When war is continuous there is no such thing as military necessity... the most palpable facts can be denied or disregarded... almost any perversion of thought can be safely practiced ... The rulers of such a state are absolute, as the Pharaohs or the Caesars could not be... they can twist reality into whatever shape they choose.” [63]

Continuous conflict, together with an insistence that our country is in a state of war against shadowy enemies scattered across dozens of countries, may function as a controlling process creating fear in the minds of citizens. As in the case of Cold War panic over communism in the United States, the widespread selling of fear by members of the Bush cabinet has effectively pried more support from the public and Congress for growing military budgets. Currently, more than half of our government’s discretionary spending is dedicated to the military—more than five times the amount dedicated to education. We should bear in mind the January 17, 1961, farewell address of President Dwight D. Eisenhower, in which he cautioned us about how the “military-industrial complex” might threaten freedom, democracy, and cherished American values.

The demonization of non-Western others is undergoing a new phase. In the present context, many groups around the world seeking to assert self-determination in a way that potentially threatens U.S. economic interests or those of its allies are branded with predictable labels by heads of state:

“Terrorist,” like “bandit,” designates an enemy of the Western establishment, somebody who stands in the way of Western aims. What Western states do is never banditry or terrorism, even if their actions fit Western definitions of these terms and are declared by Western political entities like the International Court of Justice to be in violation of international law... The West remains the repository of civilized values and humane methods, which is being challenged by “barbarians.” [64]

This observation is even more compelling when put in the current context: In 2002 our government refused to recognize the legitimacy of the newly formed International Criminal Court, a legal body established to prosecute war crimes, and in 2003 it spearheaded an unprovoked attack, invasion, and occupation of a sovereign nation (Iraq) without U.N. approval—a direct violation of the U.N. Charter.

In Orwell’s fictional account, the general public is incapable of distinguishing the government’s official versions of history from reality due to direct censorship and manipulation of language. But to what degree do these controls function in our own society—and at what level of popular consciousness?

 The Culture Industry and Mainstream Media

A recent report in the London newspaper The Guardian sheds light on some of the controls promoted by a continuous “war on terror.” The headline is both revelatory and shocking: “U.S. Media Cowed by Patriotic Fever, Says CBS Star.” The article features an interview with CBS News anchor Dan Rather, an icon of American television, who comments on the forces of what he calls “patriotism run amok” after September 11:

It is an obscene comparison... but you know there was a time in South Africa that people would put flaming tires around people's necks if they dissented. And in some ways the fear is that you will be necklaced here, you will have a flaming tire of lack of patriotism put around your neck. Now it is that fear that keeps journalists from asking the toughest of the tough questions... There has never been an American war, small or large, in which access has been so limited as this one... Limiting access, limiting information to cover the backsides of those who are in charge of the war, is extremely dangerous and cannot and should not be accepted.[65]

Rather's comments point to a number of factors: self-censorship, fear of punishment for speaking out against the party line, and limited access to battle zones. That one of the most influential television reporters in our country can be subjected to such pressures should make us stop and think.

For critics of U.S. mainstream media, other mechanisms of information control are well known, particularly those associated with the influence of commercial pressures. Mergers and the consolidation of media firms have linked together television, radio, music, publishing, and Internet providers, which has resulted in a handful of multinational media conglomerates that effectively serve to filter much of the information content of news. Threats from advertisers, sponsors, and organized lobbies occasionally pressure editorial boards, publishers, and producers to reject controversial stories or to frame current events in particular ways or else threaten to withhold underwriting.

Journalists are often subjected to a wide range of filters including press controls, bureaucratic hierarchies, reporting conventions, news organizations, and a set of career rewards and punishments that impact their choice of topics, as well as the style in which they present their reports. The multiplicity of ways in which business interests discipline reporters is the subject of a rich ethnographic account of foreign correspondents by anthropologist Mark Pedelty. He explains that "the ideological content of news texts is representative of the world view of the stockholders, executives, owners, and especially, advertisers who produce, manage, and profit from news production.” [66] In a system in which the major news producers are subsidiaries of multinational media corporations, the pressures to conform and self-censor may be overwhelming.

Media watchdog groups such as Fairness and Accuracy in Reporting (FAIR) have extensively documented the effects of such connections and potential conflicts of interest. Their investigations help us understand otherwise confounding phenomena: the portrayal of the September 11 attacks as attacks upon civilians rather than attacks upon symbols of American economic and military power; the omission of international human rights reports critical of U.S. policies from mainstream news broadcasts; and the dearth of reporting on the antiwar movement.

 Anthropology’s Promise: Exploding the Myths of “Crackpot Realism”

It appears that a new generation of “crackpot realists”—those who think that the only realistic way of resolving political problems can be found in total war, mass murder, and the use of brute force (even if in violation of international laws)—are in command of our country.[67] The specter of nuclear war once again looms before us, as the current Bush administration has abandoned nuclear test ban treaties, produced a list of countries as potential targets for future attacks, and openly discussed the possible development of “small-scale” nuclear weapons, much to the chagrin of America’s closest allies. As if that were not enough, the administration released a document entitled National Security Strategy on September 20, 2002, which outlines a new foreign policy doctrine advocating “pre-emption,” “first-strikes,” and unilateral action as preferred means for maintaining American “unparalleled military strength” and global dominance. The 2003 Gulf War may represent the initial phase of a long-range project to expand U.S. hegemony and project U.S. power across the globe, an idea explicitly promoted by the think tank Project for the New American Century.

The words of Hannah Arendt are particularly relevant: “There are, indeed, few things that are more frightening than the steadily increasing prestige of scientifically minded brain trusters in the councils of government during the last decades. The trouble is not that they are cold-blooded enough to ‘think the unthinkable,’ but that they do not think.” [68] Anthropologists have analyzed a tendency toward irrational rationality among bureaucratic elites in military-industrial settings: Hugh Gusterson calls it “the McNamara complex,” while Laura Nader uses the term “institutionalized insanity.”

In these unconventional times, anthropologists have a historic role to play in the public arena, detecting general patterns that might lead to a more enlightened U.S. engagement with global politics. Various themes resonate throughout the commentaries: the repeated call for greater U.N. involvement in conflicts, rather than unilateral military actions by our government and its allies; the need for a fuller, more sophisticated U.S. understanding of other cultures—that is, cultural relativism as a political exigency; the importance of our country actively seeking peaceful solutions rather than reacting to violence with heavy-handed retaliatory attacks (preventive diplomacy instead of gunboat diplomacy); the need for democratic governments—with our country in the lead—to make objectives and actions more transparent; and the recognition that lasting peace can only be realized in a world that is more just. What can be more in line with U.S. principles than a world in which justice and the rule of law prevail?

In times of war, anthropologists need to encourage critical thinking. Although some will undoubtedly argue that our discipline should work for government agencies in wartime, the history of U.S. anthropology reveals that such a road is fraught with danger. We should remain cautious and vigilant about how military and intelligence agencies might recruit anthropologists or deploy cultural knowledge in the “war on terror” declared by George W. Bush. During the current period of academic downsizing, career opportunities for anthropologists are shrinking, and new opportunities for employment in the CIA, the Defense Intelligence Agency, and private think tanks as cultural experts might seem particularly appealing to those struggling to find steady employment. Anthropologists should resist temptation as a matter of professional responsibility—at the very least, we should insist on professional autonomy. As David Price has argued, state-managed anthropological wartime research has frequently devastated indigenous cultures: “As social scientists are now being recruited to assist in ethnic and racial ‘terrorist profiling’ campaigns... we have a professional duty to speak out against the futility and bigotry of such abuses.” [69] The destructive potential is too great to risk using culture as a weapon.

In the context of the “war on terror,” we might begin by taking positive steps to dispel the myths, misunderstandings, and ethnocentrism currently circulating throughout our country, often created by public relations firms and private think tanks and propagated by the corporate mass media. This might serve as an alternative to agency work for those wishing to engage with wider publics. As points of departure, we might consider the following objectives:

1. We could inform the public of the double standard systematically applied to the term “terrorism.” In nearly all mainstream reports and in the words of the vast majority of official policy makers, “terrorism” is reserved for those who would challenge the United States or its allies, even when the latter are in violation of international law. “State terrorism” is not a term that is used in the mainstream media, yet violence directed by states against their own people has claimed many more lives than nonstate terrorism during the twentieth century (in Indonesia, Guatemala, Angola, and Nicaragua, to name a few). Typically, such aggression has been ignored or described as “retaliation”—or, more commonly, “selfdefense.”

2. We could remind the public that “preemptive” attacks and “regime change,” directed or supported by our military and the CIA, have not led to regional stability in the Middle East, Latin America, Africa, or other regions. This has also been true in the past, as history has shown time and time again.[70] Furthermore, history has also shown that air attacks almost always result in civilian casualties, either directly (due to bombing) or indirectly (due to the public health and other humanitarian crises following such raids). The strategy of massive bombing, while perhaps minimizing U.S. war casualties, has frequently led to bitterness, anger, and outright hostility directed toward our country on the part of civilians whose lives have been devastated. The idea that a lasting peace can emerge from a strategy of war and indiscriminate annihilation is unfounded.

3. We could expose the use of euphemisms, doublespeak, and misinformation in Pentagon briefings, presidential speeches, and the mainstream media. Reporters, politicians, and pundits uncritically use such terms as “defense” rather than “war,” “freedom fighters” rather than “paramilitary groups,” “terrorists” rather than “revolutionaries,” “collateral damage” rather than “civilian casualties,” “stress and duress” rather than “torture,” and “surgical strikes” rather than “missile and bombing attacks,” among many others.

4. We could inspire the general public to learn more about other societies, and to recognize that people in many parts of the world have rejected neoliberal models of economic development and certain World Bank and IMF recommendations. For years, media reports have equated “free trade” with (political) freedom, even when the historical record is replete with free-trading dictatorships, such as Marcos’ Philippines, Salinas’ Mexico, and Suharto’s Indonesia.

5. We could describe the emergence and character of the international power elite, and the social and cultural implications of the corporatization of our government. Like the subjects of C. Wright Mills’ The Power Elite, the contemporary ruling classes may be linked across military, industrial, and political institutions, but today they operate on a truly global scale. For example, the Carlyle Group, a $12 billion private equity firm based in Washington, includes as its advisers former president Fidel Ramos of the Philippines, former South Korean prime minister Park Tae Joon, former British prime minister John Major, former Speaker of the House Thomas Foley, former president George Bush Sr., and former secretary of state James Baker III, among many others. The group represents “a new spin on Washington’s revolving door between business and government, where lobbying by former officials is restricted but soliciting investments is not... Carlyle has upped the ante and taken the practice global.” [71] Another example comes from the massive contracts for postwar reconstruction in Iraq that the Bush administration awarded to Bechtel and Halliburton. Dick Cheney served as the CEO of Halliburton before becoming vice president.[72] In short, there is still much work to be done in tracing the connections between U.S. foreign policy, the financial interests of multinational corporations, and the revolving doors between government, industry, and the military.

A new politics of responsibility requires that intellectuals in general and anthropologists in particular examine global structures of power and acquiescence affecting us all. It also demands that we break the monopoly of ideas, disseminate critical perspectives, and communicate with broader publics. By establishing connections, an informed and revitalized citizenry may still reclaim their roles as protagonists of history. The United States has given the world a vision of democracy that is worth turning into practice—and we can take a leading role. In the words of one anthropologist,

I am aware that this discussion is unconventional anthropology;

but these are unconventional times. We are all involved in unconventional and portentous military and political events... These events have worldwide consequences. It is time that we accepted some unconventional responsibility for our acts, be they acts of commission or of omission.[73]

Accepting this responsibility will help us realize both the potential and the promise of a renewed anthropology.

[58] Catherine Lutz, Homefront: A Military City and the American Twentieth Century (Boston: Beacon Press), p. 4.

[59] Kathleen Gough, “New Proposals for Anthropologists,” Current Anthropology 9, no. 5 (December 1968): 403–407.

[60] It is also true that even before World War II, some anthropologists recognized that using cultural knowledge against field subjects—the use of culture as a weapon—was ethically problematic. For a description of Melville Herskovitz’s writings about this dilemma, see David Price, “Lessons from Second World War Anthropology,” Anthropology Today 18, no. 3 (June 2002): 16. For an early anthropological critique of U.S. imperialism, see Franz Boas, “American Nationalism and World War I,” in George W. Stocking, ed., A Franz Boas Reader (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1975), pp. 331–332.

[61] Noam Chomsky, “The Journalist from Mars,” Extra! 15, no. 2 (April 2002): 10.

[62] Lutz, p. 8.

[63] George Orwell, 1984 (New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1949), pp. 163–164.

[64] Edward Herman and Gerry O’Sullivan, The “Terrorism” Industry (New York: Pantheon Books, 1989), pp. 6–7.

[65] Quoted in Matthew Engel, “U.S. Media Cowed by Patriotic Fever, Says CBS Star,” The Guardian, May 17, 2002.

[66] See Mark Pedelty, War Stories: The Culture of Foreign Correspondents (London: Routledge, 1995).

[67] The term “crackpot realists” was coined by C.Wright Mills in The Causes of World War Three (New York: Ballantine Books, 1958).

[68] Hannah Arendt, On Violence (New York: Harcourt, Brace and World, 1970).

[69] David Price, “Lessons from Second World War Anthropology,” Anthropology Today 18, no. 3 (June 2002): 20.

[70] Ramsey Clark pointed this out in an interview with Amy Goodman on Democracy Now! (Pacifica Radio), March 20, 2002.

[71] Leslie Wayne, “The Carlyle Group: Elder Bush in Big G.O.P. Cast Toiling for Top Equity Firm,” New York Times, March 5, 2001. See also Dan Briody, The Iron Triangle: Inside the Secret World of the Carlyle Group (New York: John Wiley and Sons, 2003).

[72] In April 2003, the CBS news program 60 Minutes reported that the Pentagon awarded a two-year no-bid contract to Halliburton for reconstructing Iraqi oil fields. The contract is worth up to $7 billion. The contract was awarded without competitive bidding. See Steve Kroft, “Halliburton: All in the Family,” 60 Minutes, April 27, 2003.

[73] Gerald Berreman, “Is Anthropology Alive?” Current Anthropology 9, no. 5 (December 1968): 391–396.

 [Back Matter]

 List of Contributors

SERGEI ARUTYUNOV is a member of the Russian Academy of Sciences and Chair of the Caucasus Department at the Institute of Ethnology in Moscow.

TALAL ASAD is Distinguished Professor at the City University of New York Graduate Center, Ph.D. Program in Anthropology.

KAMRAN ASDAR ALI is Assistant Professor in Anthropology and Middle Eastern Studies at the University of Texas at Austin.

WILLIAM O. BEEMAN is Professor of Anthropology at Brown University.

GERALD D. BERREMAN is Professor Emeritus at the University of California, Berkeley.

FRANZ BOAS (1858–1942) was Professor and Chair of the Department of Anthropology at Columbia University.

PIERRE BOURDIEU (1931–2002) was Professor at the College de France.

JOHN BURDICK is Associate Professor of Anthropology at Syracuse University.

ROBERT CANFIELD is Professor of Anthropology at Washington University.

IAN CHESNOV is Professor of Anthropology at Russia’s State Humanitarian University in Moscow.

WADE DAVIS is an Explorer-in-Residence at the National Geographic Society.

MARC EDELMAN is Professor of Anthropology at Hunter College and at the City University of New York Graduate Center, Ph.D. Program in Anthropology.

DAVID B. EDWARDS is Associate Professor of Anthropology at Williams College.

DALE F. EICKELMAN is Professor of Anthropology at Dartmouth University.

FADWA EL GUINDI is Adjunct Professor of Anthropology at the University of Southern California.

ROBERT FERNEA is Professor of Anthropology at the University of Texas at Austin.

ASHRAF GHANI is Minister of Finance in the new government of Afghanistan. He is also Adjunct Professor of Anthropology at Johns Hopkins University.

LESLEY GILL is Associate Professor of Anthropology at American University.

ROBERTO J. GONZÁLEZ is Assistant Professor of Anthropology at San Jose State University.

HUGH GUSTERSON is Professor of Anthropology and Science and Technology Studies at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

JEFF HALPER is Professor of Anthropology at Ben Gurion University (Israel), and coordinator of the Israeli Committee against House Demolitions.

DAVID HARVEY is Distinguished Professor at the City University of New York Graduate Center, Ph.D. Program in Anthropology.

ROBERT M. HAYDEN is Associate Professor of Anthropology at the University of Pittsburgh.

CINDI KATZ is Professor of Geography at the City University of New York.

CATHERINE LUTZ is Professor of Anthropology at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.

MAHMOOD MAMDANI is Herbert Lehman Professor of Anthropology and Government and director of the Institute of African Studies at Columbia University.

BEATRIZ MANZ is Professor of Geography and Ethnic Studies at the University of California, Berkeley.

JANET MCINTOSH is Assistant Professor of Anthropology at Brandeis University.

THOMAS MCKENNA is Assistant Professor of Anthropology at the University of Alabama at Birmingham.

MARGARET MEAD (1901–1978) was Professor of Social Sciences at Fordham University and Adjunct Professor of Anthropology at Columbia University.

JAMES MERRYMAN is Professor of Sociology and Anthropology at Wilkes University.

SHAHMAHMOOD MIAKHEL is an Independent Photojournalist based in Washington, D.C.

LAURA NADER is Professor of Anthropology at the University of California, Berkeley.

BARBARA NIMRI AZIZ is Producer and News Reporter with Pacifica Radio Network and WBAI-New York.

DAVID PRICE is Assistant Professor of Anthropology at St. Martin’s College.

ALI QLEIBO is head of the Faculty of Fine Arts at Al-Quds University (Jerusalem).

MARSHALL SAHLINS is Professor Emeritus of Anthropology at the University of Chicago.

NAZIF SHAHRANI is Professor of Anthropology and Central Asian and Middle Eastern Studies at Indiana University.

ZIEBA SHORISH-SHAMLEY is Executive Director of the Women's Alliance for Peace and Human Rights in Afghanistan.

ANNA SIMONS is Associate Professor of Defense Analysis at the Naval Postgraduate School.

NEIL SMITH is Distinguished Professor of Anthropology and Geography at the City University of New York Graduate Center.

IDA SUSSER is Professor at the City University of New York Graduate Center, Ph.D. Program in Anthropology.

WINIFRED TATE is a Ph.D. candidate in the Department of Anthropology at New York University, and a research fellow at the Washington Office on Latin America.

 Permissions

The author is grateful for permission to reproduce the following copyrighted material:

 Articles

“Scientists as Spies” by Franz Boas. Reprinted with permission from the October 16, 1919 issue of The Nation.

“War Is Only an Invention—Not a Biological Necessity” by Margaret Mead. Reprinted with permission by Mary Catherine Bateson.

“Once You’ve Broken Him Down ...” by Marshall Sahlins. Reprinted with permission from the October 25, 1965 issue of The Nation.

“Contemporary Anthropology and Moral Accountability” by Gerald D. Berreman. From To See Ourselves: Anthropology and Modern Social Issues edited by Thomas Weaver. Reprinted by permission of Pearson Education (PrenticeHall Publishers). Used by permission of the publisher.

“Two Plus Two Equals Zero—War and Peace Reconsidered” by Laura Nader. Originally published in The Radcliffe Quarterly, March 1983. Reprinted by permission of the author.

“Dollars That Forge Guatemalan Chains” by Beatriz Manz. Originally published in The New York Times, March 18, 1985. Copyright © 1985 by The New York Times Company. Reprinted by permission.

“Anthropologists as Spies” by David Price. Reprinted with permission from the November 20, 2000 issue of The Nation.

“Abuse of Power by the Advocates of Reason” by Pierre Bourdieu. Copyright © 1998 Acts of Resistance: Against the Tyranny of the Market by Pierre Bourdieu. Reprinted by permission of The New Press. (800) 233–4830.

“West Must Correct Its Mistakes in Yugoslavia” by Robert M. Hayden. Originally published in The Baltimore Sun, August 16, 1992. Reprinted by permission of the author.

“No Exit from Somalia” by Anna Simons. Originally published in The Washington Post, May 15, 1991. Reprinted by permission of the author.

“Our Abysmal Ignorance about Somalia” by Anna Simons. Originally published in The Washington Post, December 6, 1992. Reprinted by permission of the author.

“The Somalia Trap” by Anna Simons. Originally published in The Washington Post, August 15, 1993. Reprinted by permission of the author.

“Increased U.S. Military Aid to Colombia Won’t Curb Drug Trafficking” by Winifred Tate. Originally published in The San Francisco Chronicle, August 19, 1999. Reprinted by permission of the author.

“Colombia: Rules of the Game” by Winifred Tate. Originally published in Foreign Policy in Focus, February 16, 2001. Reprinted by permission of the publisher. Online information at [[http://www.foreignpolicy-infocus.org][www.foreignpolicy-infocus.org]].

“Colombia: Unveiling U.S. Policy” by Lesley Gill. Originally published in Foreign Policy in Focus, April 19, 2002. Reprinted by permission of the publisher. Online information at [[http://www.foreignpolicy-infocus.org][www.foreignpolicy-infocus.org]].

“The Price of Free Trade—Famine” by Marc Edelman. Originally published in The Los Angeles Times, March 22, 2002. Reprinted by permission of the author.

“How Two Truths Make One Tragedy” by Ali Qleibo. Originally published in The Independent (UK), October 22, 2000. Reprinted by permission of the author.

“The Matrix of Control” by Jeff Halper. Originally published in MediaMonitors .net, 2001. Reprinted by permission of the author.

“After the Occupation: Now What?” by Jeff Halper. Originally published in CounterPunch, 2002. Reprinted by permission of the author.

“If U.S. Dumps Test Ban Treaty, China Will Rejoice” by Hugh Gusterson. Originally published in The Los Angeles Times, July 29, 2001. Reprinted by permission of the author.

“Cut Off the Arms Flow and Let Afghans Unite” by Ashraf Ghani. Originally published in The Los Angeles Times, February 15, 1989. Reprinted by permission of the author.

“U.S. Can Strengthen African Ties in Wake of Terrorism with Aid, Clear Policies” by James Merryman. Originally published in The Patriot-News, August 24, 1998. Reprinted by permission of the author.

“Egyptians Don’t Like Saddam, But...” by Robert Fernea. Originally published in The Austin American-Statesman, January 14, 1991. Reprinted by permission of the author.

“Gravesites—Environmental Ruin in Iraq” by Barbara Nimri Aziz. From Metal of Dishonor, edited by the Depleted Uranium Education Project. Copyright © 1997 by International Action Center. Reprinted by permission of the author.

“U.N. Should Act to Protect Muslim Women” by Fadwa El Guindi. Originally published in Newsday, April 13, 1998. Reprinted by permission of the author.

“Women Under the New Taliban” by Jana Wendt and Zieba Shorish-Shamley. Copyright © 2001 by Special Broadcasting Service (Australia). Reprinted by permission of the broadcast network.

“Follow the Oil Trail—Mess in Afghanistan Partly Our Government’s Fault” by William O. Beeman. Originally published by Pacific News Service, August 24, 1998. Reprinted by permission of the author. All rights reserved.

“Our Legacy of War” by Catherine Lutz. Originally published in The Chronicle of Higher Education, September 28, 2001. Reprinted by permission of the author.

“Local Horror/Global Response” by David Harvey, Talal Asad, Cindi Katz, Neil Smith, and Ida Susser. Originally published in The Chronicle of Education Online Colloquy, 2001. Reprinted by permission of the author.

“A War Our Great-Grandchildren Will Be Fighting—Understanding Bin Laden” by William O. Beeman. Originally published by Pacific News Service, September 14, 2001. Reprinted by permission of the author. All rights reserved.

“What Have the 9/11 Investigators Overlooked?” by Janet McIntosh. Originally published in The Christian Science Monitor, July 11, 2002. Reprinted by permission of the author.

“For a Global Declaration of Interdependence” by Wade Davis. Originally published in The International Herald Tribune, July 6, 2002. Reprinted by permission of the author.

“Nation Is Home to Afghans, Mujahedeen, Taliban, Afghan-Arabs, to Name a Few” by Robert Canfield. Originally published in The St. Louis Post-Dispatch, September 23, 2001. Reprinted by permission of the author.

“The Folly of Quick Action in Afghanistan” by Ashraf Ghani. Originally published in Financial Times, September 27, 2001. Reprinted by permission of the author.

“Afghanistan Can Learn from Its Past” by Nazif Shahrani. Originally published in The New York Times, October 14, 2001. Copyright © 2001 by The New York Times Company. Reprinted by permission.

“Women in the New Afghanistan” by Amy Goodman with Zieba Shorish-Shamley. Copyright © 2001 by Pacifica Radio and Democracy Now! Reprinted by permission of the broadcast network.

“Enlisting Afghan Aid” by David Edwards and Shahmahmood Miakhel. Originally published by People’s Geography, 2001. Reprinted by permission of the author.

“Pakistan’s Dilemma” by Kamran Asdar Ali. Originally published by Middle East Research Information Project (MERIP Press Information Note 69), September 19, 2001. Reprinted by permission of the publisher and the author. Online information at [[http://www.merip.org][www.merip.org]].

“War Destroyed Chechnya’s Clan Structure” by Francesca Mereu (with Sergei Arutyunov and Ian Chesnov). Originally published by Radio Free Europe/ Radio Liberty, January 4, 2002. Reprinted by permission of the publisher.

“U.S. Anti-Terrorist Message Won’t Fly in Islamic World” by William O. Beeman. Originally published by Pacific News Service, October 11, 2001. Reprinted by permission of the author. All rights reserved.

“Terror and Indigenous Peoples: War without End” by David Price. Originally published in CounterPunch, November 3, 2001. Reprinted by permission of the author.

“Afghan War Could Be Recruiting Tool for Terrorists” by John Burdick. Originally published in The Post-Standard, November 8, 2001. The Herald Company © 2001 The Post-Standard. All rights reserved. Reprinted with permission.

“First, Know the Enemy, Then Act” by Dale F. Eickelman. Originally published in The Los Angeles Times, December 9, 2001. Reprinted by permission of the author.

“Sept. 11 Exposes Futile Search for ‘Perfect’ Missile Defense” by John Burdick. Originally published in The Post-Standard, December 18, 2001. The Herald Company © 2001 The Post-Standard. All rights reserved. Reprinted with permission.

“Ignorance Is Not Bliss” by Roberto J. González. Originally published in The San Francisco Chronicle, January 2, 2002. Reprinted by permission of the author.

“Turn Off Your Tunnel Vision” by Mahmood Mamdani. Originally published in The Washington Post, January 6, 2002. Reprinted by permission of the author.

“The Roots of Muslim Separatism in the Philippines” (AsiaSource interview by Nermeen Shaikh with Thomas McKenna). Originally published by Asia-Source.org, January 2002. Copyright © 2001 The Asia Society. Online information at [[http://www.asiasource.org][www.asiasource.org]].

“Lynne Cheney-Joe Lieberman Group Puts Out a Blacklist” by Roberto J. González. Originally published by The San Jose Mercury News, December 14, 2001. Reprinted by permission of the author.

“Academia Under Attack: Sketches for a New Blacklist” by David Price. Originally published in CounterPunch, November 21, 2001. Reprinted by permission of the author.

“Lynne Cheney’s Free Speech Blacklist” by Sharon Basco with Hugh Gusterson. Originally published by TomPaine.com, January 5, 2002. Reprinted by permission of the publisher. Copyright © 2001 TomPaine.com.

“Harmony Coerced Is Freedom Denied” by Laura Nader. Originally published in The Chronicle of Higher Education, July 13, 2001. Reprinted by permission of the author.

 Illustrations

Figure 1. “The Other Ascent into the Unknown.” Copyright © 1965 Herblock. Originally published in The Washington Post. Reprinted by permission.

Figure 2. Copyright © 1981 by Clifford H. Baldowski. Originally published in The Atlanta Constitution. Reprinted by permission.

Figure 3. “Somalia.” Copyright © 1992 by Tom Tomorrow. Originally published

December 19, 1992. Reprinted by permission.

Figure 4. Copyright © 1998 by Matt Wuerker. Reprinted by permission.

Figure 5. “Greasing the War Machine’s Wheels.” Copyright © 2002 by Steve Breen. Originally published in The San Diego Union-Tribune, October 21, 2002. Reprinted by permission.

Figure 6. Copyright © 2002 by Rex Babin. Originally published in The Sacramento Bee. Reprinted by permission.

Figure 7. Copyright © 1998 by Matt Wuerker. Reprinted by permission.

Figure 8. Copyright © 2002 by Tom Toles. Originally published by The Buffalo News. Reprinted by permission.

Figure 9. Copyright © 2001 by Daryl Cagle. Originally published by Slate.com. Reprinted by permission.

Figure 10. Copyright © 2001 by Tom Meyer. Originally published in The San Francisco Chronicle. Reprinted by permission.

Figure 11. Copyright © 2001 by Aaron McGruder. Originally syndicated by Universal Press Syndicate, October 4–6, 2001. Reprinted by permission.

Figure 12. Copyright © 2001 by Ann Telnaes. Originally syndicated by Tribune Media Services, September 29, 2001. Reprinted by permission.

 Index

Aborigines, Australian, 29

Abu Sayyaf, 231–233

Academic freedom, threats to, 241251

Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome, (AIDS), 157

Afghanistan, 258: civilian casualties in, 222–225; civil war in, 173–175, 194; condition of women in, 144146, 183–188; consequences of U.S. war, 127, 211–213, 222–225, 248, 258; ethnic composition of, 147148, 173–175; history of, 180–182, 215; Islamic extremists in, 162, 176, 181–182, 189–191, 215; mujahedeen in, 123, 173–175, 182, 215; Pakistani relations with, 177–178, 193, 194–196; politics in, 180–188; reconstruction of, 176–179, 190191; under Taliban rule, 144–149, 173–177; U.N. policies towards, 179–182, 186–187; U.S. policies towards, 123–125, 144, 147–149, 176–179, 189–191, 226–227; war with Soviet Union, 123–125, 173175, 177–178, 189–190, 193–194, 215

Africa: consequences of “war on terror” in, 129, 226–228; foreign investment, 128; natural resources, 128; postcolonial wars, 210; U.S. policies towards, 127–129

Aideed, Mohammed, 88–89 Al-Afghani, Jamal al-Din, 206

Algeria, 217: civil war in, 140–143; condition of women in, 140–143; independence from France, 140; U.S. policies towards, 140–143; violence in, 140–143, 214, 260

Ali, Kamran Asdar, 15, 192

Al Jazeera, 217, 223

Al Qaeda, 34, 175, 211, 221: and globalization, 214–218; as manifestation of global inequality, 166; as revitalization movement, 166; search for, 226; structure of, 160; training camps, 162

American Anthropological Association (AAA), 8, 11, 12, 23: censure of Franz Boas by, 63, 65, 70; collaboration with CIA, 66–67; and Gulf War, 67; Principles of Professional Responsibility, 46, 62, 67–70

American Association of University Professors (AAUP), 246

American Council of Trustees and Alumni (ACTA): blacklist of academics, 17–18, 163, 239–251; history of, 240–241, 243–244

Ammash, Huda, 135

Amnesty International, 2, 140, 142

Andaman Islanders, 29

Andean Regional Initiative, 97, 100

Angola, 265: South African intervention in, 227; U.S. involvement in, 226–227

Anthropologists: as citizen-scholars, 10; and Cold War, 11; and colonialism, 258–259; communication with general public, 8,17–18, 51; diagnoses of U.S. foreign policy, 3–4; employment of, by corporations, 69; involvement in counterinsurgency, 46–49; outreach efforts by, 2–4, 11–19; perspectives of, 4–6; role of in public sphere, 264–267; social responsibility of, 4, 6–12, 24–25, 46–51; as spies, 23–25, 47, 62–70; and Vietnam War, 11, 34, 63; and “war on terror,” 265–267; and World War I, 23–25; and World War II, 10–11, 26, 63, 65–66

Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty, 219, 221 Appalachia, 2

Arafat, Yasser, 106, 113 Arbenz, Jacobo, 58, 66 Arendt, Hannah, 264 Armed Islamic Group, 140 Arms race, nuclear (See Nuclear arms race)

Arthur Anderson, 9

Arutyunov, Sergei, 16, 197–202 Auerbach, Jerold, 254

Australia, 146

Aziz, Barbara Nimri, 14, 133

Baker, James, 266

Balinese, conflict resolution of, 30 Balkans, 78–81, 159

Bangladeshis, 82

Bantustan, 111, 113

Barnet, Richard, 55

Barth, Fredrik, 19

Bartra, Roger, 2

Basaev, Shamil, 202

Basques, 210

Bateson, Gregory, 10, 65

Batnev, Valery, 198

Bechtel Corporation, 267

Beeman, William O., 15, 16, 147, 158, 205

Bell, Daniel, 168

Benedict, Ruth, 2, 10: involvement in World War II research, 26, 63, 65

Berreman, Gerald, 12, 13, 46, 62, 68

Berthold, Richard, 244

Bethe, Hans, 53, 54

Bin Laden, Osama, 179, 192–193, 249: association with Al Qaeda, 147, 149, 158–160, 173–175, 189, 192–193, 215–217; role in Soviet-Afghan war, 123; role in U.S. embassy bombings, 127; search for, 211–213, 221, 224

Birth defects, in post-war Iraq, 134, 137–138

Blair, Tony, 217

Boas, Franz, 2, 6, 13, 23, 47, 62: censure of by AAA, 63, 65, 70

Bodley, John, 1

Bohannan, Paul, 254

Borofsky, Robert, 2, 19

Bosnia, 142, 162: civil war in, 75–77; territorial integrity of, 76–77

Bosnians, 75–77, 141

Bourdieu, Pierre, 2, 13, 71

Brahimi, Lakhdar, 181

Brainwashing, 34–45

Brazil, 2

Brugmann, Bruce, 255

Burdick, John, 16, 211, 219

Burgan, Mary, 246

Burke, Edmund, 50

Bush, George H. W., 131, 266: presidential administration of, 123–125, 130–132, 208, 210

Bush, George W., 9, 62, 163, 165, 179, 252: Afghanistan policy, 180, 189; Central America policy, 102–104; Colombia policy, 97, 99–100, 221, 252; presidential administration of, 9, 161–164, 205–207, 258–260; withdrawal from Anti-Ballistic

Missile Treaty, 219, 221

Calder, Nigel, 56

Cambodia, 155

Canfield, Robert, 15, 173

Carlyle Group, 266–267

Carrington, Lord, 76

Casey, William, 123

Chechnya: clans, 197–200; Islamic extremism in, 200–202; repression of Muslims in, 215; Sufism in, 197–198, 200–202; Wahhabism in, 197, 200–202; war in, 197–202, 210

Cheney, Lynne, 163, 239–241, 244, 249–250

Cheney, Richard (Dick), 260, 267 Chesnov, Ian, 16, 197–198

Chile, 155

China: nuclear weapons, 219, 221 Chomsky, Noam, 8, 48, 249, 260 Clans, Chechen, 197–200

Clinton, Bill, 58: Balkans policy, 76;

Colombia policy, 93; presidential administration of, 78–80; Somalia policy, 84, 88; Sudan policy, 162

Coca (See Narcotics)

Cold War, 123, 194, 196, 261: consequences in Third World countries, 3, 128; as justification for state terrorism, 226–227; similarity to “war on terror,” 210; and threat of nuclear war, 153–155

Colombia, 214, 258: civil war, 91–104; destruction of crops in, 94, 97–99; human rights abuses by military, 91–93, 94–96; oil corporations in, 99–100; U.S. aid to, 91–101; U.S. counternarcotics efforts, 91–101

Colonialism: anthropological critiques of, 258; British, 193, 205, 260; European, 205–206; French, 205; ideological justifications for, 258; in Middle East, 205–207; Roman, 260; Russian, 205; Spanish, 229–231, 260; United States, 3, 206–207, 230–231, 257–260

Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty, 117–120, 219

Conflict resolution: ordeal, 32; trial by jury, 32

Cook, Sam, 2

Corporations: influence in U.S. politics, 3, 9, 266–267; mass media, 8, 224, 263; and military-industrial complex, 52–57; oil interests in

Colombia, 99–100; support of scientific research by, 48–49

Cranston, Alan, 54

Croatia, 76

Croats, 76–77

Cultural Survival, 19

Davis, Wade, 15, 165

Dell, Hymes, 12

DeMott, Benjamin, 252

Depleted uranium, 133–134

Detentions: of Arabs and Muslims in U.S., 9; of “enemy combatants” in Guantanamo Bay, 163; of Japanese-Americans in U.S., 250

Development, economic, 3

Diplomacy, preventive, 6, 264

Dowd, Douglas, 47, 50

Drugs, narcotic (See Narcotics)

Dutch Guiana, 31

Edelman, Marc, 14, 102

Edwards, David B., 15, 189

Egypt, 216: response to Middle East crises, 130–132; role in Gulf War, 210; U.S. support for, 206

Eickelman, Dale F., 16, 214

Eisenhower, Dwight D., 11, 55, 261

El-Durrah, Mohammed, 106

El Guindi, Fadwa, 14, 140

Elias, Norbert, 253

El Salvador, 102–103, 248, 260

English-Lueck, Jan, 2

Enron, 9

Environment: impact of Gulf War on, 133–139

Eskimos, lack of warfare among, 28–29

Fairness and Accuracy in Reporting

(FAIR), 263

Famine, in Central America, 102–104

Fear: uses of in contemporary U.S., 261; uses of in Nazi Germany, 261

Fernea, Robert, 14, 130

Foley, Thomas, 266

Fort Bragg (North Carolina), 150

France, 2, 214

Free Trade Area of the Americas, 102–103

Friedman, Thomas, 246

Gates, Henry Louis, Jr., 8

Georgia, 226, 258

Germany, 26, 56, 77

Ghani, Ashraf, 14, 15, 123, 176

Gill, Lesley, 14, 97

Globalization, corporate, 71–72, 102–104, 156

Gonzalez, Roberto J., 16, 222, 239

Goodman, Amy, 183

Gorbachev, Mikhail, 200

Gore, Albert, 252

Gorer, Geoffrey, 27

Gough, Kathleen, 49, 258

Gouldner, Alvin, 51

Guantanamo Bay, 163

Guatemala, 93, 102–103, 155, 265: civil war in, 58; death squads, 58; human rights violations in, 59, 260; indigenous people of, 58–61; political violence in, 59–61, 260; role of CIA in civil war, 58–61

Guevara, Ernesto “Che,” 35

Gulf War, 80, 210: effects on agriculture, 136–137; environmental impact of, 133–139; health effects of, 133–139; response to by AAA, 67; role of Egypt in, 210; role of Saudi Arabia in, 159; Syndrome, 134

Gusterson, Hugh, 14, 16, 117, 247, 257, 264

Haiti, 155, 260

Halliburton Corporation, 267

Halper, Jeff, 14, 108, 112

Haram al-Sharif, 105–106, 108, 160

Harmony, coercive, 252–255

Harner, Michael, 46–47

Harvey, David, 15, 156

Hayden, Robert M., 14, 75, 78

Heckler, Nuriel, 244

Hernandez Lopez, Rafael, 92

Herold, Marc, 223–224

Hogg, Douglas, 193

Honduras, 102–103

Hoover, J. Edgar, 63, 65

Human Relations Area Files (HRAF), 10

Human Rights Watch, 142

Hussein, Saddam, 80, 130–132, 259260

Ibrahim, Saad Eddin, 217

India, 2, 75, 77: conflict with Pakistan, 117; nuclear weapons, 117, 219, 221; under British rule, 181, 193

Indonesia, 102–103, 215, 260, 265: as predominantly Muslim nation, 212, 229

Inequality, economic: in Guatemala, 58; as source of potential conflict, 165–168; inU.S., 9

Institutionalized insanity, 53–54, 264 Intellectuals, public, 1, 8, 47–51 International Court of Justice, 261 International Criminal Court, 262 International Monetary Fund (IMF), 71, 72, 157, 266

Intifada, second, 106, 108, 113

Iran: involvement in Afghan politics, 124–125; relations with Taliban, 147–148; revolution in, 167, support of by U.S., 206

Iraq, 85, 258, 260: agriculture in, 136–137; environmental damage in, 133–139; and Gulf War, 9, 130, 133–139; health crises, 133–136, 137–139; impact of U.N. sanctions on, 133; invasion of Kuwait by, 130–133; post-war instability, 259–260; relationship with U.S., 130–132; Shiite population in, 259; use of poison gas against Kurds, 130; U.S. occupation of, 259–260; U.S. war against, 258–260

Irish, 210

Islamic extremism, 89, 217–218: in Afghanistan, 173–175; Afghan war as recruiting tool for, 181–182, 189–191; in Chechnya, 200–202; in Pakistan, 192, 194–195

Islamic resistance: historical context of, 206–207; in Soviet Union, 200; U.S. support of in Afghanistan, 123–124

Islamic Salvation Front, 140–141 Israel, 80, 158, 160: attacks on Palestinian territories by, 112–113; human rights violations, 109, 113; occupation of Lebanon by, 131; occupation of Palestinian territories by, 105–116, 130–131; suicide bombings in, 106, 112, 115, 214; U.S. aid to, 108, 113–115; U.S. policy towards, 163–164

Jackson, Jesse, 244

Japan, 10, 26, 56, 214

Japanese-Americans, internment of, 10, 250

Jiang, Zemin, 118

Jones, T. K., 54

Kadaffi, Muammar, 234–235

Karim, Wazir, 7

Karzai, Hamid, 176

Kashmir, 215

Kennedy, John F., 55

Kenya, 161, 163: bombing of U.S. embassy in, 127–129, 147

Khan, Abdur Rahman, 181

King, Angela, 185

Kissinger, Henry, 155

Kluckhohn, Clyde, 10, 65

Koran, 167

Kosovo: conflict in, 78–81; ethnic Albanians in, 78–79; history of, 79; NATO bombing of, 78–81; refugees from, 78–80

Kosovo Liberation Army, 78–79

Kurds, 82, 130

Kusov, Oleg, 202

Kuwait, 83, 85: invasion of by Iraq, 130–132; relationship with U.S., 130–132, 206

Kyrgystan, 258

Lakoff, Robin, 254–255

Lamm, Richard, 244

Lebanon, 80, 160, 215: massacre of Palestinian refugees in, 106; under

Israeli occupation, 131

Leighton, Alexander, 48

Leo, John, 246

Lepchas, lack of warfare among, 28, 30

Levi-Strauss, Claude, 2

Libya, 235, 260

Lieberman, Joseph, 240, 244

Likud party, 105

Living Beyond Culture, 19

Lothrop, Samuel, 63–65

Loya jirga, 183–185

Lutz, Catherine, 15, 153, 260

Lynd, Robert, 49

Macaffrey, Barry, 93

Macedonia, 80

Mack, Myrna, 58

Major, John, 162, 266

Malaysia, 229

Malinowski, Bronislaw, 6

Mamdani, Mahmood, 16, 226

Manhattan Project, 53

Manz, Beatriz, 13, 58

Mao, Zedong, 35

Maori, warfare among, 30

Marijuana (See Narcotics)

Martin, Jerry, 241, 244

Maskhadov, Aslan, 198, 202

Mason, John, 63

Mass media: censorship in, 154;

corporatization of, 8, 224, 263; critiques of, 262–263;

homogenization of, 8; reporting in Afghanistan, 224–225;

self-censorship, 262–263

Mayans, 59–61

McCarthy, Joseph, 243

McCarthyism, 155, 246, 250; in the post-September 11 era, 242

McGruder, Aaron, 239

McIntosh, Janet, 15, 161

McKenna, Thomas, 16, 229

Mead, Margaret, 2, 6, 11, 13, 65: involvement in World War II research, 10, 26–27

Mejia Victores, Oscar Humberto, 59

Melman, Seymour, 56

Mencken, H. L., 40

Merryman, James, 14, 127

Mexico, 2, 210, 253

Miakhel, Shahmamood, 15, 187

Middle East: conflict in, 105–116;

peace accords, 106, 110, 112, 115

Military-industrial complex, 52–57, 261, 266–267

Mills, C. Wright, 1, 47, 49–50, 51, 266

Milosevic, Slobodan, 78

Minh, Ho Chi, 35

Missile defense shield, 219–221

Misuari, Nur, 232

Moerman, Michael, 67

Montagu, Ashley, 2

Morley, Sylvanus, 63

Morocco, 216–217

Moro Islamic Liberation Front (MILF), 231–235

Moro National Liberation Front (MNLF), 231–235

Mozambique: U.S. involvement in, 226–227

Mozambique National Resistance (RENAMO), 227

Mujahedeen, 123, 173–175, 182 (See also Islamic resistance)

Murdock, George P., 10

Musharraf, Pervez, 192, 195–196

Nader, Laura, 7, 13, 16, 52, 252, 257, 264

Narcotics, 91; and Colombia, 91–96; U.S. eradication efforts, 94–95, 97–99

Nasser, Abdel, 167

National Liberation Army (Colombia), 100

National Liberation Forces (See Viet Cong)

National Liberation Front (Algeria), 140

National Security Act, 155

National Security Strategy, 259, 264

National Union for the Total Independence of Angola (UNITA), 227

Neal, Anne, 241, 244

Negroponte, John, 260

Neoliberalism, 71

Nicaragua, 102–103, 265: U.S. involvement in, 226–227, 248

Nolasco, Margarita, 2

North American Treaty Organization (NATO), bombing of Kosovo, 78–81

Northern Alliance, 175, 180: treatment of women by, 181, 186–187

Northern Ireland, 214

Nuclear arms race, 55–56, 120, 153155

Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty, 119–120

Nuclear Posture Review, 117, 219

Nuclear weapons, 52–57: Chinese, 117–120; impact of in Nagasaki and Hiroshima, 26; Indian, 117120; movement against, 56, 120; Pakistani, 117–120; proliferation of, 219–221; resumption of development by U.S., 117–120, 264; Russian, 117–120; “small-scale,” 264; U.S., 117

Obando y Bravo, Miguel, 103

Occidental Petroleum, 99

Office of Strategic Services (See U.S.

Central Intelligence Agency)

Ogaden War, 86

Oil: in Caspian Sea, 147–149; in Colombia, 99–100; and U.S. foreign policy, 147–149

Omar, Mohammed, 181, 195

Organizational survival, 54–55

Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC), 235

Orwell, George, 225, 260–261, 262

Pakistan, 226, 235: conflict with India, 117; Islamic extremism in, 192, 194–195; nuclear weapons, 117, 219, 221; politics in, 192, 194, 195–196; in post-September 11 context, 192–196; relationship with Afghanistan, 177–178, 193, 194–196; relationship with U.S., 192–196; support for Islamic extremists in Afghanistan, 123, 173175; support for Taliban, 147–149, 181, 192, 195, 212

Palestinians: human rights violations of, 109, 113; living conditions of, 108–113; massacre of refugees in Lebanon, 106; restriction of movement, 106–107; unemployment among, 109

Palestinian territories, 158, 215; cantonization of, 108–113; Israeli attacks upon, 112–113; Israeli occupation of, 105–116; Israeli settlements in, 110–111, 113–114

Panama: U.S. involvement in, 248 Park Tae Joon, 266

Patterson, Thomas, 244

Pearl, Daniel, 163

Pearl Harbor, 65, 155

Pedelty, Mark, 263

Pentagon, 2, 158 (See also U.S. Department of Defense)

Perlika, Suralia, 186

Permanent war economy, 55–57

Peru, 64, 214

Philippines: history of, 229–235; Muslim-Christian relations in, 229–235; Muslim separatist movements in, 229–235; Spanish colonialism in, 229–231; U.S. involvement in, 226, 229–231, 258, 260

Pinochet, Augusto, 155

Plains Indians, 31

Plan Colombia, 94–98

Politkovskaya, Anna, 202

Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola (MPLA), 227

Portillo, Alfonso, 103

Powell, Colin, 112, 209, 260

Price, David, 13, 16, 62, 208

Prisoners of war, 35, 39, 40

Project Camelot, 46, 49, 66

Prokosh, Eric, 2

Propaganda, 251: of mass media, 266; of U.S. government, 266; of Viet

Cong, 44–45

Public sphere: role of anthropologists in, 264–267

Pueblo Indians, 29–30

Pushtuns, 148

Qleibo, Ali, 14, 105

Quinonez, Rodrigo, 92

Radnev, Salman, 198

Ramos, Fidel, 266

Rape, 141–143

Rashid, Ahmed, 175

Rather, Dan, 262

Reagan, Ronald, 53, 120

Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC), 91–93, 95, 97–100

Rickover, Hyman, 54, 55, 57

Rockefeller Foundation, 64

Rumsfeld, Donald, 220, 260

Russia: during czarist era, 181; war in Chechnya, 197–202, 210

Rwanda, 227

Sadiq Odeh, Mohammed, 162

Sahlins, Marshall, 6, 12, 13, 34

Said, Edward, 8

Salamat, Hashim, 232

Sassen, Saskia, 8

Saudi Arabia, 83, 158, 235, 260: and

Gulf War, 159; support for Islamic extremists in Afghanistan, 173175; support for Taliban, 147–149, 212; support of by U.S., 206; U.S.

military bases in, 159

Scheer, Robert, 53–54

Schor, Juliet, 8

Sedition Act, 250

Sen, Amartya, 103

September 11 attacks, 2, 4, 100, 173175, 219, 221, 226: and Al Qaeda, 214–216; as catalyst for “war on terror,” 260; censorship in aftermath of, 241–251, 262–263; and cultural myopia, 165–168; and

Middle East Conflict, 160; motives for attacks, 158–160; symbolic importance of, 263; U.S. response to, 205–207

Serbs, history of, 76; military campaign in Bosnia, 75–76

Shah, Reza, 167

Shah, Zakir, 180

Shahrani, Nazif, 15, 180

Shalikashvili, John, 118

Sharia law, 194

Sharon, Ariel, 105–106, 108, 113, 160, 164

Shorish-Shamley, Zieba, 14, 144, 183

Sierra Leone, 227

Silk Route, 145

Simons, Anna, 14, 82, 84, 88

Sioux, warfare among, 30

Slovenia, 76

Somalia, 226: civil war in, 82–83;

history of, 84–86; relations with Kenya, 83; relations with Kuwait, 83; U.N. involvement in, 84, 86;

U.S. arms shipments to, 82, 86;

U.S. intervention in, 84–90; U.S. withdrawal from, 88–90

Somme, 155

South Africa, 155, 262: involvement in Angola, 227

Southern Philippines Council for Peace and Development (SPCPD), 234

Soviet Union, 27: arms race with U.S., 52–53, 153; involvement in Angola, 227; persecution of Muslims in, 200; war in Afghanistan, 123–125, 173–175, 177–178, 189–190, 193–194, 215

Spain, 210, 214

Spinder, Herbert, 63

Sri Lanka, 210, 214

Stalin, Josef, 197, 200

Stavenhagen, Rodolfo, 2

Stiglitz, Joseph, 71

Stockpile Stewardship and Maintenance Program, 119

Sudan, U.S. bombing of, 127, 162

Sufism, 197–198, 200–202

Suicide bombings, Middle East, 106, 112, 115

Taips (See Clans, Chechen)

Tajiks, 148

Taliban, 123, 189–190: ascent to power of, 147–149, 173–177, 180182, 212; human rights violations by, 144–146; Pakistani support of, 192, 195; torture of by U.S. military personnel, 34; treatment of women by, 144–146, 187; U.S. relations with, 144, 176–177, 212–213

Tamils, 210

Tanzania, 227: bombing of U.S. embassy in, 127–129, 147

Tate, Winifred, 14, 91, 94

Teach-in, 18, 34

Temple Mount, 105–106, 108, 160

Tenet, George, 216

Terrorism, 214: in Afghanistan, 191; carried out by states, 59–61, 153155, 209–210, 226–227, 248, 260, 265; in Colombia, 100–101; as label used to define enemies of Western states, 261; as response to economic coercion, 72; as response to Israeli occupation, 106, 112, 115; as response to U.S. bombing, 211–213, 266; root causes of, 161–169

Thatcher, Margaret, 76

Third World, 3, 128

Thompson, Laura, 65

Torture: by U.S. military personnel, 34; in Vietnam War, 34–45; in Guatemala, 59

Turkey, 79–80, 214, 260

Ukraine, 155

Ul Haq, Zia, 193, 195–196

United Fruit Company, 58

United Kingdom, 206, 210, 214, 259

United Nations: Charter, 262; policies towards Afghanistan, 179182, 186–187; role in stabilizing Algerian civil war, 140–143; Security Council, 9, 259; Security Council Resolution #242, 108; and U.S., 9, 264

United States, 165–169: arms race with Soviet Union, 52–53, 153155; bombing of Sudan by, 127, 162; detentions of Arabs and Muslims in, 9, 163;

disregard of international law, 259, 262; importance of oil in foreign policy, 147–149; inequality in, 9; intervention in Somalia, 84–90; legal reform in, 253; Middle East foreign policy, 130–132, 165–169, 205–207; military expansion of, 258–260; occupation of Iraq, 259260; and “permanent state of war,” 153–155; permanent war economy in, 55–56; policies towards Afghanistan, 176–179; policies towards African countries, 127–129; policies towards Colombia, 91–101; policies towards Philippines, 229–231; political system, 9; relations with Afghanistan, 147–149, 176–179; relations with Islamic world, 158–160; relations with Israel, 163–164; relations with Pakistan, 192–196; and rise of Taliban, 176–177; support for client states, 153–155; support for mujahedeen and Taliban, 123–125, 147–149; and U.N., 262; unilateralism, 259, 264; use of violence against other countries, 156–157, 248, 266; war in Afghanistan, 127, 211–213, 222–225; war in Gulf, 210; war with Iraq, 258–260; war in Vietnam, 34–45

U.S. Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), 9, 10–11, 224, 265: collaboration with AAA, 66–67; role in Guatemalan civil war, 58–61; role in supporting mujahedeen, 173175, 192; and September 11 attacks, 161–162

U.S. Department of Defense, 2, 54, 78, 86, 134, 222–224: Office of Reconstruction and Humanitarian Assistance, 259

U.S. Department of Homeland Security, 161, 246

U.S. Department of State, 66, 78, 86, 100, 142

U.S. Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), 9, 243; files on anthropologists, 63; and September 11 attacks, 161–162

U.S. Office of War Information, 10, 66

U.S. War Relocation Authority, 10 Uzbekistan, 258

Vance, Cyrus, 76

Venezuela, 258

Viet Cong, 35, 38, 41, 77, 108

Vietnam, 10, 34–45, 49–50, 108, 155: coffee production, 102–103; U.S. war in, 35–45, 248

Vietnamese Popular Forces, 35

Wahhabism, 123, 197, 200–202 (See also Islamic extremism)

Wakin, Eric, 67

War: in Afghanistan, 127, 211–213, 222–225; in Chechnya, 199–200; continuous, 261–262; as cultural invention, 26–33; on drugs, 91–96; in Guatemala, 58–61; in Iraq, 210, 258–260; nuclear, 26, 52–57, 153; permanent, 153–155, 261–262; and racism, 154; veterans' attitudes towards, 153; in Vietnam, 34–45 "War on terror," 3, 9, 113, 205–207, 210: and abridgement of human rights, 215–216; and anti-U. S. sentiment, 161–164; Chinese response to, 208–210; consequences in African countries, 129, 226–228; consequences in Chechnya, 209210; consequences in Colombia, 97; consequences for indigenous peoples and minorities, 208–210; consequences in Philippines, 229; consequences on Third World countries, 3; historical context of, 205–207, 260; as reaction to September 11 attacks, 260; risk of using cultural knowledge for, 265; Russian response to, 208—210; similarities to Cold War, 210;

U.N. response to, 209

Watkins, Joe, 68

West, Cornel, 8

Willey, Gordon, 64

Williams, James, 27

Williams, Patricia J., 8

Wilson, Charles E., 55

Wilson, Robert, 53

Wilson, Woodrow, 24

Wolak, Frank, 255

Wolf, Eric, 12, 47

Wolfowitz, Paul, 260

Women: atrocities against in Algerian civil war, 140–143; role of in Afghanistan, 183–188; treatment of by Northern Alliance, 181, 186–187; treatment of by Taliban, 144–146, 187

Women’s Alliance for Peace and Human Rights in Afghanistan, 183

World Bank, 71, 72, 102–103, 157, 266

World Health Organization (WHO), 187

World Trade Center, 2, 158

Worsely, Peter, 27

Yakhyev, Said, 201

Yemen, 226, 258

York, Herbert, 53, 54

Yugoslavia: conflict in, 75–77; disintegration of, 75–77

Zapatistas, 210

Zapotecs, 253

Zawahiri, Ayman, 216

Zimmerman, Warren, 76

#title A Practical Guide to Winning the War on Terrorism

#author Adam Garfinkle

#date 2013

#publisher Hoover Institution Press

#lang en

#pubdate 2024-08-16T23:07:13

#topics

#isbn 0817945431

#source

#cover a-g-adam-garfinkle-a-practical-guide-to-winning-th-1.jpg

#DELETED temp

 [Front Matter]

 [Title Page]

[[a-g-adam-garfinkle-a-practical-guide-to-winning-th-2.jpg]]

 [Recommended books]

HOOVER NATIONAL SECURITY FORUM SERIES The New Terror: Facing the Threat of Biological and Chemical Weapons

Edited by Sidney D. Drell, Abraham Sofaer, and George D. Wilson

The Transnational Dimension of Cyber Crime and Terrorism

Edited by Abraham D. Sofaer and Seymour E. Goodman

A Practical Guide to Winning the War on Terrorism

Edited by Adam Garfinkle

OF RELATED INTEREST Our Brave New World: Essays on the Impact of September 11

Edited by Wladyslaw Pleszczynski

The Gravest Danger: Nuclear Weapons

By Sidney D. Drell and James E. Goodby

 [Copyright]

The Hoover Institution on War, Revolution and Peace, founded at Stanford University in 1919 by Herbert Hoover, who went on to become the thirty-first president of the United States, is an interdisciplinary research center for advanced study on domestic and international affairs. The views expressed in its publications are entirely those of the authors and do not necessarily reflect the views of the staff, officers, or Board of Overseers of the Hoover Institution.

www.hoover.org

Hoover Institution Press Publication No. 530

Copyright © 2004 by the Board of Trustees of the Leland Stanford Junior University

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording, or otherwise, without written permission of the publisher.

First printing 2004

10 09 08 07 06 05 04 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

Manufactured in the United States of America

The paper used in this publication meets the minimum requirements of American National Standard for Information Sciences—Permanence of Paper for Printed Library Materials, ANSI Z39.48–1992. File:Image3.png

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

A practical guide to winning the war on terrorism / edited by Adam Garfinkle.

p. cm.— (Hoover national security forum series)

Includes bibliographical references and index.

ISBN 0-8179-4542-3 (alk. paper)

1. Terrorism—Prevention. 2. War on Terrorism, 2001– 3. Terrorism—Government policy—United States. 4. United States—Foreign relations—Middle East. 5. Islam and terrorism. I. Garfinkle, Adam M., 1951– II. Series. HV6431.P67 2004 303.6’25—dc22

2004002417

 Contents

Authors

Editor’s Introduction

Adam Garfinkle

Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld’s Snowflake of October 16, 2003

LANDSCAPES

1 Bush Is Right: Democracy Is the Answer

Amir Taheri

2 Terrorism: Sources and Cures

Graham E. Fuller

3 Liberalism and the War on Terrorism

Lisa Anderson

4 International Humanitarian Legal Standards and the Principle of Global Ethics in the War on Terrorism

El Hassan bin Talal

5 Ending Support for Terrorism in the Muslim World

Michele Durocher Dunne

COUNTRY PORTRAITS

6 Islam, Modernity, and Public Diplomacy in the Arab World: A Moroccan Snapshot

Dale F. Eickelman

7 The Challenge of Euro-Islam

Olivier Roy

8 Saudi Arabia and the War on Terrorism

F. Gregory Gause III

9 With Allies Like This: Pakistan and the War on Terrorism

Stephen Philip Cohen

10 American Muslims as Allies in the War on Terrorism

M. A. Muqtedar Khan

PUBLIC ARTS

11 Déjà Vu: The ABCs of Public Diplomacy in the Middle East

Martin Kramer

12 Fixing Public Diplomacy for Arab and Muslim Audiences

William A. Rugh

13 A Civilized Way to Fight Terror

Daoud Kuttab

14 Relating to the Muslim World: Less Is More?

Ellen Laipson

15 A Practical Guide to Tapping America’s Underappreciated, Underutilized Anti-Islamist Allies across the Muslim World

Robert Satloff

LAST EXHIBIT

16 Anti-Americanism, U.S. Foreign Policy, and the War on Terrorism

Adam Garfinkle

Index

 Authors

Lisa Anderson is dean of the School of International and Public Affairs at Columbia University. She has been on Columbia’s faculty since 1986; prior to her appointment as dean, she served as chair of the Political Science Department and director of Columbia’s Middle East Institute. She is author of The State and Social Transformation in Tunisia and Libya, 1830–1980 (1986), coeditor of The Origins of Arab Nationalism (1991), editor of Transitions to Democracy (1999), and author of Pursuing Truth, Exercising Power: Social Science and Public Policy in the Twenty-first Century (2003).

In addition to her responsibilities at Columbia, Dean Anderson served as president of the Middle East Studies Association in 2003. She is also on the board of directors of Human Rights Watch, where she serves as cochair of the Middle East Advisory Committee. She is also chair of the Board of the Social Science Research Council.

Stephen Philip Cohen is a senior fellow in Foreign Policy Studies at the Brookings Institution. He was educated at the Universities of Chicago and Wisconsin and taught for many years at the University of Illinois. He has also served on the policy planning staff of the Department of State.

Dr. Cohen was the cofounder and chair of the workshop on Security, Technology and Arms Control for younger South Asian and Chinese strategists. He is the author or coauthor of ten books on Indian and Pakistani security policies and on American relations with the region. His most recent book is The Idea of Pakistan and the Future of a Troubled State (2004).

Michele Durocher Dunne is visiting assistant professor of Arabic language, linguistics, and literature at Georgetown University. She served in the Department of State from 1986–2003, including assignments as director of Near East Regional and North African Affairs at the National Security Council, on the secretary of state’s policy planning staff, at the U.S. Embassy in Cairo, and at the U.S. Consulate General in Jerusalem.

Dr. Dunne holds a Ph.D. from Georgetown University in Arabic language and linguistics. She is the author of Democracy in Contemporary Egyptian Political Discourse (2003), which employs methods from linguistics and anthropology in a new approach to understanding political discourse in the Arab world.

Dale F. Eickelman, Ralph and Richard Lazarus Professor of Anthropology and Human Relations at Dartmouth College, has conducted extensive field research in North Africa and the Arabian Peninsula since the late 1960s. His recent books include The Middle East and Central Asia:

An Anthropological Approach, 4th ed. (2002), and Muslim Politics (1996; new edition 2004), the latter of which was coauthored with James Piscatori.

In 2003, Indiana University Press published the second edition of New Media in the Muslim World: The Emerging Public Sphere, coedited with Jon W. Anderson, and in 2004, Brill will publish Public Islam and the Common Good, coedited with Armando Salvatore. Eickelman is also relationship coordinator for the American University of Kuwait–Dartmouth College project, which is the first English-language liberal arts university in Kuwait.

Graham E. Fuller, a former vice chair of the National Intelligence Council at the Central Intelligence Agency, has lived many years in different parts of the Muslim world. He also was a senior political scientist at RAND Corporation for twelve years. He is currently an independent writer and analyst and has written numerous books and articles about the Muslim world. His latest book is The Future of Political Islam (2003), which deals with the broader phenomenon of Islamist politics in a global context of developing world politics, including its terrorist aspects.

Adam Garfinkle is former editor of The National Interest and chief writer of the reports of the U.S. Commission on National Security/21st Century (the Hart-Rudman Commission). He has taught Middle East politics and U.S. foreign policy at the University of Pennsylvania, Haverford College, and the School of Advanced International Studies of the Johns Hopkins University. He was a research fellow at the Hoover Institution during 2003. The author of seven books and numerous essays, he is presently speechwriter to the secretary of state and a member of the Department of State’s Policy Planning staff. His work on and in this book reflects only his own views and does not represent the views of the U.S. government or the Department of State.

F. Gregory Gause III is an associate professor of political science at the University of Vermont and director of the university’s Middle East studies program. He was previously on the faculty of Columbia University (1987–1995) and was fellow for Arab and Islamic studies at the Council on Foreign Relations (1993–1994).

He is the author of two books, Oil Monarchies: Domestic and Security Challenges in the Arab Gulf States (1994) and Saudi-Yemeni Relations: Domestic Structures and Foreign Influence (1990). His recent articles on Saudi Arabian politics have appeared in Foreign Affairs, World Policy Journal, Middle East Policy and a number of edited volumes. He is currently working on a book project on the international politics of the Persian Gulf region since 1971.

His Royal Highness Prince El Hassan bin Talal has initiated, founded, and is actively involved in a large number of Jordanian and international institutes and committees. He is a founding member of the Parliament of Cultures, established in Istanbul in July 2003 to promote understanding among cultures of the world. His Royal Highness is currently working with several American nongovernmental organizations on a program called Partners in Humanity, the aim of which is to improve understanding and build positive relationships between the Muslim world and the United States.

Prince El Hassan is the author of eight books: A Study on Jerusalem (1979) (English); Palestinian Self-Determination (1981) (English, Arabic); Search for Peace (1984) (English, Arabic); Christianity in the Arab World (1994) (English, Arabic, French, Greek, Spanish, Russian, German); Essere Musulmano (coauthor, 2001) (Italian, French, Spanish, English); Continuity, Innovation, and Change: Selected Essays (2001) (English); In Memory of Faisal I: The Iraqi Question (2003) (Arabic); and Q & A: Contemporary Issues (2003) (Arabic).

M. A. Muqtedar Khan is a visiting fellow at Brookings Institution and director of International Studies at Adrian College. He is also a fellow of the Institute for Social Policy and Understanding and the present president of the Association of Muslim Social Scientists. He is the author of American Muslims: Bridging Faith and Freedom (2002) and Jihad for Jerusalem: Identity and Strategy in International Politics (2004).

Martin Kramer is editor of the Philadelphia-based Middle East Quarterly. He is a senior associate (and past director) of the Moshe Dayan Center for Middle Eastern and African Studies at Tel Aviv University. He is also the Wexler-Fromer Fellow at The Washington Institute for Near East Policy. An authority on contemporary Islam and Arab politics, Dr. Kramer earned his undergraduate and doctoral degrees in Near Eastern Studies from Princeton University and another graduate degree from Columbia University. He has been a visiting professor at Brandeis University, the University of Chicago, Cornell University, and Georgetown University. On two occasions, Dr. Kramer has been a fellow of the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars in Washington.

His authored and edited books include Islam Assembled; Shi’ism, Resistance, and Revolution; Middle Eastern Lives; Arab Awakening and Islamic Revival; The Islamism Debate; The Jewish Discovery of Islam; and Ivory Towers on Sand: The Failure of Middle Eastern Studies in America.

Daoud Kuttab is an award-winning Palestinian journalist and freedom-of-expression media activist. He is the director of the Institute of Modern Media at Al Quds University in Ramallah. He established Al Quds Educational Television, an independent voice for Palestinians. His work at Al Quds landed him in a Palestinian prison for broadcasting live a session of the Palestinian Legislative Council dealing with corruption.

He has won several media awards, among them awards from the New York–based Committee to Protect Journalists, the PEN Club, the International Press Institute, and the Leipzig Media Institute Award. He pioneered a number of progressive media projects, including AMIN.org, a Web site dedicated to posting uncensored Arab news and opinions, as well as AmmanNet.net, the Arab world’s first independent Internet-based radio station. He was also the first Palestinian to conduct an exclusive interview with Yitzhak Rabin for a Palestinian newspaper. His essays have appeared in the New York Times, Washington Post, Guardian, Jerusalem Post, Ha’aretz, Jordan Times, Daily Star, and Gulf News.

Ellen Laipson became president and chief executive officer of the Henry L. Stimson Center in April 2002 after a twenty-five-year career in the U.S. government. Her career has focused mainly on the Middle East and South Asia. Her last government position was vice chair of the National Intelligence Council (1997–2002), where she comanaged the interdisciplinary study Global Trends 2015.

Previously, she served at the U.S. Mission to the United Nations, as director for Near East and South Asian affairs at the National Security Council, and as a specialist in Middle East and North African affairs at the Congressional Research Service (1979–1990). She reads and speaks Arabic, French, and Hebrew. She currently serves on the boards of the Asia Foundation and the Education for Employment Foundation.

Olivier Roy Born August 30, 1949, in La Rochelle, France, Olivier Roy studied philosophy and oriental languages (Persian) and obtained an agrégation de Philosophie and a Ph.D. in political science. He is currently a senior researcher at CNRS (French National Center for Scientific Research). Dr. Roy has also been a consultant for the United Nations Office of the Coordinator for Afghanistan in 1988. He was special envoy for the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) in Tajikistan (August–December 1993) and then served as the head of OSCE’s mission for Tajikistan (February–November 1994).

Dr. Roy has been a visiting fellow at the Institute for Transregional Studies, Woodrow Wilson School, Princeton University (Spring 2002). His main publications include The Failure of Political Islam (1994, as a translation of L’Echec de l’Islam politique, 1992); Généalogie de l’islamisme (1995); The New Central Asia, The Creation of Nations (2000), L’islam mondialisé (2002); and “EuroIslam: The Jihad Within?” The National Interest (Spring 2003).

William A. Rugh was a foreign service officer for thirty years, serving abroad in Beirut, Cairo, Jeddah, Riyadh, Damascus, San‘a, and Abu Dhabi—the latter two as U.S. ambassador. He had several U.S. Intelligence Agency assignments abroad and in Washington, including assistant director for the Near East during Operation Desert Storm. He holds a Ph.D. from Columbia in international relations and has written extensively on Middle Eastern subjects.

Robert Satloff has served since May 2002 as the Morocco-based director of policy and strategic planning at The Washington Institute for Near East Policy, a public educational foundation established to promote informed debate and scholarly research on Middle East politics and U.S. policy. For the previous ten years, he served as the Institute’s executive director.

Dr. Satloff has written widely on U.S. Middle East policy, Arab-Israeli politics, inter-Arab and Islamist politics, and the challenges of U.S. public diplomacy in the Muslim world. He is the author or editor of seven books and monographs, including War on Terror: The Middle East Dimension (2002), U.S. Policy toward Islamism (2000), From Abdullah to Hussein: Jordan in Transition (Oxford University Press, 1994), and The Politics of Change in the Middle East (1993). A frequent media commentator, his analysis has appeared in such publications as the New York Times, Washington Post, Wall Street Journal, Weekly Standard, and New Republic. He has also appeared often on television and radio, including the CBS Evening News, NBC Nightly News, CNN, Fox News, and National Public Radio. Dr. Satloff received his doctorate in Oriental studies (modern Middle Eastern history) from St. Antony’s College, Oxford University.

Amir Taheri is the author of ten books on the Middle East and the Islamic world. He was executive editor of Kayhan, Iran’s largest daily newspaper, from 1972–1979 and, for the past twenty-five years, has written for many Western and Middle Eastern publications on issues concerning the Muslim world. His syndicated columns appear in dozens of newspapers around the globe, including in many Muslim countries. His articles have appeared most recently in the New York Times, Newsweek, Wall Street Journal, New York Post, Times of London, and Canada’s National Post, among many others.

 Editor’s Introduction

As virtually everyone is now prepared to admit, the problem of dealing with the threat of terrorism in an age of extant and potential weapons of mass destruction (WMD) proliferation is daunting. As conceived by the U.S. government, this problem, in practical policy terms, has two main parts: the military (or “kinetic,” as it is called in the Pentagon) parts, and all the other parts.

The kinetic part is easily defined: using the military to kill terrorists “with a global reach,” disrupt their infrastructure, and dissuade those who fund terrorists and their state sponsors upon threat (and occasionally actual visitation) of physical injury.

The nonkinetic parts are often euphemized as the “drain the swamp” or, better, the “hearts and minds” problem. These nonmilitary aspects focus on terrorism’s motivation and recruitment patterns, the sociology of terrorist groups that leads them to mobilize, compete, and strike; and the underlying social conditions said to feed that motivation and those recruitment patterns.

The kinetic and nonkinetic aspects of the war on terrorism are clearly related. If a potential terrorist realizes that he will very likely fail in his political aims and stand a good chance of dying for his efforts, this, it may be presumed, will reduce his incentive to engage in terrorism.

However, the military side of the war against terrorism is only a necessary, not a sufficient, aspect of the solution. Weapons of mass destruction are activated by ideas of mass destruction, and these ideas arise from a complex of historical and social factors. Ideas of mass destruction, however, are not inevitable, and U.S. government policy can be formed to minimize their production and activation.

Such policy concerning the nonkinetic aspects of the war on terrorism is not a sidebar to the war on terrorism but a crucial part of it. If such actions are not taken, the military aspects of the war on terrorism could end up increasing the motivation for terrorism and recruitment into terrorist organizations. Clearly, while some potential terrorists will think better of bucking American power, others may be encouraged by some combination of personality traits, religious beliefs, and social context to seek out martyrdom in the face of a superior but alien power. This is why overthrowing the Taliban regime and eliminating a regime in Iraq with a long history of support for terrorism (if not specifically for al Qaeda) must be construed as merely a start in the war on terrorism—and not an entirely clear-cut start, at that. To recall Churchill's famous remark, these two campaigns may be "the end of the beginning," but they are unlikely to be seen in historical perspective as anything more than that.

Now, what about that social context? No honest observer can doubt that a range of social and political pathologies afflicts the Muslim and particularly the Arab world. This affliction is attested to most vividly by Muslims and Arabs themselves. Although the motivation for terrorism is obviously related to these pathologies, it is not identical to them. After all, these social pathologies existed before terrorism became a serious national security concern of the United States and its allies; so it follows that terrorism is not an inevitable by-product of such problems. Moreover, it will take generations to deal with the social and political problems of the greater Middle East, but dealing with mass-casualty terrorism cannot wait generations. For practical purposes, then, the problem of terrorism is separable, and must be separated, from the general issue of the social and political modernization of the Muslim and Arab worlds.

Getting at the nonkinetic aspects of the war on terrorism can be conceived as consisting of immediate, midterm, and long-term parts. The essence at all stages, however, appears to be fourfold:

Stigmatize the idea of murdering civilians for any political cause whatsoever, just as slavery, piracy, and human ritual sacrifice were so stigmatized in previous generations.

1. Identify and stop the flow of money and other resources at all levels from those who approve of terrorism to those who carry it out, redirecting that money and those resources to positive ends, as possible.

1. Refute, tirelessly and skillfully, the almost endless distortions of U.S. policies and motivations that are promulgated by Islamist propagandists (and others) and that inexorably make Americans and their allies targets of hatred and violence.

1. Work patiently at social, economic, and political reform (generally in that order) in Muslim-majority countries and among Muslim communities outside the Middle East and South Asia where terrorist cadres are known to have arisen.

The way U.S. and allied governments go about these basic tasks may involve many methods. One method has to do with persuasion and pressure at the private diplomatic level, especially as regards financial flows and other kinds of support for terrorism. This persuasion and pressure are where the kinetic and nonkinetic aspects of the war on terrorism have their most obvious relation. From the very start, the use of force, first in Afghanistan and then in Iraq, was designed to have both literal and demonstration effects. The demonstration effects were to flow from the literal effects, addressed to regimes such as those in Syria, Sudan, Libya, and Iran, for whom support for terrorism has been at some level not ideological but tactical and opportunistic. This method was one element of the Bush Doctrine, as it came to be called.[1]

At its inception, this intended demonstration effect was much maligned by critics. But look at what has happened. Sudan quickly turned state’s evidence in private to the United States, and the significant progress made toward ending Sudan’s civil war on reasonable terms owes much to the reduction of Khartoum’s demands. In the background to the decisions made by the Sudanese government, there hovered implicitly an American “or else.”

The Libyan decision in early March 2003 to do a dramatic about-face on support for terrorism and its WMD efforts looks to be another case in point of the diplomatic power of the American “or else.” In this case, British and U.S. diplomacy played a major role in what deputy secretary of state Richard Armitage called “muscular multilateralism.”

The Iranian decision to come at least partly clean on its own secret nuclear weapons program, as well as on its deliberate long-standing deception of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), seems to follow in train. Syria remains problematic in many ways, but grabbing al Qaeda operatives with $23 million and letting this be known, as happened in December 2003, can be interpreted as an insurance policy against being next on the list of an American axis of evil. Many in Washington hope that the regime in Pyongyang will get the message, too.

Power is important, and using it to win is very important. But much of what is required to win the war against terrorist recruiting and support cannot usefully be thought of as a spinoff of military efforts. Much of what is required is informational in nature. Some has to do with radio, television, and print media aimed at Muslim and Arab audiences. Some has to do with embassy outreach programs and related activities. Partnerships between government and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), or outright private sector efforts, may make sense for many activities in which heavy and direct government participation may be unwise.

In all these methods, however, energy should be directed toward engaging and supporting religious, educational, intellectual, and cultural elites to stigmatize terrorism in ways that resonate with indigenous values and metaphors. The “brand America” method, which relies on Madison Avenue trope, will not work, because it too much reminds listeners of the materialist culture they tend to identify as the problem.

The purpose of this book is to aid in the development not only of general ideas but also of practical steps to undermine the fetid intellectual basis that sustains the grotesque notion that terrorism is a legitimate method of political struggle. We can disrupt and minimize recruitment patterns to terrorism organizations, and, less certainly and with more difficulty, we can affect the underlying conditions that lead some people to wander in such a direction.

To do so will take a major intellectual effort and then an equally serious effort to operationalize our knowledge. If it is to succeed, this effort cannot afford two types of vulgarity: that of anti-Muslim stereotyping and that of left-wing political correctness, where unpleasant truths may not be uttered in polite company. Such unfettered efforts are currently taking place in government, to be sure. Unfortunately, these efforts have not been making as much headway as even their champions would like, nor as much as they admit. They need and want help. The secretary of defense said so himself in his famous leaked “snowflake” of October 2003. This book is designed to be an answer, at least in part, to that snowflake, the full text of which is provided at the end of this introduction.

I want to acknowledge the support of the Hoover Institution and the encouragement of its director, John Raisian, in the development and publication of this book as part of its National Security Forum series. A debt of gratitude is also due Tod Lindberg, editor of Policy Review and a research fellow at the Hoover Institution, for his discerning editorial counsel. And, of course, I want to thank all the contributing authors who, despite already busy schedules, took the time to prepare essays for this volume.

Rather than put together a standard Hoover Institution collection of ten or twelve essays, each about 5,000 words in length, I have roughly doubled the number of essays and roughly halved their average length. I did this to involve a greater number of perspectives, for many perspectives are needed to do the subject justice. Moreover, as those who have worked in senior government positions know, principal decision makers do not typically read lengthy analytical discourses; they read memos. Therefore, I wanted the essays in this book to be closer to the literary form to which senior decision makers are accustomed, hoping to make it more likely that at least some decision makers will read them.

I also selected authors all of whom can work in at least one Middle Eastern language and whose intimacy with the social settings and political cultures involved is beyond question. I did this, I confess, because of a lingering irritation. There has been a great and natural surge of interest in all things Middle Eastern and Islamic since September 11, 2001, and a horde of clever but often untutored journalists has risen to satisfy that interest. The results have not been particularly edifying. One simply cannot learn the nuances of the Middle East and of Islamic culture in a few days, weeks, or even months under the pressure of a magazine deadline. Those who think they can, or think they have actually done so, only illustrate how truly clueless they are: What they do know is so modest that they cannot fathom what they do not know. Thus, my decision as to author qualification is not no to journalists (there are some represented here), but rather no to amateurs.

I asked some authors to focus on the diplomatic aspects, some on media and information management, and some on educational and religious aspects of the problem. I asked some to focus on particular countries or questions. I asked all to consider immediate, midterm, and longer-term aspects of the problem. Most of all, I asked all authors to write as though they were addressing senior policy makers; I asked them to write crisply, to the point, and as specifically as the venue allowed. I also asked them to write quickly, so that we would not get stuck, as is so typical, in a drawn-out process that would render many ideas and proposals obsolete before their time.

I got some of what I asked for. But not every writer I invited accepted. Not all who accepted produced an essay. Not everyone was as crisp, as specific, and as quick as I had hoped. This has left some gaps, geographical and thematic, in the result. No essay focuses on Egypt or on Afghanistan, for example, which is unfortunate. Shutting down terrorist finances is not covered in as detailed a fashion as I had hoped, because little that one can say about this effort in public is worth saying, and what is worth saying cannot be said in public. The same goes for many aspects of intelligence and law-enforcement cooperation across borders.

There is more than I expected in the volume about public diplomacy; there is also more controversy over methods than I expected. The release of the Djerejian Report on public diplomacy, sponsored by secretary of state Colin L. Powell, after this project began but before it was completed, has only raised the prominence of the subject; but alas, obviously, for reasons of timing, the authors in this book were unable to attend fully to that report.[2]

I do not agree with everything said in this book, but I have seen my role as editor as that of intellectual impresario, not as censor. To use a sartorial metaphor, I have chosen the fabrics and defined the kinds of garments to be made, but I have neither crafted nor worn them.

I have also had a difficult time deciding on an order of presentation, not least because those who looked at specific countries did not leave off commenting more generally (which is good), and those who aimed to comment more generally sometimes invoked specific examples (which is also good). Though these are good traits, it makes for tremulous organization of the collection as a whole.

This does not disturb me, however, and it should not disturb you, dear reader. This book’s imperfect cohesion reflects well, I think, where the country and the world are with regard to this problem: colloquially put, both are all over the place, which is part of the problem. (In any event, beyond this introduction, I decided to put my own two cents into this collection to make up for its frailties, to the extent I can.)

For all of the book’s imperfections, the result is still a valuable one. The range and quality of the analyses, the sophistication of the disagreements, and the nuggets of specific proposals in this volume justify the effort exerted to produce it. Moreover, the fact that the collection works as a kind of political Rorschach test has a value of its own. Put this cluster of questions, as I did, before a group of experienced and intelligent men and women from America, Europe, and the Middle East, ask them to be practically minded and swift in their response, and this, exactly, is what you get. Years from now, perhaps, those wiser from experience than we are today will learn something just from that alone. One may hope so, anyway.

Adam Garfinkle Washington, D.C. December 25, 2003

[1] See the remarks of Richard Perle, “After September 11: A Conversation,” The National Interest, no. 65-S (Thanksgiving 2001): 84.

[2] The formal title of this report is Changing Minds, Winning Peace: A New Strategic Direction for U.S. Public Diplomacy in the Arab & Muslim World (Washington, D.C.: Advisory Group on Public Diplomacy in the Muslim World, October 1, 2003).

 Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld’s Snowflake of October 16, 2003

TO: Gen. Dick Myers; Paul Wolfowitz; Gen. Pete Pace; Doug Feith

FROM: Donald Rumsfeld

SUBJECT: Global War on Terrorism

The questions I posed to combatant commanders this week were: Are we winning or losing the Global War on Terror? Is DoD changing fast enough to deal with the new 21st century security environment? Can a big institution change fast enough? Is the USG changing fast enough?

DoD has been organized, trained and equipped to fight big armies, navies and air forces. It is not possible to change DoD fast enough to successfully fight the global war on terror; an alternative might be to try to fashion a new institution, either within DoD or elsewhere—one that seamlessly focuses the capabilities of several departments and agencies on this key problem.

With respect to global terrorism, the record since Septermber 11th seems to be:

- We are having mixed results with Al Qaida, although we have put considerable pressure on them—nonetheless, a great many remain at large.

- USG has made reasonable progress in capturing or killing the top 55 Iraqis.

- USG has made somewhat slower progress tracking down the Taliban—Omar, Hekmatyar, etc.

- With respect to the Ansar Al-Islam, we are just getting started.

Have we fashioned the right mix of rewards, amnesty, protection and confidence in the US?

Does DoD need to think through new ways to organize, train, equip and focus to deal with the global war on terror?

Are the changes we have and are making too modest and incremental? My impression is that we have not yet made truly bold moves, although we have made many sensible, logical moves in the right direction, but are they enough?

Today, we lack metrics to know if we are winning or losing the global war on terror. Are we capturing, killing or deterring and dissuading more terrorists every day than the madrassas and the radical clerics are recruiting, training and deploying against us?

Does the US need to fashion a broad, integrated plan to stop the next generation of terrorists? The US is putting relatively little effort into a long-range plan, but we are putting a great deal of effort into trying to stop terrorists. The cost-benefit ratio is against us! Our cost is billions against the terrorists' costs of millions.

- Do we need a new organization?

- How do we stop those who are financing the radical madrassa schools?

- Is our current situation such that "the harder we work, the behinder we get"?

It is pretty clear that the coalition can win in Afghanistan and Iraq in one way or another, but it will be a long, hard slog.

Does CIA need a new finding?

Should we create a private foundation to entice radical madrassas to a more moderate course?

What else should we be considering?

Please be prepared to discuss this at our meeting on Saturday or Monday.

Thanks.

* Landscapes

 1. Bush Is Right: Democracy Is the Answer

Amir Taheri

On April 9, 2003, Muslims throughout the world watched with a mixture of shock and awe as a statue of the Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein was pulled down in the center of Baghdad. Few may have regretted the fall of the statue. Islam bans images and icons as symbols of shirk, or pantheism—the gravest of sins in Muhammad’s strict monotheistic vision. There is another reason few lamented the regime: Saddam’s reign of terror had entered Islamic history as one of the blackest chapters of the postcolonial era.

So it is true that the Muslim world felt shock and awe, but not in the way the U.S. military intended. The actual feelings they felt and the reasons for those feelings need to be carefully understood.

 Shock and Awe: The Real Thing

The shock and awe that many Muslims felt that April was real enough. It was as if the clock of history had been turned back to the early days of colonialism in the nineteenth century. For the first time in more than eight decades, Western armies were marching into the capital of a major Muslim state with the express mission of overthrowing its regime.

The entry of the American-led army into Baghdad had a far more dramatic effect than the Red Army's march into Kabul, the capital of Afghanistan, on Christmas Eve 1979. Back then, appearances had been preserved: a puppet Afghan regime had invited the Soviets to intervene, ostensibly to ward off attacks from Pakistan. In addition, most Muslims see Afghanistan as a wild realm—they call it "the land of insolence"—on the margins of Islam. Iraq, however, is regarded by many as the very heart of the Muslim world, recalling the "golden era" when Baghdad was the capital of an Islamic empire stretching from China to the Mediterranean Sea.

There was another reason for shock and awe. Whereas no one had seen the Soviet entry in Kabul on live television, the U.S.-led conquest of Baghdad, after just three weeks of what looked like an easy march from Kuwait, was broadcast live and watched by hundreds of millions of viewers.

 The Muslim Debate

No one knows how long the shock-and-awe effect of Iraq's liberation may last in the Muslim world. What is certain is that the events of April 2003 could have an enduring effect on Muslims in general and Arabs in particular. What happened in Iraq could either work as a wake-up call to Muslims, especially Arabs, or serve as the leaven for a fresh bread of bitterness.

Both possibilities are present in the torrent of Arab and Muslim comment that preceded, accompanied, and followed the liberation of Iraq. There have been many calls on Arabs and Muslims in general to use the occasion for posing questions about their place in a world built and managed by "others." Some commentators have called on Muslims to adopt the cause of social, political, and economic reform and to attempt a long overdue aggiornomento.[3] Others have called for the opposite, demanding that Muslims close ranks, further distance themselves from the "alien world," and nurse their chagrin in the hope that, one day, Allah shall offer them an opportunity for revenge.[4]

A period of introspection and stocktaking may well be useful for both Muslims and the coalition of democracies led by the United States. Sooner or later, however, the two sides will have to enter into a dialogue to review their relations and work out a new modus vivendi.

What should that dialogue really be about?

In the year that preceded the American-led intervention in Iraq, the George W. Bush administration advanced a number of at times contradictory reasons and claims to justify the war. The main reason put forward in the diplomatic arena was that Hussein's regime had violated seventeen UN resolutions and was building an arsenal of forbidden weapons. Those reasons were, and remain, justified. But the principal reason for the U.S.-led intervention must be sought in the Bush administration's national security doctrine.

Shaped in the aftermath of the September 11 attacks, the Bush Doctrine identifies global terrorism, sponsored or supported by "rogue states," as the principal threat to U.S. and global security. The analysis on which the doctrine is based asserts that only the dismantling of the rogue regimes and their replacement with democracies can once and for all remove the threat of global terrorism. That is because democracies do not sponsor terrorism, nor do democracies become bases of aggression against each other. Seen in that context, the regime change in Baghdad is only a first step on a long road that is to lead, first, to the establishment of a democratic system in Iraq and, then, to democratization throughout the Arab and Muslim worlds.

This, of course, is precisely what President Bush declared to be his goal in his November 6, 2003, speech at the National Endowment for Democracy. This goal constitutes a generational commitment to a vast program, one that is bound to go beyond President Bush's second term, provided he is reelected.

With few exceptions, the Muslim world, and the Arab countries in particular, represent an area of darkness as far as democratization is concerned. Few in the Muslim world have been touched by the historic changes that started with the fall of the Berlin Wall. Nor have many of them adapted well to the economic changes introduced under globalization since the 1990s. The Muslim world, representing some 18 percent of the planet's population, accounts for almost 70 percent of the globe's political prisoners and more than 80 percent of the world's political executions. Of the fifty-three predominantly Muslim countries, only two, Bangladesh and Turkey, hold reasonably fair elections that lead to orderly changes of government.

Most Muslim countries have also experienced economic stagnation or decline in the past twenty years, as their demography has spiraled out of control. A by now well-known UN-sponsored report on human development in the Arab world, published in 2002, told a tale of woe about countries that, though endowed with immense natural resources, live close to starvation with little prospects of sustained development.[5]

To assert further that the Muslim world provides fertile ground for terrorism is an understatement. In at least thirty Muslim countries, terrorism, practiced either by the state or its opponents, is an integral part of political life. In several others, more classical forms of violence, including political murder, are used in the context of an often zoological struggle for power. A string of transnational terrorist groups enjoy varying degrees of support and maintain different types of logistical, financial, and training bases in a number of Muslim countries.

At the same time, the Muslim world really is the theater of what could be described as a civil war of ideas between modernizers, who preach democratization, and traditionalists, who urge Muslims to wall themselves in and adopt a defensive attitude toward what they regard as a hostile international system. Although this is not the first time this debate has been started, it is a peculiar debate this time around. For the first time in decades, perhaps a few centuries even, none of the Muslim countries can claim a leadership role and offer a coherent world vision. Traditionally, three Muslim countries—Iran, Turkey, and Egypt—have offered the Muslim world intellectual leadership in political and cultural fields. Today, however, none is in a position to do so.

Iran finds itself in an historic impasse under a discredited regime. Turkey has set aside its Muslim credentials in favor of European ambitions shared even by the neo-Islamist coalition now in power. Egypt, under a septuagenarian dictator, has lost even its traditional audience in the Arab world. One other country that might have provided a measure of leadership is Saudi Arabia, but this kingdom is politically paralyzed under a geriatric leadership that has proved unable to shape a vision for its own country, let alone the Muslim world as a whole.

 The Right American Role

Since the Muslims cannot drive their own debate to a useful conclusion, the United States must push them to do it—and it should, not least because the Bush administration’s central thesis is correct: democratization is essential, not only for American security but also for social and economic development in the Muslim world. The question is how to bring about that democratization.

The Iraqi experience may or may not work, though I think it will. Provided the United States is prepared to stay the course, as it did in postwar Germany and Japan, President Bush’s dream of transforming Iraq into a model of democracy for the Muslim world has a decent chance of success. But obviously, the United States cannot invade all Muslim states and occupy them long enough to establish democratic institutions, and the demonstration effect of a successful Iraqi democracy will not, by itself, be enough to reshape the region.

At the same time, the Muslim world simply cannot work its way out of the historic impasse in which it finds itself without outside help, at least not in the foreseeable future. In a sense, the Muslim world today resembles the Communist bloc in the late 1980s. Obvious differences notwithstanding, both exhibit a bankrupt ideology, corrupt elites, and economic decline—all combined with a growing desire at the base for opening to the West and seeking a share in the freedom and prosperity offered by the modern world. Perhaps this similarity offers a clue as to what to do.

Toward the end of the 1960s, the Western democracies decided to engage the Communist bloc in a network of relationships that went beyond the confrontational approach of the early Cold War. The new approach led to the diplomatic recognition of Communist China, the “opening to the East” exercise in Germany, and, more broadly, the policy of détente developed by the first Nixon administration.

A case could be made (and certainly was made) that these exercises merely prolonged the life of the Soviet bloc by providing it with economic aid, credit facilities, access to markets, and, perhaps more important, a presumption of moral equality with the West. Those who support that argument insist that the Soviet bloc ultimately collapsed because it could not meet the military, economic, and ethical challenge presented by a confrontational Reagan administration in the 1980s.

Many have considered the two trajectories of U.S. policy from the late 1960s to the late 1980s as contradictory. In retrospect, however, the two paths appear more as two phases of a dialectical movement. The policy of détente obliged the Soviet bloc to adhere to minimum rules of conduct that it might have otherwise rejected. Those rules promoted standards for behavior both inside and outside the bloc. The dissident movements could take shape without fear of executions and mass deportations, as had been the case in the Stalinist era. Advocates of change within the Soviet bloc knew that they were not alone and that the Western democracies regarded them as allies. The prospect of Soviet tanks again rolling into the capitals of Eastern Europe, as they had done in 1956 and 1968, receded. Reagan’s confrontational approach succeeded partly because the Soviet bloc had become so dependent on the West in trade, economic, technological, and diplomatic terms and partly because, thanks to Western penetration of various kinds, the Kremlin lost its verve, its self-confidence, and its own sense of moral singularity.

 Encore! Another Final Act

One key element of détente consisted of negotiations that led to the Helsinki Final Act of 1975. Though not a binding treaty, it was, in a sense perhaps, more important: It promulgated standards of behavior that could not be ignored. It took the political debate out of the ideological context, fixed by Marxist-Leninists, by emphasizing rules that would one day be claimed by Mikhail Gorbachev as “universal values.” The question is: Can the Muslim world be engaged in a similar dialogue, leading to accords similar to those of the Helsinki Final Act?

The question merits consideration. Muslim states need political, social, and cultural reforms. They need to review their behavior at home and abroad. But few, even if they had the incentive, enjoy the legitimacy and the political strength to propose such reforms, let alone to implement them.

Nevertheless, all Muslim states are signatories to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and to almost all the conventions drafted to implement it. It is no mystery, however, that almost all of those states violate the spirit and the letter of the declaration on a daily basis. It is important for the democratic world to insist that Muslim states honor their own signatures and respect their own commitments. Muslim states must be made to understand that there is a global public space regulated by international law that, though respectful of religious and cultural diversity, rejects transgression in the name of “alterity.”

Committing the Muslim states to something like the Helsinki Final Act would be only the first step. The democracies also need to review their overall relations with the Muslim world, not least the political aspects of the West’s high-end commercial relationships, especially with the Arabs.

For some major industrial nations, the Muslim world is nothing but a source of raw materials, notably oil, and a lucrative though distorted and lawless market. Some Western businesses, including major multinationals, have violated many rules when it comes to dealing with Muslim states. For example, Muslim states account for almost 27 percent of all arms purchases outside the NATO area. It is no mystery, too, that more than a thousand Western and Russian companies helped build Saddam Hussein’s war machine, including his nuclear center of Osirak. As is well known, or ought to be, France built Osirak after Jacques Chirac, then prime minister, signed an agreement with Saddam Hussein, then vice president of Iraq, in 1975. There are striking photographs of that day that make for most interesting viewing.

Muslim despots are very much encouraged by the lack of courage that some Western governments show in attempting to defend and promote democratic values and human rights. The European Union, for example, has agreed to change the label it uses for talks with Iran from “critical dialogue” to “comprehensive dialogue” to please the mullahs, who believe they are above criticism. Although the EU has feigned toughness in dealing with the Iranian nuclear weapons program, it refuses to call obvious Iranian violations of the Nonproliferation Treaty what they are. The EU also refuses to seriously hold up the implementation of trade arrangements over the matter. The EU’s view toward the Iranian mullahs closely resembles the fellow who keeps feeding carrot soup to a lion in the belief that the lion will eventually become a vegetarian.

Unrolling the red carpet for despots, including those open to charges of crimes against humanity, and visiting them in their capitals to pay respect are other signs of European cowardice when it comes to upholding the values that provided the backbone of the Helsinki Final Act.

This is not an entirely new idea, by the way. Committing the Muslim nations to common standards of behavior was one of the goals pursued by the late Malaysian prime minister Tunku Abdul Rahman, who subsequently became secretary-general of the Islamic Conference Organization. In 1970, Abdul Rahman circulated the text of a proposed charter that spelled out an “Islamic understanding” of human rights and that committed the Muslim states to a wide range of reforms. The proposed charter envisaged the nonrecognition of regimes created through military coups d’état and sanctions against governments found guilty of violating the basic rights of citizens. The proposal went nowhere because most Muslim states saw the risks as too high and the rewards as illusory.

Turgut Özal, then Turkey’s prime minister, made a similar proposal in 1986. But he, too, achieved little success because his call for reform was not backed by economic and military power.

Since then, various Muslim states have committed themselves to similar standards of behavior by joining a variety of regional groupings that include Western and other non-Muslim powers. These groupings include the Barcelona process and the Asia-Pacific summit. In addition, the EU has concluded bilateral accords with a number of Muslim states. It is important now to link all those accords and reinforce them in the form of a single memorandum of understanding between the Muslim world and the major democratic powers. Such a memorandum would provide the terms of reference that the democratic world could use to provide moral and material support for the growing reform movements in the Muslim world. Military action against some despotic regimes may still be necessary, but the idea that the Muslim world could be democratized through military invasion and occupation, on the Iraqi model, is unrealistic, to say the least.

In most Muslim countries today, there are identifiable democratic forces that the major democracies must support. Establishing contacts with thousands of nongovernmental organizations in the context of a people-to-people relationship will enable the democracies to help strengthen civil society in many Muslim countries. The time to pursue these goals is now.

This scenario is possible. Everyone who cares about this subject, which, after all, will define much about our future, must realize that the debate between the Muslim world and the democracies is not a theological one. Whatever version of Islam may be in the ascendancy in the Muslim world at present is irrelevant to the purpose at hand. People are, and ought to be, free to believe whatever they like. What concerns the rest of the world is the effect of any set of beliefs on the international public space. And there lies the problem. The Muslim world is sinking in economic failure, political despotism, cultural turpitude, and social crisis—all of which produce violence and terrorism. To emerge from this quagmire, Muslim states need a helping hand. It is in the best interests of the democracies to offer that helping hand. No time like the present.

[3] Among those who have sounded the wake-up call are such columnists as Turki al-Hamad, Abdul-Rahman al-Rashed, and Bakr Oweida among the Arabs and Ahmad Ahrar, Abdul-Karim Sorush, and Emadeddin Baqi in Iran.

[4] The theme of a defensive wall has been hammered in by sympathizers of the now largely defunct al Qaeda terrorist organization, but it has received some support from more traditionalist Islamic thinkers, such as the Moroccan Muhammad Abed al-Jaberi.

[5] The UN Development Programme report on Human Development in the Arab Countries, 2002.

 2. Terrorism: Sources and Cures

Graham E. Fuller

Terrorism is a method of political struggle or warfare available to any player, including individuals, groups, and states. Its history is as old as human conflict. Yet terrorism has taken on greater salience with the increasing ability of small groups to employ ever more dangerous and lethal forms of attack against the public or the state.

Furthermore, terrorism is a great equalizer of power. It is, colloquially put, the poor man’s weapon. Not surprisingly, great powers tend to be far more distressed at the potential equalization of power afforded by terrorism than are small powers. This was clearly demonstrated when the United States was itself targeted by terrorism; only then did the U.S. government define terrorism as a serious global problem. Before terrorism was directly targeted against its own homeland, Washington did not consider it a serious problem, even though many other countries had suffered such attacks for decades.

In addition, America’s international strategy under the Bush administration has increased both the profile and the problem posed by terrorism.

Dominated by a neoconservative philosophy and a strategic global vision of unparalleled ambition to remake the world, U.S. policy has, ironically, increasingly become a lightning rod for global terrorism, propagating the “global” nature of the problem. This increase has become even more evident as American soldiers on patrol in Iraq can now be attacked by foreign guerrillas on a more level playing field than ever before.

In short, terrorism is, and has always been, a problem; but it is the victimization of the United States itself, which sits atop the international power hierarchy, that has made terrorism a more prominent and pressing issue. The reaction of the United States in launching the global war on terrorism has raised the profile of the terrorism issue to unprecedented heights, so that it now dominates most aspects of the Bush administration’s foreign policy.

 Problems of Definition

Analyses of terrorism—and ascriptions as to its causes and remedies—are hampered by an absence of any agreed-upon definitions. As a consequence, casual and arbitrary invocations of the term terrorism tend to serve the interests of the speaker. Those who possess the power to define the problem are well positioned to define the solution, even when there is considerable disagreement on the matter.

Nonetheless, at a minimum, most observers would agree that terrorism involves attacks against “innocent” civilians and noncombatants in the fulfillment of political goals. Many insist that terrorism, by definition, can be conducted only by nonstate actors, but a serious treatment of the phenomenon cannot exclude the use of “terror” by the state itself against its own or other citizens. In this case, the broader definition is better: the failure to include terror perpetrated by the state exculpates the state from what may be one primary cause of terrorism.

Westerners socialized into certain articles of faith about the nature of the Western state have trouble accepting the idea that the state itself could be capable of terrorism. Specifically, we learn from Weberian traditions that the state, by definition, has a “monopoly over the legal use of violence.” Such a definition enjoys understandable resonance in the West precisely because most Western states represent the will of the public as expressed in free elections. Electorates have the ability to remove unwanted or dangerous leaders. The democratic state is expected to act in a fair and impartial way and hence should be the sole instrument entrusted with the use of violence against its own citizens.

In most of the rest of the world, however, regimes are not elected, lack basic democratic legitimacy, cannot be removed by the public at large, and routinely employ forms of intimidation and terrorist brutality to maintain a monopoly of political power. The terrors of the Stalinist, fascist, and Maoist state are obvious historical examples. Beleaguered populations often turn to violence or terrorism as a response to the illegitimate and repressive state.

Thus, a key psychological notion lies behind much of the perception and use of terror: terrorism is often seen in the developing world to be more “justified,” or at least less morally reprehensible, when the weak use it against the strong as their main, or only, weapon of resistance. Ironically, contemporary values of human rights and democracy, and concepts of national self-determination and social justice, may have stimulated the use of terror among oppressed or frustrated groups in a misguided search for “justice” on the international and national level. Many oppressed peoples used to take their condition for granted; they no longer do.

In addition, for both descriptive and policy purposes, analysts of terrorism distinguish among types of terrorism. One important basic distinction concerns the dimensions and specificity of the group’s goals. Groups with millenarian, apocalyptic goals with global ambitions (al Qaeda, Aum Shinrikyo, Baader-Meinhof, and such) differ from those with regional, local, and finite goals (usually nationalist goals, such as those of Chechens, Palestinians, Tamil Tigers, Basques, and so on). The limited and concrete goals and grievances of some groups can be negotiated—even resolved—in ways that millenarian goals cannot.

Of course, discussion of the causes of terrorism can never justify reversion to terrorism. However, discussion can suggest possible lines of approach to try to lessen terrorism. Modern societies, after all, do legally treat quite differently the various ways in which human lives are taken, distinguishing among first- and second-degree murder, manslaughter, criminal negligence, and capital punishment.

Nor does the existence of genuine grievances automatically lead to terrorism: Witness the deplorable conditions extant in much of Africa, where indigenous terrorism directed against the state is rare. The state in Africa is weak, however, making guerrilla war from the bush more effective than terrorism against a pudgy state. In Latin America, anti-U.S. terror was at one time widespread, but is currently minimal. This change has to do partly with the democratization of governance across most of the region.

Looked at side by side, the two examples of Africa and Latin America teach us something important: terrorism is ineffectual when the state is transparent, and it is unnecessary and unsustainable when the state is democratic. This brings us to the Muslim and particularly the Arab world, where states are, in the main, neither transparent nor democratic.

 Definitions Applied

There is no doubt that today the Muslim world is the primary source and locus of terrorism. The reasons for this are complex and can be long debated, but the very existence of a vast “Muslim world” is itself one factor. In today’s wired world, the international community of Muslims—the umma—is exquisitely attuned to the grievances of Muslims everywhere. Muslims can directly identify with the problems of other Muslims and are inclined to see themselves as a civilization under siege on a global level.

The echo chamber effect of the wired umma—reinforcing a sense of collective grievance—is a distinctive feature not found in other violent cultures around the world. Africans, for example, rarely speak with a common African voice about “African grievances,” even in very violent cultures.

Many more reasons can be adduced to help explain—but not explain away—the salience of terrorism in the contemporary Muslim world: a millennium or more of periodic geopolitical clashes between various European forces and their most immediate cultural neighbor (the Muslim world); the historical uniqueness of the founding of the state of Israel, populated by people coming mostly from Europe on territory that was seen as inherently Muslim; and the high economic stakes swirling around vital energy resources that have facilitated a history of Western intervention in the Muslim world. And finally, we have the pervasiveness of authoritarian rule, sometimes facilitated, sometimes merely tolerated, by U.S. policies. A Muslim sense of helplessness, cynicism, frustration, and impotence in being unable to change any feature of domestic repression, or to affect the international forces that bolster that domestic order, clearly contributes to radical and violent responses.

The phenomenon of national liberation movements among Muslim minorities seeking freedom from harsh non-Muslim rule is especially important at the local level: Bosnians, Palestinians, Kosovars, Chechens, Kashmiris, Uighurs, Moros, and others all have turned to local violence in struggles that eventually become internationalized into yet another “Muslim cause.” (Note that intra-Muslim separatist movements, such as those of the Kurds in Turkey or the Berbers in Algeria, do not fall into the category of “Muslim causes” and are also more amenable to solution.) These cases of local terrorism are quite distant from the phenomenon of al Qaeda, even if there is some incidental or opportunistic interaction. In this context, the crucial distinction between terrorism (against civilians) and guerrilla war (against authority) becomes vital. All terrorists are unprivileged combatants according to international law, wearing neither uniform nor insignia, but not all unprivileged combatants are terrorists.

The grievances, challenges, and conflicts of the Middle East are, of course, not new. They all long precede the modern phenomenon of international terrorism in the name of Islam. Yet grievances always find vehicles for expression, and today it is Islam, or Islamism, that serves as a vehicle for grievances and aspirations earlier expressed by Arab nationalism or Marxism-Leninism. Indeed, Palestinian terrorism has gone through each of these iterations in which one and then another ideology was adopted as a vehicle and later cast off. But all were aimed at achieving the same thing: an independent Palestinian state. In Uzbekistan, Islam was all but dead after seventy years of Communist repression. However, within less than a decade after independence, Islam became the vehicle of choice for combating a new, neo-Stalinist “national” Uzbek regime.

The success of the Islamist mujahideen in their jihad in Afghanistan against Soviet occupation lent special adrenaline to the Islamist cause, demonstrating that Islamism could even defeat a superpower (with a little help from U.S. arms). In other words, a disparate collection of local Muslim grievances has come to be reconfigured into one grander, more resonant, more global, and “civilizational” cause. These accumulated regional grievances—some legitimate, others ambiguous, a few fanciful—reached a head in the horrific events of September 11. Does that event represent a watershed, a high point of terrorism in international politics, or is it merely the most dramatic early expression in what may be an era of ongoing terrorist violence?

 What Is to Be Done?

The answer to the question of what is to be done matters, because it should size and define the U.S. response. The trouble is, the answer is not obvious.

After the drama of September 11, the U.S. government made a good beginning at harnessing the moral indignation of the world to work in greater concert against international terrorism. Important progress has been made in identifying individuals, their modus operandi, and their mechanisms of travel and funding. New counterterrorism measures have immensely complicated the task of the terrorist, even if these measures may never completely eliminate terrorism. (This is another reason for treating terrorism as crime and not war: war comes to an end, but crime does not.) This kind of international cooperation needs to be enhanced and deepened, routinized and institutionalized.

International terrorist movements, as proclaimed by the Bush administration, should be the primary target of such global cooperation, but what constitutes “international” is in part a political judgment. Are locally based movements with local goals that nevertheless maintain international contacts part of international terrorism?

If we do not maintain the distinction, we risk stoking the kind of terrorism most dangerous to us. One of the major failings of the Bush administration’s global war on terrorism (GWOT) is that it is too expansively defined, permitting nearly all dictators and regimes to embrace it and to declare their own local opponents all to be terrorists—and hence legitimate targets of the larger antiterrorism struggle. In effect, the GWOT has given license to many nasty regimes to depoliticize and then criminalize any local resistance and ethnic movements that have recourse to political violence—and this in countries where nearly all resistance to the state is treated violently. Across the globe, states like Russia, China, Israel, India, Egypt, Algeria, Tunisia, the Philippines, and others have exploited the GWOT for their own ends, and in so doing, they have usually increased internal repression. In most of these cases, the criminalization of legitimate political grievances has worsened the problem, heightened tensions, and intensified anti-American feeling.

In the Middle East, the problems associated with this dynamic are particularly complex and problematic. Few regimes in that area are legitimate in terms of popular support and electoral legitimacy. Until legal channels exist for the expression of grievances—often not just by minorities but also by the majority of the population against unpopular authoritarian regimes—there will be latent sympathy for acts of violence against the repressive state.

Of course, nearly all Muslims are aware that true acts of terrorism are criminal and violate the principles of Islam, but because of widespread anger against regimes, or against U.S. interventionism, these acts are rationalized as understandable and hence justifiable in some way. This very mood of frustration, anger, helplessness, and impotence creates a social environment of acquiescence toward many terrorist acts, especially those of an anti-

American or antiregime nature. There will be no serious progress against terrorism until this environment of social permissiveness toward terrorism is altered. Unfortunately, force is the least effective tool in altering this mood of permissiveness and acquiescence.

How might terrorism come to be perceived differently by society in ways that will facilitate its disappearance? The United States itself might be a hypothetical case in point.

The bombing in Oklahoma City was condemned by nearly all Americans as an outrage, without qualification. But suppose such an incident had been perpetrated in the 1960s by African Americans? There would, of course, have been widespread condemnation of the act, but there would have been plenty of “buts,” just as there were in discussing race riots in Watts, Detroit, and other places. Many Americans, while condemning the act, might have reasoned that the event was not surprising given social conditions among African Americans. Many African Americans would have felt considerable ambivalence about such an act.

This hypothetical case resembles the attitudes of most Muslims today toward terror against the United States and against repressive regional regimes: awareness that it is wrong, and against Islam, “but ….” This socially sanctioned “but” will be altered only when the broad public perceives that such an act is unjustifiable by any standard and that the cost to society from such acts is unacceptably high.

Punishment visited from abroad, as in the GWOT, may impose high costs upon Muslim societies, but it is unlikely to carry moral persuasiveness. It is more likely to touch off counterproductive consequences elsewhere. In realistic terms, a broad social reaction across the Muslim world against terrorism will regrettably be a long time in coming, at least in a number of societies where conditions are especially conducive to frustration and violence. To be successful, that type of reaction will require action by elected Muslim leaders who enjoy the legitimacy to move against such criminal acts. Leaders lacking this legitimacy will find limited popular support in crushing perpetrators of political violence. Chechen, Kashmiri, and Palestinian leaders, for example, will enjoy popular support in stamping out terrorist action from within their ranks only when the public at large feels that such acts are not only against religious principles, but also no longer justifiable because they are unnecessary in light of the ascent of legitimate state power.

The United States thus needs to combine reformist and punitive measures in meeting this complex challenge. As to the latter, the failure of the United States to respond to attack, or to those regimes that abet and encourage attack, would display a dangerous weakness. But punitive measures have little demonstration effect, so they should be used only when absolutely necessary. Even more than punitive measures, we need to engage in both conflict resolution and the promotion of genuine institutional reform abroad.

Local grievances that breed violence, though complex, are manageable, particularly when combined with the legitimizing weight of international cooperation as opposed to unpopular unilateral action. When local grievances are dealt with, local actors will be less drawn to the "internationalization" of diverse and abstruse "Muslim causes." Nonlocal millenarian terrorists will then find a much more limited pool of recruits available for their quixotic causes and a much greater local willingness to deal with such terrorists harshly.

In addition, we must work to reduce the number of non-democratic regimes that repress and terrorize their own people, thereby giving rise to the legitimation of apocalyptic terrorist responses. That is a very difficult task, and, regrettably, we are a long way from achieving it right now. President Bush has recognized this facet of the problem, notably in his November 6, 2003 speech at the National Endowment of Democracy. But whether the administration, or its successors, can match wise action to soaring rhetoric in a serious way remains to be seen.

This analytic framework will not satisfy a policy maker looking for a quick and efficacious way to win the war against terror. There is no such way. Heightened police work and international cooperation can make international terrorism more manageable, but as long as radical conditions and grievances exist, especially in the special conditions of the Muslim world, radical vehicles to express them will be found. If the “solution” to the problem of terrorism will be long in coming, let’s remember that the problem that exploded on September 11 was a long time in coming, too.

 3. Liberalism and the War on Terrorism

Lisa Anderson

The events of September 11 focused minds around the world in a dreadful way. Suddenly, terrorism, which has always been ghastly, seemed immensely powerful. The whole world seemed to stop in its tracks, stunned by the audacity, the damage, the anger that the events of the day represented. The government of the most powerful country in the world seemed bewildered—almost unhinged—by the attack. Within hours, the Bush administration concentrated its attention on military responses. The U.S. government’s construction of the attack not as a crime but an act of war met very little opposition, at least among Americans, and it justified a massive military effort, first against Afghanistan and then, less directly, in Iraq.

This accent on force was neither the only policy response available at the time nor is it the only option open to the United States today. There was, from the outset, a minority opinion—within and, more vocally, outside the government—that advocated a multilateral policing operation, framed by international law. Typically, this position was associated with an emphasis on a limited military response and a refusal to credit the authors of the attacks with the sort of influence in the Muslim world both they and the Bush administration seemed to accord them. It also rested on a conviction that the attacks—indeed, the very appearance of al Qaeda and other Islamist movements—were indications of deeper problems whose solution would require a broad-based and multi-faceted approach.

Until the aftermath of the war in Iraq, the Bush administration evinced little interest in this line of argument. Having taken office declaring that “we don’t do nation-building,” the president and his advisers approached the challenge of September 11 less as the symptom of a systemic or organic problem in the Middle East and more as what might be called—with apologies to Durkheim—a mechanical puzzle. That is, they appeared to believe that by unseating a couple of already unpopular governments (say, Afghanistan and Iraq), intimidating a few others, rounding up several thousand people who might have connections with al Qaeda, monitoring illicit transfers of money, and tightening up visa procedures, they would have the problem under control, perhaps even solved.

However, attacks on Americans increased rather than declined as these measures were taken—largely, of course, because these measures put more Americans directly in harm's way in Iraq and Afghanistan. Whether recruitment to groups espousing anti-American aims actually increased worldwide as a result of the administration's conduct of its war on terrorism is impossible to know, but it is certainly plausible. In any event, the Bush administration was soon forced to concede that something very like nation-building—or more accurately, state-building—was indeed on the agenda.

Rather than simply trumpet "I told you so," those who argued earlier for a more inclusive and multipronged response should now seize this new opportunity. Instead of castigating the misguided architects of the war on terrorism, all of us who care both about the well-being of Americans and the security and prosperity of the rest of the world—indeed, who believe the two may be linked—should consider the nature of the deeper troubles that spawned the attacks and the U.S. policies that might constructively contribute to addressing them.

 Three Considerations, Three Tasks

At least three features of such a consideration are important. First, as suggested, it is not actually nations that we should contemplate helping to build but states and civil governments. Second, taking seriously the efforts to construct such institutions abroad will demand that we be more faithful to our own institutions at home and to the values they represent. Finally, we must think seriously about how we choose our prospective partners in these projects of reconstruction and development. Let me take each of these points in turn.

The distinction between nations, on one hand, and states and civil governments, on the other, points to the difference between those elements of our social lives that reflect personal identity—language, ethnic attachments, religious affiliations, national identity—and those constructed to allow us to enjoy those attachments and identities undisturbed. The United States has no business building, or even helping to build, nations or ethnic groups or religions. But there may be something to be said for assisting in building states, or better still, commonwealths—societies of people, as John Locke put it in his justly famous 1689 Letter Concerning Toleration, “constituted only for the procuring, preserving and advancing of their civil interests.” By “civil interests,” Locke intended “life, liberty, health and indolency of body; and the possession of outward things, such as money, lands, houses, furniture, and the like.” In other words, it is the responsibility of governments to preserve and protect the rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

These are the ideas and values that underlie such policies as democracy promotion, advocacy of the rule of law, governance programs, and human rights monitoring. They are all, in their own way, efforts to instill respect for the liberal institutions that permit individuals and communities to enjoy their personal affections and private attachments in peace. Far too often in U.S. policy circles, these programs have seemed expendable in, or even detrimental to, our pursuit of other purposes, such as economic development or, more often, military security. Yet, if nothing else, the attacks of September 11 demonstrate that, in this global era, neither personal security nor collective prosperity—our treasured “life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness”—are secure in the absence of the institutions that procure, preserve, and advance such interests around the world.

By no coincidence at all, Locke’s argument should sound very familiar to Americans—it is the bedrock of our liberal tradition, codified in our very own Bill of Rights. It says nothing about language or ethnicity, nationalism, or, most important, religious preference. Indeed, Locke’s whole purpose was to “distinguish exactly the business of civil government from that of religion.”

To uphold this attachment to the civil government of a commonwealth may be difficult in the face of the taunting religious rationales that the authors of the attacks of September 11 offered. Yet the temptation to respond in kind must be energetically resisted.The Bush administration's reaction—not simply in President George W. Bush's initial reference to a "crusade" against this enemy but in the moral justification of the war on terrorism as a "righteous cause" against an enemy that is "absolutely evil"—conveyed a message that is deeply antithetical to the liberal purposes of what might be called commonwealth-building. The Bush administration's enthusiasm for "faith-based initiatives," whether in war or welfare, cannot privilege religious commitments—of any kind—over the preservation of liberal rights without distorting and confusing the purposes of the United States in the world.

Moreover, America will not be able to advocate effectively for institutions based on liberal rights abroad if we are not scrupulous in their observance at home. Obviously, terrorists have little sympathy with a world in which the process of arriving at a conclusion—electoral competition, for example, or trial by jury—is as important as the conclusion itself—a new government or policy, a determination of guilt or innocence. In the face of the insult and injury of the attacks of September 11, some Americans have been tempted to follow suit, suspending adherence to conventional procedures and declaring a virtual state of emergency in which virtuous ends excuse deplorable means.

The temptation to cheat to win is a powerful one, particularly when confronting an enemy that seems to know no restraint. But ultimately, what is true of terrorism is also true of the response: certain means are never justified, no matter what the end. We cannot compromise our commitment to the rule of law and remain either the society for which we are fighting or a society we will be able to persuade others to emulate.

Commonwealth-building thus entails two sets of demands—those we make on ourselves and those we may make on others. We cannot bend the law at home—creating novel classifications of convenience like "unlawful combatants" for terrorist suspects, according them the rights of neither criminal suspects nor prisoners of war. If we evade the recognized standards of the laws of war, for example, or suspend habeas corpus to hold individuals suspected of terrorist attachments without trial for months, we cannot expect others to observe the rule of law elsewhere.

Let us imagine for a moment that we do succeed in meeting our own high standards. If we were to regain our equilibrium and acknowledge the foundational importance of the liberal values embedded in both our own Constitution and in many of the international institutions to which our deference has long been far too cavalier, such as the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, with whom would we talk in the Middle East or the Muslim world?

It is certainly not self-evident to most Americans, including policy makers, that the region in which Osama bin Laden and his confederates cavort, stretching from Morocco to Afghanistan or even Indonesia, is home to many liberals. Certainly, the area's many admirers of bin Laden, who celebrate his ability to upset the world's last superpower, to threaten local governments around the region, and to divide the free world against itself, are not liberals. Nor, it must be said, are any of the region's governments, whatever lip service they may pay to liberalism whenever Congress is considering next year's foreign and military aid authorizations.

Yet there are increasingly vocal, articulate voices in the region itself—people who are refusing to let their societies sink into a war between the illiberal tyranny of the regimes and the nihilist anarchy of the opposition. These will be our true allies in building commonwealths.

Note that I said allies, not collaborators or instruments. Listen to the authors of the Arab Human Development Report:

<quote>

The only way to meet the challenge [in Iraq] is to enable the Iraqi people to exercise their basic rights in accordance with international law, free themselves from occupation, recover their wealth, under a system of good governance representing the Iraqi people and take charge of rebuilding their country from a human development perspective.

</quote>

This is the voice of people who share the values Locke articulated, arguing for a vision, as they put it, “guaranteeing the key freedoms of opinion, speech and assembly through good governance bounded by the law.” So, yes, there are liberals in the Middle East. They are prominent academics, journalists, NGO activists, business consultants, international organization representatives, even the occasional government minister or parliamentarian. Rather than ignore them, portraying the battle in the region as one simply between friendly, pliant governments and divisive, dangerous oppositions or, even worse, between absolute and singular incarnations of good and evil, we should listen for, and indeed amplify, these voices.

Perhaps unsurprisingly, the liberal authors of the Arab Human Development Report also exhibit an attachment to self-reliance that most Americans would certainly recognize and celebrate in themselves. Anyone who has ever tried to learn to do something only to be told it would be easier if the putative instructor just did the job alone will know part of the frustration of liberals in the Arab world. Building a commonwealth is indeed a complex project, but for that very reason, it cannot be bought off the shelf in some ideological supermarket and delivered fully assembled.

It will only be in working with allies like these liberals that we will be able to fully understand the nature of the deeper troubles that spawned the attacks. Judging from what our potential allies are already telling us, in the Arab Human Development Report and elsewhere, the lack of investment in education, in scientific research and development, in empowering women has had a corrosive effect on the economies and societies of the region, leaving too many young people, ignorant, frustrated, and understandably furious. There is much the rest of the world, including the United States, could do to rectify those deficits.

To do so, however, requires more than simply directing aid and technical assistance to family-planning projects, investing in local universities and scientific research centers, providing tax credits to technology companies willing to invest in building the information technology infrastructure in the region—although all of that would be desirable. It requires more than simply resisting the temptation to view policy toward the region wholly through the lens of terrorism and counterterrorism—although that is essential. It requires, most important, much greater respect for and fidelity to the liberal values to which we say we adhere, both at home and abroad.

 4. International Humanitarian Legal Standards and the Principle of Global Ethics in the War on Terrorism

El Hassan bin Talal

The philosopher Jean-François Revel has said, “The ideologist twists the neck of reality to suit his ideologies, whilst the seeker of truth gives up his ideologies to understand reality.” Revel’s insight is worth pondering in the midst of the war on terrorism, because terrorism is at once about ideology and reality. Likewise, the place of law and norms in international politics is also a matter of ideology and reality. It is the nexus of the two that should particularly concern us today.

Since September 11, 2001, a quantum leap has occurred in our shared vulnerability and shared consciousness. We inhabit “one world and ten thousand cultures.” However, unless the various actors, including the United Nations, nongovernmental organizations, transnational corporations, civil society, and individuals, are given the opportunity to be understood, and unless lateral thinking develops between these many and varied entities, multilateralism will inevitably fall to unilateralism, both in ideology and in reality.

Law is critical to the articulation of an effective multilateralism. According to UN under-secretary-general for legal affairs, Hans Corell, “International law is theoretically about justice and the rule of law but, more immediately, it is about accommodation, not just political accommodation but accommodation of principles and values based upon the interrelationship, or interexistence, of humankind."[6] Here, ideology meets reality in a constructive sense, so that in this context, the United Nations is a necessary institution in world politics, which is, by nature, multilateral. Bulldozing this institution endangers sacrificing universalism at the altar of rogue imperialism.

 Law and the War on Terrorism

The world's major faith traditions share the belief that the use of armed force may only be justified in self-defense, on behalf of a grave cause, as an option of last resort, and even then subject to strict limitations. Restarting the dialogue in international law is fundamentally about preserving the universality of the human values and ethical traditions that world religions have long championed and promoted.

In Islam, it is clear that the Qur'an is a pluralistic scripture, affirmative of other traditions as well as its own.[7] It is not only in the "West" that many are asking why it is that the understanding of the Divine is often distorted through the prism of violence.[8] Muslim jurists have historically reacted sharply against groups that were deemed enemies of humankind.[9] Those groups were designated as muharibs (literally "fighters") who spread terror in society and were not to be given refuge by anyone at any place. According to Khaled Abou el Fadl, Muslim jurists have historically argued that any Muslim or non-Muslim territory sheltering such a group is hostile territory that may be attacked by legitimate, mainstream Islamic forces. Most important, these doctrines were asserted as religious imperatives. Regardless of the desired goals or ideological justifications, the terrorizing of the defenseless was recognized as a moral wrong and an offense against society and God.

The debate within Islamic intellectual circles about the appropriate Islamic response to terrorism has also placed the question of suicide bombings at center stage. Authors such as Sohail Hashmi, for example, have discussed challenges to two fundamental principles of Islamic ethics: the prohibitions against suicide and the deliberate killing of noncombatants.[10] Suicide for any reason has been strongly condemned throughout Islamic history, and its practice is extremely rare in Islamic societies. In the context of war, however, the line between suicide and combat is often extremely fine and easily crossed. Nonetheless, Hashmi contends, the Prophet Muhammad sought to draw a clear line separating martyrdom in battle from suicide: “The Muslim fighter enters battle not with the intention of dying, but with the conviction that if he should die, it is for reasons beyond his control. Martyrdom is the Will of God, not humans.”

Others have been even more Islamically unequivocal, stating that the “religion” of Osama bin Laden has more in common with movements that arise out of a “cultic milieu,” or “a parallel religious tradition of disparaged and deviant interpretations and practices that challenge the authority of prevailing religions with rival claims to truth.”[11] The latter interpretation of jihad legitimizes violence and terror as a theological imperative—jihadism. Illusions thus come to dominate reality as sloganism takes hold among sections of disenfranchised and disgruntled populations.[12] Amid such an ideational reality, Ziaddun Sardar argues that “a persuasive moral God is replaced by a coercive, political one.”

At the political level, the September 11 attacks have been described, among other things, as a violation of Islamic law and ethics. Neither the people killed or injured nor the properties destroyed qualified as legitimate targets in any system of law, especially Islamic law. That position was reinforced by public statements and communiqués, such as the Final Statement of the Emergency Conference of Islamic States’ Foreign Ministers in Doha, Qatar, a month after the atrocities.

At a more fundamentally grassroots level, it is difficult to disagree with Muslim commentators, such as Sayyid Rida al-Sadiq: “One of the most painful spectacles for any principled Muslim to behold these days is that of enraged Muslim sentiment being paraded as Islamic ‘Jihad.’” Indeed, it is paradoxical that “those who are most fanatical about the forms of the religion end up violating those very forms themselves: suicide and mass murder are alike illegal in any school of Islamic law. A slippery slope leads from religious formalism to sacrilegious fanaticism.”[13]

We cannot ignore the internal challenges that give rise to fanaticism. Lack of political freedom in many Muslim countries undercuts Islamic-Western engagement in numerous ways—from the restrictions it places on media and citizen activism to the ways in which it limits the full expression of the diverse views and cultures that exists in Muslim countries. This is one reason that Muslims in the West are a key to cultivating meaningful engagement and mutual respect. It also serves as a reminder of the importance of intracommunal dialogue in Muslim countries.[14]

The relationship between Islam and Western international law has been uniquely affected by the terrorist attacks of September 11 and the subsequent consecutive “liberations” of Afghanistan and Iraq. But Islam is not a geopolitical entity. It is a universal message capable of integration with diverse and very different cultures, including American and European cultures. When we put aside the idea of a “clash of civilizations” and begin to examine religion, we find widespread agreement on principles and humanitarian aims, especially among the three great monotheistic faiths. Bridges of understanding need to be established between Muslim countries and the West, with emphasis on education, media, and young people. There is an urgent need to communicate about America to the Muslim world and for Americans to gain increased understanding of Muslim cultures. This must not to be done in the form of propaganda disguised as educational outreach. It should instead be done positively, honestly, and seriously, at a levelfully commensurate with the challenges of the post–September 11 world—a world that has brought to the fore an array of complex issues relating to citizenship, foreign policy, and civil and political rights.[15]

In the aftermath of September 11, the overwhelming majority of Muslim individuals and organizations condemned the attacks unequivocally. Yet, in the minds of many Muslims in the West, a clear distinction was felt between the unacceptability of the act itself and the very genuine grievances it purported to represent. The media, however, and some leaders (notably Silvio Berlusconi of Italy and Margaret Thatcher of the United Kingdom) tended, in some cases, to blur the distinction. For the Muslim community, the immediate fallout from the attacks was dual: On the one hand was the community’s explicit condemnation of the attacks. On the other was the fact that this community still faced a kind of public inquisition over its loyalty to the state, which later fed into the rekindling of debates relating to civil liberties. In polarized settings, social solidarity, the cornerstone of citizenship, may be embedded in racial—not civic—networks, affecting the way the public domain is governed.[16] This, one would argue, applies at both the international as well as the domestic level of policy making.

Do we want the world to collapse into a Hobbesian state of nature, which, if one believes humanity to be essentially good, is an unnatural state of affairs? That is the fear if multilateralism fails to hold sway against unilateralism in international law and order. Alongside the strident voices of the hawks in Washington, crying for broader strikes against perceived targets in the Middle East, other voices are calling for more measured and culturally sensitive approaches that will provide security for the future—the “soft security” of human dignity, self-worth, and confidence. For instance, a Council on Foreign Relations report concluded that the long-term vision for Iraq, among other things, should “welcome the fullest possible involvement in peacekeeping, reconciliation, and reconstruction efforts by multilateral organisations, such as the United Nations, neighbouring states (especially the Arab world), non-Arab Muslim countries, and other Western partners.”[17]

Amid what appears to be an increasingly hegemonic vision for the new world order, it is refreshing and consoling to see many in the United States paying heed to the purposes and principles of the UN Charter, which offers a multilateral approach to the challenges confronting international peace and security, emphasizing development of friendly relations and achievment of international cooperation in a variety of fields. It is during these windows of rational reflection in Washington that one might recall that the United Nations, the international institutions, and the system of alliances and treaty relationships formed in the aftermath of World War II were achieved in large part because of American leadership and engagement.[18] Those institutions and alliances succeeded not because of any specific threat that had emerged but because of a genuine spirit of international cooperation and respect. Isn’t it time for all to comply with international laws and norms? A culture of compliance is necessary for our troubled world. Any attempt to change the existing laws and norms should come from within the world’s cultures, not from without.

 American Realities

Today, American leadership appears to operate within a matrix of fear and isolation, resulting in unilateral militarism and cultural disengagement that are reflected in the passing of Resolution 1373 on September 28, 2001, as a direct response to the events of September 11. That resolution, which essentially accepted the American interpretation of terrorism and support for terrorism, was oblivious to the many far-reaching repercussions and unintended consequences of a measure whose ad hoc nature has since been questioned by human rights organizations, bodies, and personalities. One certainly cannot build good international law in a crisis atmosphere. Nowhere are the repercussions of such an international response (multilateral in ideology, unilateral in reality) more apparent than in the Middle East, where American strategic and economic interests have been articulated through President George W. Bush's proposed Middle East Free Trade Area and Middle East Partnership Initiative "to bring the Middle East into an expanding circle of opportunity."[19]

Expanding circles of opportunity in the Middle East is an exercise in futility as long as U.S. strategy in the region continues to operate according to the priorities of oil and security as opposed to humanitarianism. By 2020, the United States is expected to consume an additional 7.4 million barrels of oil per day, reaching approximately 27.5 million barrels per day (about 24 percent of the world's estimated daily consumption of approximately 112 million barrels per day). It is forecast that with the continued slow decline of U.S. domestic production over this period, the United States will become gradually more dependent on imported oil over the next twenty years.[20]

To articulate a positive vision for all, but to ignore one's own responsibilities to bring that vision about, is perhaps what leads some observers, like Javad Zarif, Iran's ambassador to the United Nations, to argue that Washington is "confusing unilateralism with leadership."[21] Zarif's position is that U.S. hegemonic ambition ignores "our common vulnerability to threats which require close cooperation among members of the international community."

Some Americans have taken a similar approach. Senator Joseph Biden has aptly warned that foreign policy cannot be conducted at the extremes:

<quote>

What we need isn't the death of internationalism or the denial of stark national interest, but a more enlightened nationalism—one that understands the value of institutions but allows us to use military force, without apology or apprehension if we have to, but does not allow us to be so blinded by the overwhelming power of our armed forces that we fail to see the benefit of sharing the risks and the costs with others. We have to understand and be willing to accept that giving a bigger role to the United Nations and NATO means sharing control. The truth is that we missed a tremendous opportunity after 9/11 to lead in a way that actually encouraged others to follow. We missed an opportunity, in the aftermath of our spectacular military victory, to ask those who were not with us in the war to be partners in the peace.[22]

</quote>

The irony, particularly in the context of the ideology/reality dichotomy, is that while the United States sees itself as supporting freedom from oppression, in the region itself, the United States is, as Soumaya Ghanoushi has put it, "widely regarded by many … as a crucial obstacle in [the] struggle for freedom from oppression."[23]

 The European Perspective

The European Union has recognized both the link among development, poverty, and conflict and the role of development cooperation in conflict prevention: "Violent conflict causes massive humanitarian suffering, undermines development and human rights and stifles economic growth."[24] Moreover, one might recall the 1999 Hague Appeal for Peace, which is dedicated to "the delegitimization of war, seeking to refocus on a world vision wherein violent conflict is publicly acknowledged as illegitimate, illegal, and fundamentally unjust." To ensure that conflict prevention and peace-building form a central part of development policy, the EU declares that it is important that the issue be further “mainstreamed” within EU policy.

The United States should perhaps follow the EU example in developing and integrating a civilian crisis management capacity in the Middle East. From a peace-building perspective, more attention certainly needs to be given to linking crisis management with longer-term conflict prevention strategies. In the Middle East, in particular, what is needed is a code of conduct, a “partnership for peace,” an Eastern Mediterranean Treaty Organization, or perhaps a Middle Eastern version of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE).

An articulation of the relevant agenda for any such organization would include the need for a WMD-free zone; a clear definition of terror (both state and nonstate); concrete steps, adequately funded, to redress both manifestations and causes of terror; a humanitarian Marshall Plan (as opposed to a “martial” plan, the likes of which we still see in so many postconflict arenas); transparency guaranteed by government, with a focus on poverty alleviation; education; and interactive citizens’ media whereby the people of the region can promote their own dialogue.

If the European Union is dedicated to true multilateralism and appreciates the impact of “soft power” in today’s world, perhaps it will lead such a new architectural effort.

 Breaking the Political Economy of Despair

As a member of the group of advisers to the UN Dialogue of Civilizations process, I was struck by the aptness of the phrase “the indignities of the 1990s.” The aim was, of course, to counterbalance those indignities by creating a paradigmatic shift in our ideas about where we, as humanity, are and how we wish to move forward. Also, as a member of the high-level panel charged by the UN secretary-general to work with the high commissioner for human rights to follow up on the action plan of the 2001 World Conference against Racism, I believe this could be done by following “a humanitarian vision based on an ‘ethic of human solidarity,’ stressing the centrality of human dignity, respect for diversity and the importance of effective measures of protection for civilians,” as emphasized by this panel. “A possible way to achieve this could be through the development of a ‘Racial Equality Index’ similar to the ‘Human Development Index’ developed and used by the United Nations Development Programme.”

Perhaps thinking globally and acting regionally—which requires a sharing not only of ideas but also of the instruments and tools, including international law, that make such cooperation viable and successful—will help shift not only our entrenched ideological positions but the reality as well. The overemphasis on the military dimension has, in the past, given rise to what may be termed the political economy of despair. My late brother, His Majesty King Hussein, put it this way at Sharm el-Sheikh, Egypt, in 1996:

<quote>

The murder and torture of innocent people is not exclusive to one race or nation or to followers of any one religion. It is vital therefore that terrorism be tackled at the international level in a multilateral way, and not in a gung-ho partisan manner. Thus, there is an urgent need to develop a universally acceptable global ethic of human solidarity in which the term “ethics” ought not to be limited to the moral aspect only, but also cover the common sociocultural values that are universal and which have stood the test of time. Implicit within this ethic of human solidarity is the requirement for an overarching matrix of International Humanitarian and Human Rights Law.

</quote>

The question is, will Washington limit itself to a merely punitive agenda to treat only the symptoms of crisis in the Muslim world? In the international coalition at this time, Muslim countries have to take the initiative and attempt to provide a solution rather than just follow America or Britain. The Organization of the Islamic Conference condemned the September 11 attacks but linked the fight against terrorism with the Palestinian situation. One cannot deny the centrality of Palestine to the wider question, but the Muslim world needs to build a coalition among its own states that will twist the neck of current reality by moving toward the creation of integrated strategies that will delegitimize the terrorists, drain the proverbial swamp, and deal with its root causes. As seekers of truth, we owe future generations the legacy of a new reality based on global commons.

[6] Hans Corell, “Developing the Rule of Law among Nations: A Challenge to the United Nations,” The Steinkraus-Cohen International Law Lecture, London, July 7, 2003.

[7] Karen Armstrong in The Guardian, June 20, 2002.

[8] Akbar S. Ahmed, “Islam and the Rest of the World,” speech to the Muslim Council in Washington, D.C., 2003.

[9] See Khaled Abou el Fadl, “Islam: Images, Politics, Paradox,” Middle East Report 221 (Winter 2001), in Islam and the Theology of Power (Los Angeles: UCLA Center for the Study of Religion, 2001).

[10] Sohail H. Hashmi, “Not What the Prophet Would Want: How Can Islamic Scholars Sanction Suicidal Tactics?” Washington Post, June 9, 2002.

[11] Jean E. Rosenfeld, The Religion of Usamah bin Ladin: Terror as the Hand of God (Los Angeles: UCLA Center for the Study of Religion, 2002).

[12] Khalid S. al-Khater, “Thinking about Arab-American Relations: A New Perspective,” MERIA 7, no. 2 (June 2003).

[13] Sayyid Rida al-Sadiq, “At War with the Spirit of Islam,” Dialogue (London) (August 2003).

[14] Report of Partners in Humanity Working Meeting, Amman, Jordan, July 26–29, 2003.

[15] Sayyed Nadeem Kazmi, “Educational Outreach in Muslim States: Implications and Responses,” The Conflict, Security and Development Group Bulletin, Department for International Development, London (March-April 2002).

[16] United Nations Research Institute for Social Development (UNRISD) Conference on Racism and Public Policy, September 3–5, 2001, Durban, South Africa.

[17] Edward P. Djerejian and Frank G. Wisner, Report of the Independent Working Group, under the auspices of the Council on Foreign Relations and James Baker III Institute, Washington, D.C., January 23, 2003.

[18] Robert T. Grey, Jr., “Warmongering without Representation: Unilateralism Is Not the American Way,” San Francisco Chronicle, January 15, 2003.

[19] The quote is from President George W. Bush’s speech of May 9, 2003.

[20] J.A. Russell, “Searching for a Post-Saddam Regional Security Architecture,” MERIA 7, no. 2 (March 2003).

[21] H.E. Javad Zarif, “Indispensable Power: Hegemonic Tendencies in a Globalized World,” Harvard International Review (Winter 2003).

[22] Senator Joseph Biden, “National Dialogue on Iraq + One Year,” The Brookings Institution, Washington, D.C., July 31, 2003.

[23] Soumaya Ghanoushi, “The Origins of Extremism: Theology or Reality?” Islam 21 (London) (December 2001).

[24] “Ensuring Progress in the Prevention of Violent Conflict,” priorities for the Greek and Italian EU presidencies 2003, April 2003.

 5. Ending Support for Terrorism in the Muslim World

Michele Durocher Dunne

On September 11, 2001, I was finishing lunch in Cairo with an Egyptian friend when I received a call on my mobile phone with shocking news. As I relayed the news to Mohammed bit by bit, we both rose from our seats and fled—I to the U.S. embassy (where I was a political officer), and he to an office of the Egyptian presidency (where he was an adviser). After a few initial days of understandable security panic, the embassy opened a book of condolences. Soon Egyptians from many walks of life—diplomats and business tycoons, yes, but also entire classes of schoolchildren—lined up for days to sign that book, many of them weeping and bearing flowers.

At the same time, however, the international media conveyed images of Egyptians and other Arabs expressing joy, or at least grim satisfaction, at the attacks. Over the ensuing months, many Egyptians who professed to be friends to the United States said to me, in effect, “I’m sorry this happened, but you had it coming.”

With this mixed picture as background, let us pose two questions: What is the problem the United States faces in the Muslim world? And what should we do about it?

Regarding what to do, as a start, I posit that the U.S. government, with all the many tools and vast power at its disposal, cannot directly change the thinking or behavior of Muslims who support the use of terrorism. Nor can the U.S. government directly alter the policies of Middle Eastern governments that acquiesce to terrorism, play double games with terrorists, or oppress their people in ways that feed terrorism. And clearly, the U.S. government cannot use, ought not use, and in any case has no intention of using military force against every country in the Middle East whose counterterrorism policies we find less than perfect.

It is equally important to know, however, what the U.S. government can do. It can put the tremendous power and influence it possesses to work in combating both the phenomenon of terrorism itself and the problems that give rise to support for terrorism among Muslims. To do this, however, the U.S. government would need to change the way it deals with governments of Arab and other Muslim countries. Doing so would require an integrated policy approach, not just military and law-enforcement efforts dressed up with public diplomacy.

To say any more of such an approach, however, requires us to first return to the problem.

 What the Problem Is…and Is Not

In addition to the phenomenon of terrorist acts themselves—which has been the focus of intensive military, diplomatic, and law-enforcement efforts since September 2001—there is the nagging issue of why many (though by no means all) Muslims in various parts of the world expressed the opinion after September 11 that the attacks were justified or at least understandable. American observers have suggested a number of explanations: that active or passive support for the use of terrorism springs from something endemic to Islam or to Arab culture; that such support springs from the perceived threat that American culture and globalization pose to Islam; that such support is a response to oppression by local rulers; that such support reflects strong objections to U.S. policies in the Middle East.

The fact that those who carried out the attacks of September 11 (and other Muslims who saw those attacks as justified in some way) came originally from countries where they were oppressed politically and otherwise, and that they nursed deep grievances against U.S. policies, is difficult to deny. Regarding the Arab countries in particular, I have often been struck by the difficulty of disentangling the various sources of grievance toward the United States. It is as if there were a deep well of resentment with various contributing streams—American policy regarding Israel and Palestine; the U.S. military presence on the Arabian peninsula and in the Persian Gulf; U.S. support for governments that oppress politically and that are inept or worse economically; and the resulting exclusion of many Arabs from the benefits of globalization, with which, of course, the United States is closely identified.

Anger toward the United States due to its support for Israel, which despite the many years of U.S. efforts for peace often redounds to the disadvantage of Palestinians, is an important factor, but by no means is it the only one. And it is a factor with symbolic as well as actual impact; the Palestinian issue feeds a feeling among many Arabs—and apparently many non-Arab Muslims as well—of humiliation by association.

Similarly, the presence of U.S. military forces in Saudi Arabia (greatly reduced in the summer of 2003) and elsewhere in the region creates another source of humiliation for Muslims, who see it as demonstrating that they are unable to deal with their most basic problems, even the protection of their own sacred places. Needless to say, U.S. military action to remove Saddam Hussein’s regime and the resulting occupation of Iraq merely point out one more glaring problem that Arabs have been unable to take care of themselves.

In addition to the more obvious problems of Palestine and Iraq, it is many Arabs’ sense of helplessness in changing their own very difficult domestic political and economic conditions that fuels their anger at the United States. The United States is almost universally held responsible, whether fairly or not, for supporting the governments that perpetuate those terrible conditions. It is on this matter that I will focus in describing what the problem is and how to address it.

Arguably, grievances, however deeply felt, do not fully explain why horrific violence against innocent people is viewed as a legitimate response. But bitter feelings of humiliation and helplessness, spiked with the Islamic extremists' call to reject and attack the new global order authored by the United States, make a powerful brew. One way to capture this dynamic is through an economic metaphor: there is a desperate demand for solutions to desperate problems in the Arab world, and a well-funded supply of Islamic extremist ideas and groups rise to meet that demand.

The supply side of the question—namely, the funding and political support of Islamic extremist ideas and groups exported from the Arabian Peninsula to many other Arab and Muslim countries — is undoubtedly a serious problem. Cutting off funds and other forms of support to those who either commit terrorist attacks or justify them through religious or political teachings is indispensable. It must be a top priority within the context of an overall strategy.

Dealing with the supply side alone, however, is not enough, because extremists in many countries have deep roots and can easily replace recruits who are captured or killed. The demand side is just as important. In other words, if Saudi Arabia (and Iran, for that matter) were to disappear from the face of the earth tomorrow, Islamic extremists would survive in many other countries, unaided from the outside, because miserable local conditions have created a demand (and a large pool of recruits) for the radical solutions the extremists feign to supply.

In thinking about how the United States should approach the conditions that generate a demand or support for terrorism, I start from the premise that American influence and resources in the Arab world have not been, are not now, and cannot be neutral. To quote Bob Dylan, "We're gonna have to serve somebody," and a serious rethinking of whom in the Arab world our policies and assistance programs are serving is long overdue.

There are two realities that we need to acknowledge before we can get anywhere. First, until recently, U.S. priorities in the region have been so narrowly drawn—security of oil supplies; guaranteed military access; a sometimes cautious, sometimes energetic pursuit of Israeli-Palestinian peace—as to cause the United States to bolster regimes whose domestic policies are economic and political disasters. Although not necessarily the intent of the U.S. government, it remains the case that Arab domestic issues were ignored for too many years. The Bush administration deserves credit for being the first to see things differently, and the president's National Endowment for Democracy speech of November 6, 2003, is by far the most dramatic presidential statement on this issue in more than half a century. But it remains unclear how seriously and skillfully the issue will be addressed.

Second, the State Department has devoted far too little attention to managing diplomatic relationships in the Arab world, in many cases leaving that job to the Defense Department. One need only contrast the record of frequent, routinely scheduled travel by senior Defense Department officials to Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Jordan, and other Arab countries in recent years (long before September 11 and the war in Iraq) with the infrequent trips of senior State Department officials. The huge imbalance of resources that the two departments have in hand, plus the absence of any State Department equivalent to the military commanders in chief who can operate on a regional basis, only compounds the implications of the lack of high-level State Department leadership.

One consequence of all this was that as long as our basic needs, narrowly defined, were being assured, little effort was devoted to all the other aspects of our relationships with these countries. We did not bother much to manage impressions, refute untruths, or pay close attention to political, economic, and social life inside these countries.

To sum up then, what is the problem? The problem, we now realize, is that what goes on inside Middle Eastern countries has important security consequences for us. Unfortunately, our ability to affect those goings-on has been compromised by the legacy of our attending exclusively to more traditional security problems—namely, those of the Cold War. What is not the problem? The problem is not proving whether everything the Arabs say about the United States and U.S. policy is true. We cannot escape from the fact that the conditions under which Arabs and many other Muslims live lead them to believe it is all true.

 What to Do … and Not to Do

If the United States must now begin to concern itself with domestic conditions in Arab countries with which it has important relationships (and in some cases significant assistance programs), how should it do so?

American influence, though far from neutral, is also generally indirect. With few exceptions, we cannot directly change conditions in other countries, and in any case, we would not be willing to commit the resources required even to make a serious attempt. It is instructive to remember what any twelve-step program tells its participants: you cannot change another person or his or her behavior directly. What the United States can do is change its own behavior toward the governments in question, which in turn would change dynamics between the United States and actors (whether governments or not) in those countries, and which, in turn, may cause those actors to change their behavior.

It hardly wants emphasis that this process is unpredictable and not completely controllable. But it has the virtue of being based in reality and has a reasonable chance of success. Self-delusion or arguing about our ability to change things directly does not.

A policy review must also start from the premise that something is seriously amiss regarding any country where we have a significant relationship, but where there is nonetheless significant support for anti-U.S. terrorism. We need to understand which forces our current relationships are serving and how we would have to change those relationships so that they serve those inside and outside governments whose interests accord with ours and who will give their people a stake in a viable system: forces for liberal, market economies; for the rule of law and respect for women's rights; for accountable, participatory political systems; for religious toleration and nonviolence. Nothing less will suit—not these days.

Any such strategy must involve all the tools at the U.S. government's disposal: diplomatic engagement, military relationships, assistance programs, public diplomacy, and engagement with American private enterprise and nongovernmental organizations. Public diplomacy efforts—glossy magazines for Arab youth, satellite television to compete with al-Jazeera, pop radio programs like Radio Sawa and Radio Farda, campaigns to show religious tolerance and diversity in the United States—are positive in their own way. But they have impact only if accompanied by a responsible reorientation of our policies and assistance programs. Arabs, Iranians, Pakistanis, and others are not stupid people; they will not buy rhetoric without a corresponding reality for very long.

Similarly, assistance programs to promote political and economic reform and to improve education or free media, for example, will fall flat or backfire unless they are part of an overall strategy of engagement with governments. Simply put, how seriously will any Arab leader take our assistance or public diplomacy programs to promote reform and moderation when those subjects are never on the agenda of high-level conversations?

For policy purposes, we need a country-by-country diagnosis of the nature of the problem—specifically, why people in Saudi Arabia or Egypt or Pakistan or Indonesia would support or sympathize with those who commit or advocate terrorism against Americans. The reasons need not be, and probably are not, the same in every case. Next, we need to look with fresh eyes at what the United States can do—and what the United States should urge the governments in question to do—to address the problems and grievances that have led to this sad state of affairs.

Following the diagnosis and a cold-eyed examination of our current relations with what involves twenty-two Arab countries and at least that many more majority-Muslim countries, the U.S. government should formulate policy to begin the long, messy, and uncertain process of using our influence to push things in the right direction. No doubt, we will need to work with other major donors, including international financial institutions, to multiply our efforts.

All of this will be difficult and will involve painstaking work. The furthest the Bush administration has gone in addressing underlying support for terrorism in the Arab world has been through the Middle East Partnership Initiative (MEPI), announced by Secretary of State Powell in December 2002. The initiative seeks to use existing and new economic assistance to Middle East countries to promote economic, political, and educational reform and the empowerment of women. Although the initiative is undoubtedly positive and deserves support, it is not, or not yet, a comprehensive strategy. It is still divorced from U.S. military assistance, for example, and has little connection to public diplomacy efforts. Moreover, there is no parallel initiative for Muslims outside the Middle East in such important countries as Indonesia, Pakistan, or Nigeria.

So what to do? We need to take the domestic political, economic, and social dynamics of Arab and Muslim countries seriously, and we need to rebalance our overall policy objectives to reflect that reality. What not to do? We do not have to ruin existing relationships with the Saudi, Egyptian, and other Arab governments, or undermine Israeli security, or abandon our interests in the traditional objectives of oil, peace, and strategic access. The task is hard enough as it is without painting it as both impossible and ridiculous. What is needed is a filling out and maturation of our relationships with governments and peoples of the region to show that we believe domestic reform is badly needed in many countries, for their good and for ours.

 Getting Organized

The Middle East Partnership Initiative offers a window on how the organization of the U.S. government affects its ability to deal with the Muslim world. Strict division of bureaucratic responsibilities along regional lines in the Departments of State and Defense discourages productive thinking about problems that cross regions. Bureaucrats in regional bureaus consider it not only a prerogative but also a duty to combat any transregional priority that might cut into their freedom to make decisions about policies and money within their narrow and short-term perspectives. (Readers who have not worked in the U.S. government might find this statement cynical; those who have are liable to find it a gross understatement.)

That is why there should be a designated high-level official, for example a special assistant to the president, to oversee the development and implementation of policy strategies on using our influence to help end support for terrorism in the Muslim world. The special assistant would coordinate with those working the supply side of the problem (intelligence and law-enforcement efforts to stop terrorist acts, as well as diplomacy to end funding and other forms of support to extremist Islamists), and those working the demand side (diplomatic assistance and public diplomacy efforts to address conditions that generate support for terrorism) to ensure that efforts are coherent and mutually reinforcing. The existing bureaucracy is simply incapable of changing course without strong leadership, and it will tend to cut initiatives (such as MEPI) down to a size that fits into the old scheme of priorities.

The reality is that if there is no one accountable for doing a difficult job in government, that job will not get done. Is it possible that, after the thousands of lives lost and billions of dollars spent on combating terrorism through military action and law enforcement, the U.S. government will fail to effectively combat the underlying sources of support for terrorism because it was simply too much trouble to ask the bureaucracy to operate differently? Yes, it is possible.

* Country Portraits

 6. Islam, Modernity, and Public Diplomacy in the Arab World: A Moroccan Snapshot

Dale F. Eickelman

Prior to the coalition invasion in Iraq, one of the hottest topics of intellectual debate in the Arab world, as well as on al-Jazeera satellite television, was “Islam and modernity” (al-Islam wa al-hadatha). Discussions of religion and modernity framed even the widely discussed 2002 Arab development report. The fact that such a document is accessible in several languages via the Internet throughout the Arab world and elsewhere also shows the rapidly changing ground rules for public discussion and debate.[25]

Islam and Islam’s relation to modern society are central topics in present-day debate and discourse. What is not thoroughly modern and up to date—in the Middle East, Europe, and the United States—are understandings of the role that religion plays in contemporary social life. Ironically, the secular bias of Western modernization theory has deflected attention away from the pervasive role of religious practices and values in contemporary societies, particularly in the Muslim-majority world.

 Modernization Theory and Religion

In the early 1960s, a leading American public intellectual saw the Muslim world as facing an unpalatable choice: either “neo-Islamic totalitarianism” intent on “resurrecting the past” or a “reformist Islam” that would open “the sluice gates and [be] swamped by the deluge.”[26] Another suggested that Middle Eastern societies faced the stark choice of “Mecca or mechanization.”[27] At the least, such views suggested an intensely negative assessment of the possibilities of indigenous evolution in Muslim societies.

Common to all variants of modernization theory is the assumption of a declining role for religion, except as a private matter. To move toward modernity, political leaders must displace the authority of religious leaders and devalue the importance of traditional religious institutions. Modernity is seen as an “enlargement of human freedoms” and an “enhancement of the range of choices” as people begin to “take charge” of themselves.[28] In this view, religion can retain its influence only by conforming to the norms of “rationality” and relativism, accepting secularization, and becoming subordinate to science, economic concerns, and the state.

Recent history offers formidable challenges to Western modernization theory. Of all third world countries, Iran had undergone enormous state-driven modernization prior to 1978–79. Nonetheless, the state’s greatest challenge emanated from the growing urban middle classes, those who had benefited the most from modernization. Revolution, not political stability, was the result. Moreover, religious sentiment and leadership, not the secular intelligentsia, gave coherence and force to the revolution.

Modernization theory also deflected attention away from other politically influential religious movements in the 1970s, such as the rise of Solidarity in Poland, liberation theology throughout Latin America, and protestant fundamentalism as a force in American politics. In the words of philosopher Richard Rorty, religion usually functions as a “conversation-stopper” outside of circles of believers.[29] That’s why Western modernization experts viewed secular nationalisms, including the rise of the Ba’ath party in Syria and Iraq, as forces for modernization and development.

 The Return of Religion

Although it is easy to be critical of Samuel Huntington’s “clash” argument because of its reliance on superseded ideas of culture, he was one of the first political scientists to spur colleagues and policy makers to reemphasize the roles of culture and tradition in political and international relations.[30] Decades before Huntington’s argument, sociologist and public intellectual Edward Shils vigorously argued that traditions are not merely unquestioned residues from earlier eras; instead, they are actively maintained clusters of cultural concepts, shared understandings, and practices that make political and social life possible.[31] These pervasive cultural understandings coexist with and shape the experience of modernity. In this sense, ethnicity, caste, and clientelism can be as distinctly modern as the idea of individual choice.

Politics, like religion, is a struggle over people's imaginations, a competition and contest over the meanings of symbols. This means that politics encompasses tradition, not only in the form of practices and shared understandings but also in the interpretation of symbols and the control of institutions, formal and informal, that produce and sustain those symbols. Politics also involves cooperation in and contest over symbolic production and control of the institutions, formal and informal, that serve as the symbolic arbiters of society.

The role of symbolic politics in general, or of "Muslim politics" in the sense of a field for debate as opposed to a bloc of uniform belief and practice, could be seen as less exceptional if the European experience with secularism were kept in mind. Religious discourse was a basic precondition for the rise of the early modern public sphere in Europe.[32] Indeed, contemporary defenders of secularism often exaggerate the durability and open-mindedness of thoroughly secular institutions, be they in the United States, Turkey, or India. In the context of the Muslim-majority Middle East, the militant secularism of some governing elites—the Turkish officer corps, for example—has been associated until recently with authoritarianism and intolerance more than with "enlightenment" values.

Because the Muslim-majority world remains feared by those who regard it as the last outpost of the antimodern, the role of religious intellectuals in contributing to an emerging public sphere is often overlooked. This public sphere is rapidly expanding because of the growth of higher education, the increasing ease of travel, and the proliferation of media and means of communication. Both mass education and mass communication, particularly the proliferation of media, profoundly influence how people think about the language of religious and political authority throughout the Muslim world. It is only a minor paradox that a strong indication of modernity is the way in which a decentralized al Qaeda has succeeded in organization and practice in the face of determined efforts to eradicate it.

 Terrorism's Thoroughly Modern Face

Terrorism in the name of Islam also has a thoroughly modern face. Osama bin Laden no longer makes many videos, but when he did, his rehearsed message and presentation of self was as thoroughly modern as that of French-educated Pol Pot. Bin Laden may have tried to reinvent a traditional Islamic warrior “look,” but his sense of the past is an invented one. The language and content of his videotaped appeals, such as a recruitment video that appeared in late spring of 2001, were even more contemporary than his camouflage jacket, Kalashnikov rifle, and Timex watch. The CNN-like video, complete with “zippers”—running text beneath the images—was as fast-paced as a U.S. Army recruitment video or a U.S. presidential campaign ad.

Indeed, bin Laden is thoroughly imbued with the values of the modern world, even if only to reject them. He studied English at a private school and used English for his civil engineering courses. His many business enterprises flourished under highly adverse conditions. He sustained flexible, multinational organizations in the face of enemies—moving cash, people, and armaments undetected across frontiers.

Unlike most of his colleagues, bin Laden has been a highly visible poster child for transnational religious terrorism. Underestimating the intelligence, commitment, and tenacity of international terrorists would be an error as tragic as assuming that they are on the run. The best candidates for terrorist activities, like candidates for “martyrdom” operations, appear not to be maladjusted, undereducated, suicidal misfits; rather, they are intelligent, committed, motivated individuals willing to sacrifice material and emotional comforts because they regard their religion as their most important personal value.[33] The spring 2001 al Qaeda recruitment video appeals to those wishing to devote themselves to a higher cause, and organized, experienced cadres appear able to recruit those most capable of advancing the cause.

In the past few years, to speak about “public Islam” and the “common good” (al-maslaha al-’amma)—a Qur’anically sanctioned term that has more resonance than calls to civil society and that is used for this purpose by many of those who support civil society—requires tenacity and courage. Colombia may still lead the world in the number of deaths directly attributable to terrorism, but the events of September 11, the October 2002 bombings in Bali, the May 2003 “kamikaze” attacks in Saudi Arabia and Morocco, the November attacks in Riyadh and Istanbul, and the continued bombings and violence elsewhere, including Jerusalem and Baghdad, test the limits of civility and tolerance. One place to begin looking for changing attitudes is the so-called Arab “street.”

 The New Arab “Street” in Morocco

The Arab “street”—a term that is rapidly disappearing from Washington shorthand—has rapidly evolved in the past two decades from the shapeless and manipulated image that the term once evoked in the West. Throughout the Arab world, Iran, and Turkey, there is a more concrete awareness than in the past of the benefits and characteristics of more open societies. From March 20, 2003, a day after the first British and U.S. bombs fell on selected targets in Baghdad, until early June of that year, I was “embedded” in the old madina of Fez, twelve minutes by fast walk from the nearest drivable road. Complete with donkeys, mules, pushcarts, CD and cassette shops selling the latest pirated pop music, and satellite TVs in coffee shops, Fez’s madina must qualify as the quintessential Arab “street.”

Many of my neighbors lived at the economic edge, buying minuscule amounts of cooking oil and supplies meal by meal and often on credit because of meager incomes. Having been away from Fez for eight years, I was surprised by the prevalence of satellite television or access to it in coffee shops. During the first weeks of the Iraqi invasion, almost everyone’s last choice for news was Morocco’s state-run television, watched only for the “official” story. Qatar’s al-Jazeera satellite TV was usually the channel of choice, although competing Arabic satellite news channels, especially al-’Arabiya, were also closely watched. One did not have to be wealthy to watch satellite TV. Few Fassis read newspapers for understanding the latest events—only 1 percent of Moroccans regularly do. In contrast, about 4 percent of Algerians regularly read newspapers in spite of Algeria’s much lower rate of literacy.[34]

After the fall of Saddam’s regime—announced April 10 in Asharq al-Awsat (London), the premier international Arabic language newspaper; repeated endlessly on most Arab satellite channels; and grudgingly conceded by Morocco’s partisan local press—discussion along my particular Arab “street” was uncannily like discussions in the Western press: What happens next? Will America (Britain was scarcely mentioned) bring a better government? What will be the Turkish reaction, especially if Iraq’s Kurds are given a voice in government?

Although the term democracy (al-dimuqratiya) was used only by the educated, many people were aware of restrictions placed on their genuine political participation. Freedom of the press and relief from government manipulation of the electoral political process were themes understood by many more. Discussions of politics and the implications of the “regime change” in Iraq were more animated in private homes than on the Arab “street.”

In 2003, the perpetrators of the May 16 bombings in Casablanca carefully timed them as a media event. Moroccans were finishing a week of celebrations for the naming ceremony for the monarch’s first child, Hassan III. The evening news on state television was still showing images of celebrations throughout the country and the monarch’s visits to major religious shrines in Fez and Meknes. In Marrakech, on the night of May 15, I witnessed dancing in the streets (young men only, of course, as is locally “proper”) and heard a band playing the then popular Arabic song, “Give Me a Visa, Give Me a Passport.” The televised pageantry the next evening was splendid and the television announcers breathless in proclaiming the people’s joy and unity with the ’Alawi dynasty and the king’s designated successor, the infant “deputy of the era” (wali al-’ahd). The coordinated bomb attacks in the center of Casablanca were aimed at Jewish and foreign targets, including the Jewish cemetery next to the old madina, a Spanish restaurant, and a hotel often used by tourists from Israel and in which a Moroccan-American seminar on counterterrorism had just concluded. These attacks quickly displaced news of the royal birth.

The May 17 evening television news showed the devastation, including photographs of the mainly Moroccan victims and their relatives. The king visited the scenes of carnage and comforted the survivors; television showed all. The palace spokesperson declared that the investigation would be “transparent,” punishment of the perpetrators would be “without mercy,” and Morocco’s steps toward “democracy” would not be derailed—the latter of which was a reference to local elections postponed from April to September 2003 because of concerns of growing Islamist influence.

The public face of response was horror and shock. The private face is harder to read. Because the monarch spoke out, few people offered contrary opinions in public. After a summer 1994 terrorist bombing in Marrakech’s main square, the Djema‘a el-Fina, the national manhunt quickly tracked down the perpetrators and had widespread popular support. As one Islamic activist explained to me at the time, this was a national issue, not a political one, and people volunteered leads to the police throughout Morocco.

A similar outcome to the 2003 bombings will offer a measure of the current balance of political forces. Although Moroccans spoke less about the Casablanca bombings than they did about the invasion of Iraq in late March and early April 2003, the level of public awareness and concern was high. A few days after the Casablanca bombings, state television was filled with images of projects to relieve the desperate poverty of Morocco’s shantytowns. The Ministry of Education announced that illiteracy rates will be reduced in the next few years, and the Ministry of Pious Endowments and Religious Affairs announced plans to remove extremist preachers from mosques. Many Moroccans, including journalists with some of the small circulation weekly reviews, have rediscovered the “forgotten” inhabitants, such as the squalid Sidi Moumen shantytown on the outskirts of Casablanca, home to most of Casablanca’s May 16 “kamikaze” bombers. Yet most Moroccans remain skeptical about how long or how deep this “rediscovery” of Morocco’s poor and disadvantaged will persist.

The Japanese term kamikaze, the preferred term used by Moroccan government spokespeople in the wake of the Casablanca bombings, was an interesting choice because it avoided the direct invocation of a religious term, such as the Arabic shahid (“martyr”) or its direct denial as intihari (“suicide”). Kamikaze carries less contextual baggage, and thus becomes the first Japanese term to enter Moroccan colloquial usage and Arabic usage in general. It also possibly indicates the ambivalence of state spokespeople in public about choosing Arabic terms that would have unequivocally denied religious legitimacy to all those who would use such tactics in support of causes elsewhere. The good news is that the invocation of a Japanese term at least occasioned public, although not broadcast, discussion and debate. One wonders, however, how long it will be before people start using the term Islamikaze.

 Discovering Open Societies and Making Them Work

The substantial growth in mass education over the past three decades, the proliferation and accessibility of new media and communications, and the increasing ease of travel make it impossible for state and religious authorities to monopolize the tools of literature and culture. The ideas, images, and practices of alternative social and political worlds have become a daily occurrence. They enter domestic space through satellite and cable television, and the alternate realities are better understood than in the past. Rapidly rising literacy levels and familiarity with an educated Arabic formerly restricted to an elite facilitate this better comprehension. They also rehearse viewers to respond to those in authority in the common Arabic of the classroom and the media.

Ideas of just rule, religious or otherwise, are not fixed, even if some radicals claim otherwise. Such notions are debated, argued, often fought about, and re-formed in practice. Such debates are occurring throughout the region. A needed first step is to recognize the contours, obstacles, and false starts, both internal to the region's different countries and external, to making governance less arbitrary and authoritarian.

In April 2003, a Moroccan journalist, commenting on the shortcomings of Morocco's September 2002 elections and their relevance to the September 2003 local elections, wrote, "I am no longer interested in transparency as an end in itself, but rather as an instrument of political negotiation to brandish several months prior to [our] local elections." He concluded, "Communication does not necessarily mean credibility."[35] Perhaps not. However, the ability to communicate in a common language, confront authority in it, compare multiple sources of information on other people's experiences with similar issues elsewhere, and obtain reliable information and share it rapidly—abilities held until recently only by state authorities and a political elite—have dramatically changed shared understandings of religion and politics throughout the Arab Middle East. They have also altered the prospects for open societies and democracy.

The government's response to the November terrorist attacks is being carefully watched by all Moroccans, and efforts to characterize Islamists in general as "Stalinist fascists" or "intellectual fascists" may suffer severe backlash, especially in cities such as Casablanca, Tangier, Fez, Meknes, Rabat, and Marrakech, as well as in the universities, where Islamist thought and practice—although not terrorism—are gaining ground faster than the government and many others care to admit.

Such challenges are not regional alone, and foreign powers that act in the region to encourage more open societies must now match deeds with words. Successes, like shortcomings, will now become known in real time. Modernity offers opportunities as well as challenges. If U.S. military strength and efficacy is now matched by a persuasive and effective public diplomacy that works, encouraging open societies and making progress in resolving even the Israeli-Palestinian dispute, then we will have the most powerful means imaginable to turn the Arab "street" into a forum in which vast numbers of people, not just a political and economic elite, will have a say.

Of course, many of these voices will seek ideas of just rule in religion. We may find this use of religion in the public square unfamiliar, but, as in Turkey and possibly in postwar Iraq, the religiously committed can learn to become moderates and to work toward achieving open societies. Although achieving this goal will be more demanding than was regime change in Iraq, it is an opportunity that can, and must, be seized.

[25] See Yves Gonzalez-Quijano, "The Birth of a Media Ecosystem: Lebanon in the Internet Age," in New Media in the Muslim World: The Emerging Public Sphere, ed. Dale F. Eickelman and Jon W. Anderson (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2003), 61–79.

[26] Manfred Halpern, The Politics of Social Change in the Middle East and North Africa (Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1963), 129.

[27] Daniel Lerner, The Passing of Traditional Society: Modernizing the Middle East (New York: Free Press, 1964 [1958]), 405.

[28] T. N. Madan, “Secularism in Its Place,” Journal of Asian Studies 6 (1987): 747–59.

[29] Cited in John Keane, “The Limits of Secularism,” Times Literary Supplement (January 9, 1999), 12.

[30] Samuel Huntington, “The Clash of Civilizations?” Foreign Affairs 72, no. 3 (Summer 1993): 22–49. For comments on Huntington’s argument as it applies specifically to the Muslim world, see Dale F. Eickelman, “Muslim Politics: The Prospects for Democracy in North Africa and the Middle East,” in Islam, Democracy, and the State in North Africa, ed. John Entelis, 35–38 (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1997).

[31] Edward Shils, The Intellectuals and the Powers (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1972), 17.

[32] Dominique Colas, Civil Society and Fanaticism: Conjoined Histories, trans. Amy Jacobs (Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1997).

[33] For a summary of studies on would-be martyrs and attitudes toward them, see Scott Atran, “Who Wants to Be a Martyr?” New York Times, May 5, 2003.

[34] Oumama Draoui, “Le livre dans un piteux état,” Le Journal hebdomadaire (Casablanca), (May 3–9, 2003): 28.

[35] Driss Ksikes, “Un Hold-up avorté?” Tel Quel 72 (April 5–11, 2003): 28–37.

 7. The Challenges of Euro-Islam

Olivier Roy

Even if Islam-related terrorist attacks in Europe never achieve the level of those perpetrated in the United States or Indonesia, western Europe has played a major role as a base for planning and organization for al Qaeda’s cells: the World Trade Center (WTC) attack was planned by the Hamburg cell of al Qaeda; Ahmed Ressam was linked with a French radical network; Richard Reid was recruited in a British jail; and Zacharias Moussaoui found his calling in a London mosque.

Moreover, al Qaeda is not the only radical Islamic group active in western Europe. Other networks (like Kelkal in 1995 and the Roubaix group in 1996) have acted independently, mostly sharing ideas and recruiting along patterns similar to those of al Qaeda. Similarly, new independent groups could arise in the future. The issue of radicalization and violence thus goes beyond the present problem posed by al Qaeda and could continue or increase even if al Qaeda itself is destroyed. This is, roughly speaking, the scope of the challenge of Euro-Islam.

 Who Are the Terrorists?

Islamic radicals in western Europe fall roughly into three categories: foreign residents, second-generation immigrants (most often native-born), and converts.

The first category is that of young Middle Easterners who come to Europe as students, mostly in modern disciplines, who speak Arabic, and who are from middle-class backgrounds. The WTC pilots are an excellent example of this first category, who often become born-again Muslims only after coming to Europe and before joining a radical group.

The second category is made up of second-generation European Muslims, some educated but many more school dropouts, who usually come from rather destitute neighborhoods. They speak European languages as their first language and often are European citizens.

The third category, the smallest in number but not necessarily in significance, is made up of converts, many of whom became Muslim while spending time in jail.

Members of all three categories follow the same general trajectory of radicalization, the key to which is that they break ties with their milieu of origin. They almost invariably become born-again Muslims (or converts) by joining a mosque known to host radical imams, and soon after that (in the span of less than a year), they turn politically radical and go (or try to go) to fight a jihad abroad. Before September 11, that meant going to Afghanistan. Since May 2003, it may mean going to Iraq.[36]

It is noteworthy that almost none of these radicals have gone to their country of origin or of their families' origin to wage jihad. And they have usually gone to the "peripheral" jihad—to Bosnia, Chechnya, Afghanistan, Kashmir, or New York—rather than to the Middle East. (Two Pak-Britons did perpetrate a terrorist attack in Tel Aviv in spring 2003, but this is, so far, the only exception to the rule.)

In addition, almost all of these terrorists broke completely with their families only after entering their process of radicalization. Having done so, they usually became urban nomads of sorts, often changing places and even countries. Thus, these terrorists are largely supranational and socially atomized. They also tend to have a Westernized trajectory in studies (urban planning, computer science), in languages (all are fluent in Western languages), and in matrimonial affairs (often marrying or dating European women).

Such a Western profile is not only a function of their sociological situation, it is also a condition of success: they live in total immersion in a Western society. The strength and the weakness of Islamic radicals in western Europe is precisely their lack of rooting among the European Muslim population. The strengths are that they can hardly be spotted by the police before going into action or be traced by police penetration of the local Muslim population. It is also difficult to penetrate their networks because they are cut off from the outside world and are highly mobile. But the weakness is that they have problems of recruitment and logistics because they do not relate well to ordinary “civilian” fellow Muslims.

 Reasons for Radicalization

There is no clear-cut sociological profile of the Islamic radicals beyond that sketched out above. There is nothing exact or precise to link them to a given socioeconomic situation. More precisely, the reasons that may push them toward violence are not specific enough and include such characteristics shared by a larger population that deals with similar situations in very different ways. Explanations based on poverty, exclusion, racism, acculturation, and so forth may contain kernels of truth, but they are not specific enough to be of much practical help in stopping terrorists from acting.

For example, there is clearly a generational dimension at work here. Islamic radicalism is a youth movement. Frustration is obviously a key element in their radicalization, but it seems to have more to do with a particular psychological dimension than with a social or economic one. A common factor among known radicals is a concern for self-image and a desire to reconstruct the self through action. In this sense, young radicals are more in search of an opportunity for spectacular action where they will be personally and directly involved than with the long-term, patient building of a political organization that could extend the social and political base of their networks. They are more present-oriented activists than future-oriented constructivists. They are thus far different from the Comintern agents of the 1920s and 1930s.

This narcissist dimension explains both the commitment to suicide actions and the difficulty such people have in working underground without the perspective and prospect of action. Without terrorism, they do not exist. This commitment to immediate or midterm action, as opposed to long-term political action, is probably the greatest weakness of radical Islamism in Europe, but it also makes them very hard to catch and stop.

But clearly, only a small fraction of alienated Muslim youth evinces these characteristics. Very few become terrorists. There is no obvious or practical way to tell one trajectory from others because, as noted above, it is less sociological than psychological.

Another significant pattern in Euro-Islamist radicalization is the blending of Islamic wording and phraseology with a typically Western anti-imperialism and third-worldist radicalism. For the most part, Euro-Islamist targets are the same ones that the Western ultra-Leftist movements of the 1970s identified. Islamists, however, seek mass terrorism, and they do not target political or business personalities, as the European ultra-Left used to do. Nevertheless, the paradigm of ultra-Leftist terrorism from the 1970s might provide a bridge in future to non-Islamic radicals, perhaps even to some in the so-called antiglobalization movement.

But again, such ideologies are believed by many Islamic residents in western Europe, and only a few such ideologues become terrorists. So, we can array several perhaps necessary conditions for identifying an Islamist terrorist in Europe, but we cannot specify what the sufficient conditions are.

 Threats and Perspectives

Since September 11 and the anti-Taliban campaign in Afghanistan, Islamist terrorists have been faced with two new problems that have immediate consequences for their ability to act in or from western Europe: organizational problems and political problems.

No longer is there easy sanctuary for Islamist radicals in EU countries to meet, train, and forge esprit de corps and links with other groups—in a word, to coalesce a ragtag collection of activists into a cohesive and disciplined organization. It is becoming far more difficult to get organized and maintain communications with leaders within and outside the country. A specific dimension of al Qaeda was its “veteran’s solidarity”: many young radicals, who met first as a group of “buddies” in a Western country, turned into an efficient cell only after having lived in Afghanistan or after being led by someone who had been in Afghanistan and returned. Moreover, a distinctive pattern of al Qaeda was that personal links between veterans of the Afghan jihad had turned into an efficient but flexible chain of command, which is obviously no longer the case.

As to political problems, the West’s “demonizing” of Islam has put the Muslim population in the West on the defensive. Although this demonizing may have turned some individuals more radical, it has convinced most Muslims living in the West to adopt a clearer attitude and to advocate a greater integration into Western societies. European authorities have contributed to isolating the radicals by responding positively, at least in terms of rhetoric, to that quest for recognition and integration. Isolation among and alienation from the European Muslim population is now one of the radicals’ main challenges.

As a consequence of these developments, two new patterns of Islamic radicalism will probably develop. The first we may call “franchising.” Local groups based on local solidarities—most likely those of neighborhood, extended family, and university—with few or no ties to al Qaeda, will assume the label and act according to what they see as al Qaeda’s ideology and strategy. The second will be a quest for allies and support beyond the pale of Islamic fundamentalism. Radicals may try to find allies and fellow travelers at the expense of the purity of their ideological message. They could find it among the European ultra-Left or, less probably, the ultra-Right. They could find allies among other “liberation” movements (for instance, ex-Ba’athis in Iraq). Some might even serve as proxies or “gun-holders” for rogue states.

 Counterterrorism in Europe

Whatever the differences among the European countries, including their appraisal of U.S. policy, EU members share many elements in common.

First, all European governments are reluctant to drastically alter their legal systems and basic political approaches to terrorism. The reason is that the issue of homeland security was raised and essentially settled a long time ago due to a more “indigenous” terrorism (ETA, IRA, Baader-Meinhof, Action Directe, Brigadi Rossi, and so on). In this sense, the Europeans have a more seasoned and experienced counterterrorism homeland apparatus than do the Americans. In countries where the “Islamic” threat had been identified at least a decade ago (as in France), the security apparatus is rather efficient. The recent crisis has engendered greater cooperation among the different countries, as well as with the United States, in most cases. But this cooperation has not led to the importation of political differences among governments into the security function, partly because procedures are institutionalized and partly because this is not a new concern. This has remained much the case even after the March 2004 train bombings in Madrid.

Second, as far as European countries are concerned, the fight against terrorism is a matter of police and intelligence, not military action. These tools are efficient to the extent that transnational cooperation works. In this sense, the new terrorist threat has accelerated a trend already in existence.

The growing isolation of Islamic radicals in Europe should allow the Europeans to continue with this “soft” approach: police and intelligence services are efficient and will probably be sufficient tools of counterterrorism for Europe. However, such a policy will never totally eradicate terrorism. The European tradition of terrorism and political violence that has forged the experience of the counterterrorist institutions makes it easier for young activists to become violent. Put a little differently, the stigma attached to doing such violent things is relatively weaker. Young guys who want to become radical and seek out some sort of spectacular action to validate their confused and injured manhood will not be stopped by this soft approach. Even concentrating on root causes—on the sociology and motivations of the radicals—while important for understanding the radicals’ mode of recruitment, will be of little use in drying up the ground on which these radicals prosper. The aim of European policy is not eradication; it is making terrorism a residual factor that can be lived with.

Such a “soft” approach is sustainable in Europe only under one condition: that Islamic radicalism remains a fringe movement. The real danger is in Islamic radicalism enlarging its social base or connecting with other potentially radical movements or governments. The challenge is not to go at the roots of terrorism, as European government spokespeople never tire of saying, for that is well-nigh impossible and will not eradicate terrorism in any case. The challenge is to prevent the radical fringe from finding a broad political base among the local Muslim population.

To regain their momentum and create that base, Euro-Islamic radicals will have to achieve two strategic goals: mobilize other Muslims and link up with non-Muslim radicals.

Eventually, Euro-Islamic leaders will try to mobilize a sufficient part of the Muslim community to provide shelter, logistics, recruits, reliable communications, and so on. To do that, the activists will have to change their patterns of recruitment, which are currently based on spotting some individuals and taking them out of their social milieu. They will have to engage in a more collective dawa (“proselytizing”), which would put them on the same path as many nonpolitical conservative and even fundamentalist organizations (like the Tabligh or the Salafis). Interestingly enough, many radical groups (like the London-based Hizb ul-Tahrir) share the views of al Qaeda but think the latter has been premature to launch jihad. They believe that one should first mobilize the Muslim community through intensive proselytizing and political activity.

Eventually, too, Islamist leaders will probably try to establish some sort of joint venture with the remnants of the European extreme Left who share the same hatred for “imperialism.” Converts may play a particularly significant role here. Let us not forget that Carlos the Jackal himself converted to Islam in jail and is now praising Osama bin Laden to the hilt.

 Pushing for a “Western” Islam

The key issue is thus the attitude of the Muslim population in Europe toward radicalism and terrorism. And for three main reasons, the Muslim population in Europe is a far larger political stake, and plays a far greater political role, than the Muslim population in the United States.

First, unlike the United States, Muslim migrants are the main source of immigration in Europe. Second, that migration originates from the close neighboring southern countries. Legal immigration to the United States is far more diverse in its origins. Third, that migration has created the bulk of the underclass and jobless youth. (In the United States, migrants want to find, and generally do find, jobs that make them quickly upwardly mobile.)

The social, geographic, political, and strategic implications of Muslim immigration to Europe are intertwined. In that light, European countries should pursue a double objective: isolate the Islamic radicals with the support of their own Muslim population, and seek out at least the neutrality of the nonviolent conservative fundamentalists among them. Two different approaches have been in competition in Europe in this regard. The multiculturalist approach, tried mainly in Great Britain, treats Muslims as a minority group that should be addressed collectively and that should possibly benefit from a specific status. The integrationist approach, which describes that of France, seeks to grant full citizenship to Muslims as individuals but not to consider them as a separate community under any ethnic, cultural, or religious paradigm.

Neither approach seems to be working all that well. The multicultural approach tends to create ghettos. In Great Britain, the Dobson Report (2001) advised the government to stop pushing in this direction and to adapt a more integrative approach. The integrationist approach, however, ignores the quest for a new identity among uprooted Muslims. In France, amid an ongoing debate, the government has decided to establish an official representation of Muslims as a faith group, but not as a cultural or ethnic minority.

However awkwardly, a common approach is slowly emerging in Europe—dealing with the Muslim population in purely religious terms. Encouraging the emergence of a European Islam will help integrate the Muslims, weaken links with foreign countries, and provide a Western-compatible religious identity. The problem thus far is that some governments (like that of France), as well as the bulk of public opinion, equate European Islam with “liberal” Islam. Calling on the Muslims to adapt the basic tenets of Islam to the Western concept of a religion is a mistake.

For example, to officially sponsor “good and liberal” Muslims would be a sort of kiss of death. It would deprive such liberal organizations and leaders of any legitimacy. Besides, the main motivation for youth radicalization is not theological, because youth is not interested in a theological debate. Instead, political radicalization is the main driving force. Moreover, modern secular states should not regulate theology as a matter of policy.

Is there a better approach? Yes. Genuine pluralism is the best way to avoid confrontation with a tight-knit Muslim community. Conservative and even fundamentalist views of religion are manageable in a plural environment, as shown by a host of Protestant, Catholic, and Jewish cases. A pluralistic approach allows civil society to reach the cadres of youth who could be ideal targets for radicals and neofundamentalist groups.

State policy should be based on integration and even “notabilization” of Muslims and community leaders on a pluralistic basis. The priority should be to weaken the links with foreign elements by pushing for the “nativization” of Islam and for preventing the deepening of the ghetto syndrome. Transparency should be the aim.

If that general proposition is accepted, then certain proposals seem to follow logically. First, there should be much tighter control on fund-raising and subsidizing from abroad, which also means better access to open domestic fund-raising and subsidies (for building mosques, for example). Second, governments should establish more links between Islamic religious teaching institutions and the university and academe. Third, religious representation should be encouraged without monopoly. Fourth, mainstream political parties should court and enlist Muslim leaders. Fifth, social policy must avoid confronting Muslims with black-and-white choices. It must, instead, work to let Muslim youth experience a diversity of opinions in line with the spectrum of political diversity in the West.

In this sense, the debate on the issue of supporting or not supporting the U.S. military campaign in Iraq has had a positive impact. In Great Britain, as well in France and elsewhere in Europe, Muslims did not feel isolated or targeted; rather, they felt as though they belonged to mainstream public opinion. In this sense at least, in the European context, the debate between so-called old and new Europe has superseded the debate on the “clash of civilizations.”

Such a policy of encouraging pluralism will meet the aspirations of mainstream Muslims in Europe—Islam recognized as a Western religion, Muslims as full citizens—while avoiding the creation of a closed community, ghettos, and minority status. This policy will contribute to the isolation of the terrorists and prevent them from building a dangerous political constituency. Approaches that by design or error drive Muslim communities inward and into themselves will backfire, to the regret of all concerned.

[36] Hard evidence and data remain elusive; see Desmond Butler and Don Van Natta, Jr., “Trail of Anti-U.S. Fighters Said to Cross Europe to Iraq,” New York Times, December 6, 2003.

 8. Saudi Arabia and the War on Terrorism

F. Gregory Gause III

The starting point for an effective approach toward Saudi Arabia in the war on terrorism is an accurate diagnosis of just what role the country has played in the growth of al Qaeda and Sunni Muslim extremism. Exaggeration of that role has become so common in the United States that it threatens to destroy a relationship that, though troubled, is essential to American national interests in the Middle East, in the fight against terrorism, and in the world oil market.

The next step is a realistic policy prescription that deals with the problems emanating from Saudi Arabia. The policy prescription must emphasize those areas where tangible progress can be made and must avoid, to the greatest extent possible, unintended consequences that would damage American interests.

 Diagnosis

An accurate understanding of Wahhabism is the crucial first step in diagnosing the Saudi role in the global war on terrorism. This is not simply a semantic issue or an arcane exegesis of Islamic texts. Many in the United States contend that Wahhabism is itself the root of Sunni Muslim violence and terrorism.[37] In their appendix to the Congressional Joint Committee report on the September 11 attacks, Senators Jon Kyl and Pat Roberts refer to Wahhabism as “a radical, anti-American variant of Islam.”[38] Senators Kyl and Charles Schumer later wrote that Wahhabism “seeks our society’s destruction.”[39]

If this were true, then we would have no choice but to treat Saudi Arabia as we treated the Taliban regime in Afghanistan, because Saudi Arabia is certainly a Wahhabi state. However, these views misunderstand both Wahhabism itself and its centrality in the growth of violent Sunni Muslim extremist groups.

The puritanical version of Islam preached by Muhammad ibn Abd al-Wahhab in central Arabia in the eighteenth century, which served as the animating ideology for the Al-Saud family’s efforts to build a state in Arabia, is not very attractive to most outside observers. It is literalist in its desire to replicate the milieu of the Prophet Muhammad in every possible way. It is extremely intolerant of other interpretations of Islam, particularly Shiism. It is wary and suspicious of non-Muslims. Its views on the role of women in society run counter to international norms, to say the least. It is also hostile to the canons of modern science with some Saudi clerics holding, to this day, that the world is flat and at the center of the solar system.

But none of this is new. Wahhabism has been the official interpretation of Islam in the Saudi domain since the founding of the modern state at the outset of the twentieth century. It has not been a barrier to a very close Saudi-American relationship over the past decades. The phenomenon of anti-American terror in the Sunni Muslim community is much more recent. If this terror were grounded solely in Wahhabism, it should have manifested itself much earlier and should have prevented the historically close Saudi-American relationship.

Wahhabism, as it has developed in Saudi Arabia, is a state ideology, not a revolutionary creed. As retrograde as it might be on social issues, Wahhabism’s official arbiters counsel loyalty to the ruler, not revolution. They accord the ruler wide latitude to conduct foreign affairs. Leading Wahhabi scholars and clerics, for example, publicly gave their seal of approval to both the invitation of American forces to Saudi Arabia in 1990 and the use of Saudi Arabia as a base for the 1991 attack on Iraq. They have vehemently rejected the bin Ladenist logic of violence, condemning the attacks of September 11, the bombings in Riyadh in May and November 2003, and the surge of terrorist violence thereafter. Even Wahhabi clerics deeply critical of American policy in the Middle East and of the Saudi-American relationship have spoken out against bin Laden and the violence that he and his followers have perpetrated.[40]

One reason that many have equated “bin Ladenism” with Wahhabism is that bin Laden himself claims to follow the “true” Wahhabi line. He calls for the overthrow of the Saudi regime and condemns the official clerics for deviating from that line. But allowing bin Laden to define Wahhabism is like allowing the militia movement in the United States to define what it means to be a patriotic American. We should not be taken in by such claims.

Violent anti-American Sunni extremism, personified by bin Laden, is the product of a much more contemporary and complicated set of ideological trends and political experiences. Wahhabism is a part of that mix, but only a part. The crucible of the development of bin Ladenism was the jihad against the Soviet Union in Afghanistan in the 1980s. Among the Arab volunteers there, the retrograde social views and theological intolerance of Saudi Wahhabism came to be blended with the revolutionary political doctrines developed in the 1960s by Muslim Brotherhood thinkers, particularly in Egypt. It is no accident that bin Laden’s chief lieutenant in al Qaeda is an Egyptian, Ayman al-Zawahiri, who was prominent in the violent fringes of Egyptian Islamist movements of the 1970s and 1980s. This ideological mélange was filtered through the jihad’s success, which was taken as no less than a divine sanction for the political message that developed out of it. Imbued with this confidence, the “Arab Afghans” returned to continue the jihad against their “insufficiently Muslim” governments in Algeria, Egypt, Jordan, and, to a lesser extent, Saudi Arabia. It is only with their failure to remake the politics of the region that, in the mid-1990s, bin Laden began to focus his jihad explicitly against the United States.

Meanwhile, the success in Afghanistan brought a new luster to the concept of jihad in Saudi Arabia (and many other Muslim countries). The Saudi government had encouraged public support for the Afghan jihad (as had the American government). Jihad became a more prominent part of many Saudis' understanding of Islam. Muslims were also "oppressed," as Saudis saw it, by non-Muslims in places like Bosnia, Kashmir, Chechnya, and the West Bank and Gaza. If jihad worked in Afghanistan to free a Muslim population from non-Muslim rule, why should it not work in these other places?

Some of these causes received more official support in Saudi Arabia than others. Bosnian and Palestinian Muslims received much largesse. Saudi diplomatic relations with Russia and India, however, put limits on official support for the Chechen and Kashmiri jihads. But it is undeniable that the Saudi government not only did not oppose the developing jihadist subculture in the country but in some ways encouraged it.

Here is the true intersection in the 1990s between the bin Ladenist movement and Saudi Arabia. Bin Laden himself had been expelled from the country and stripped of his citizenship in 1994. His movement in the country seemed to be rolled up in the mid-1990s, after large-scale arrests. But al Qaeda was active in these other jihadi movements and, in time, was able to make common cause with, or take over, Saudi-funded organizations active in these causes.[41]

It is this intersection that highlights the most important role of Saudi Arabia in the spread of Sunni Islamist extremism. Saudi funding sources, developed during the Afghan jihad and maintained through the 1990s, either wittingly or unwittingly came to support al Qaeda and groups like it. The new prominence of jihad in Saudi Arabia came to be transmitted through Saudi-supported Islamic international organizations (like the Islamic Conference Organization) and nongovernmental organizations (like the World Muslim League and the World Assembly of Muslim Youth) to the rest of the Muslim world. The spread of the jihadist subculture clearly facilitated al Qaeda recruitment and created an atmosphere in which sympathy for al Qaeda could grow. Saudi recruitment channels for jihadis at home, developed in the 1980s to send young Saudis to Afghanistan and continuing in the 1990s to other areas, came to be exploited by al Qaeda to recruit Saudis directly into the organization.

Funding, ideological legitimation, and recruitment are the areas where Saudi Arabia played a key role in developing Sunni Muslim extremism. But that is a far cry from claiming that the Saudi government itself, directly and wittingly, boosted bin Laden and his views. It is even a farther cry from the theories that the Al-Saud were behind September 11, theories on a par with those holding the CIA or the Israeli Mossad responsible for those atrocities. The reality is challenge enough; no good purpose is served by marketing error and delusion.

 Prescription

Funding, ideological legitimation, and recruitment are precisely the areas that American foreign policy should target in its policy toward Saudi Arabia in the war on terrorism. In all of these areas, the United States is today dealing with a Saudi government that is usually, though not always, willing to cooperate. The level of cooperation has varied, in part because not all elements of the Saudi regime have been equally committed to that cooperation.

A number of factors contribute to that reluctance, including tensions over the direction of American Middle East policy in general and very clear differences between the two countries regarding the definition of terrorism as it relates to the Arab-Israeli conflict. However, the key to Saudi reluctance is the domestic political costs of confronting a movement that had considerable sympathy within Saudi Arabia for many of its goals if not its tactics. Being against Islam is not a winning position in Saudi politics. The fact that any cooperation with the United States would be seen by many as bowing to American pressure, when (from the late 1990s) the United States has been profoundly unpopular in Saudi Arabia, has furnished further disincentive.

However, the attacks on the United States on September 11, 2001, and on the housing compounds in Riyadh on May 12 and November 9, 2003, led to new levels of seriousness on the part of the Saudi authorities in addressing the problem of Sunni extremism that they had, however unwittingly, helped to create. These events brought home to the Saudi leadership, more quickly to some than to others, the threat posed by Sunni Muslim extremism to the domestic stability of their own regime.

On the funding issue, American pressure and the Saudi realization of the seriousness of the threat have led to important steps by Riyadh to exercise more control over Saudi-supported charities and to monitor financial transactions from the kingdom. During 2002, the Saudi government took several steps in this direction, including requiring Foreign Ministry approval of any charitable project undertaken outside the country, ordering audits of Saudi charities, and establishing new oversight bodies in the government to monitor charities.[42] After the May 2003 bombings Riyadh moved to close ten of the foreign offices of the al-Haramain Foundation, frequently cited as a conduit of funds for extremist groups, after earlier closing the foundation's offices in Bosnia and Somalia.[43]

The task for American foreign policy is to hold the Saudi government's feet to the fire on this issue, pushing it to follow up on its own declared policy. The Bush administration has been doing so, dispatching in August 2003 a team of senior counterterrorist officials to press the Saudis.[44] Just a few weeks later, the Saudi cabinet adopted new regulations against money laundering, and the Saudi government allowed the IRS and FBI to establish a permanent liaison office in Riyadh to coordinate with Saudi counterparts.[45] A practical step in this direction would be to press the Saudis to actually create the Saudi Higher Authority for Relief and Charity Work, a step that had been announced but not implemented, to serve as the oversight body for all charitable organizations and associations offering services outside the country.[46]

In December 2003, Saudi sources at the embassy in Washington revealed that the Saudi government intends to stop providing diplomatic status for Islamic clerics and educators preaching and teaching overseas. These sources also claimed an intent to "shut down the Islamic affairs section in every embassy."[47] If this actually occurs, it will be a significant step and a major signal of change in Saudi policy.

While many in Washington remain skeptical of the Saudi commitment in this area, some appear to have become too complacent. It still makes sense to pressure Riyadh to demonstrate its good intentions rather than to assume they either will or will not follow through on recent initiatives. If further cooperation is not forthcoming, the United States should not hesitate to "name and shame" Saudi individuals and organizations involved in the deliberate financing of al Qaeda and affiliate groups.

One area of particular sensitivity in the issue of funding is Saudi support, official and private, for Hamas, the Palestinian Islamist group officially designated as a terrorist organization by the United States. There is no question that Saudi money goes to Hamas organizations and projects.[48] Pushing the Saudis to end as much of that support as they can would be valuable, but the negative consequences of making the Hamas issue a very high-profile public part of Saudi-American relations are considerable. In terms of Saudi public opinion, equating al Qaeda and Hamas does not delegitimate the latter; it legitimates the former. Better for Washington to separate the al Qaeda issue from the Hamas issue by pushing publicly and privately for absolute cooperation on the former and keeping the latter in the realm of private diplomacy, at least while al Qaeda remains America's foremost priority.

On legitimation, Washington has a less public role to play than on funding. The U.S. government will not be successful in telling Muslims what Islam is, and it should not try to do so. Here, the key is to press the Saudis to use their considerable ideological resources, both at home and in the Muslim world in general, to place bin Laden, his actions, and his interpretation of Islam outside the pale of acceptable Muslim discourse. This requires the Saudis to confront head-on the jihadist subculture that they indirectly nurtured during the past two decades.

As in the funding area, the Saudis have recently demonstrated a willingness to take on this task. In late May 2003, after the bombings in Riyadh, the Saudi Ministry of Islamic Affairs announced the removal of 353 religious officials from their positions (because they lacked the "qualifications" to work in mosques) and the requirement that 1,357 religious officials undergo further training.[49] Immediately after September 11, leading Saudi religious officials condemned the attacks and, since then, have consistently and publicly rejected bin Laden's interpretation of jihad. A recent example was the statement of the Higher Council of Ulama in August 2003, reaffirming that violent attacks on innocents "are criminal acts … not jihad in the path of God." The council called on the Saudi authorities to bring before the courts any scholar who issues a fatwa ("religious judgment") approving of such acts.[50] Continuing efforts by the Saudis in this direction, not only at home but also through the Islamic intergovernmental and nongovernmental organizations that they fund, are essential.

On recruitment, the Saudis need to police much more stringently the networks of al Qaeda members and sympathizers that have developed within the kingdom itself. For too long, even after September 11, Riyadh refused to face up to this issue. Just days before the May 2003 bombing, the country's chief security official, Interior Minister Prince Na'if, termed the al Qaeda presence in the country as "weak and almost nonexistent."[51] Since the bombing, Saudi security forces have been much more aggressive in efforts to root out al Qaeda. In the aftermath of the May and November 2003 bombings, more than six hundred Saudis were arrested. There have been a number of shootouts between Saudi police and suspected al Qaeda sympathizers, with tens killed on each side, and Saudi security services have discovered a number of substantial arms caches.[52] The United States should urge the Saudis to make a special effort to prevent infiltration by al Qaeda sympathizers and other Islamist militants across the long and largely unguarded Saudi-Iraqi border.

The Saudis could do more on all of these issues, and the United States should monitor Saudi government actions carefully. There is also the larger issue, beyond the scope of this essay, of the consequences of Wahhabi proselytizing in the Muslim world. Even if the official Saudi interpretation of Islam is not, in and of itself, the wellspring of anti-American terror, its retrograde views on social tolerance, gender issues, and democracy place it at variance with American goals throughout the Muslim world, including in the United States itself. Helping other Muslim countries promote more tolerant and inclusive interpretations of Islam should be part of the American foreign policy agenda, to the extent that Washington can help on these issues. But on the specific issue of anti-American terrorism, there is a clear willingness, more pronounced since the May 2003 bombings, on the part of the Saudi government to cooperate with Washington. That is a basis upon which to build.

 Do No Harm

The United States should avoid superficially appealing policies toward Saudi Arabia that will redound to our disadvantage. In particular, Washington should suppress its natural tendency to believe that more democracy will make things better in foreign countries.

Democratic elections in Saudi Arabia would reflect the very strong anti-Americanism now prevalent in the country. A Gallup poll, conducted in late January-early February 2002, reported that 64 percent of Saudi respondents viewed the United States either very unfavorably or most unfavorably. Majorities in the poll associated America with the adjectives “conceited, ruthless and arrogant.” Fewer than 10 percent saw the United States as either friendly or trustworthy.[53] A Zogby International poll, conducted in March 2002, reported similar results. Only 30 percent of the Saudis polled supported American-led efforts to fight terrorism, while 57 percent opposed them.[54] A subsequent Zogby poll, conducted in July 2003, found that 70 percent of the Saudis polled had an unfavorable impression of the United States, with only 24 percent having a favorable impression.[55] An elected Saudi legislature, for example, would put pressure on the Saudi government to cooperate less, not more, with the United States in the war on terrorism and on general Middle East issues.

Saudi anti-Americanism is not an immutable fact. It reflects the tensions in the relationship since September 11, the negative reactions to American attacks on Afghanistan and Iraq, and the collapse of the Arab-Israeli peace process. But it can change with time, as regional realities change. However, a push for democracy in Saudi Arabia now would not serve American interests. President Bush cannot take back what he said at the National Endowment for Democracy on November 6, 2003, but he can selectively implement his vision. And he should. Cautious steps from the Saudis themselves to broaden the scope of political participation in their society, such as the October 2003 announcement of plans for municipal elections to fill half the seats of the proposed municipal councils, should be welcomed. Washington should not push for countrywide elections to national institutions, such as the Consultative Council (an appointed body).

The United States must also avoid the temptation to simply throw up its hands and declare the Saudis an enemy. This impulse is based on a faulty reading of the role of Wahhabism and Saudi Arabia in the development of Sunni Islamist extremism, as discussed earlier. Beyond that, the temptation seems to be an emotionally satisfying thought for many who see Wahhabism, the monarchy, the treatment of women, the Saudi stance on Arab-Israeli issues, and various other elements of Saudi society and governance as so antithetical to American principles that our country should have no truck with the House of Saud. As in so many things in life, however, what temporarily satisfies our emotional needs would not be good for us in the long run.

Those who urge such a policy fail the basic test of practical politics: They offer no alternative to the Saudi-American relationship.[56] They are extremely fuzzy on what Washington should do the day after it declares Saudi Arabia an enemy. Military invasion and occupation of the oil fields? Given how difficult and expensive U.S. occupation of Iraq has become, this cannot be a serious option. Those who advocate “regime change” in Riyadh, through greater democracy or direct U.S. action, can offer no assurances that a new regime would be any friendlier to the United States, harder on Islamist extremists, or more in tune with global human rights norms than the incumbents.

The plain fact is that not only do the rulers of Riyadh sit on 25 percent of all the world’s known conventional oil reserves, but they also control the Muslim holy cities of Mecca and Medina, the focal point of faith for 1.4 billion Muslims in the world. Surely having a government there that, despite its problems, responds to American pressures on oil questions and the war on terrorism is better for American interests than the leap into the dark that military occupation or regime change would represent. Looking around the region, it is better than several other easily imaginable alternatives as well.

[37] The first and most influential post-September 11 book to make this claim is Stephen Schwartz, The Two Faces of Islam: The House of Sa’ud from Tradition to Terror (New York: Doubleday, 2002).

[38] “Additional Views—Senator Jon Kyl, Senator Pat Roberts,” http://news.findlaw.com/hdocs/docs/911rpt/addviewsmem.pdf, p. 20.

[39] Jon Kyl and Charles Schumer, “Saudi Arabia’s Teachers of Terror,” Washington Post, August 18, 2003.

[40] See F. Gregory Gause III, “Be Careful What You Wish For: The Future of U.S.-Saudi Relations,” World Policy Journal 49, no. 1 (Spring 2002).

[41] There are persistent charges that members of the Saudi ruling family either directly or indirectly cut a deal with bin Laden, at minimum promising not to impede his fund-raising and recruiting in Saudi Arabia, perhaps even supporting him financially, in exchange for al Qaeda refraining from targeting Saudi Arabia. The major published source to raise this charge is Gerald Posner, Why America Slept: The Failure to Prevent 9/11 (New York: Random House, 2003). Nothing in the public record supports this charge. The car bomb attack on the American training mission to the Saudi National Guard in Riyadh in November 1995, which killed seven and wounded sixty, was perpetrated by Saudis who, before their execution, publicly identified bin Laden as their inspiration. However, it is impossible to disprove the charge as well. In the past, Saudi leaders have attempted to buy off foreign opponents, and the ruling family is large enough that it is possible that some prince or group of princes took it upon themselves to explore this option. The most that can be said with certainty is that, if there ever were such an agreement, it did not work very well for the Al-Saud.

[42] Al-Hayat, March 21, 2002, 1, 6; John Mintz, “Saudis Deny Dragging Feet on Terrorism,” Washington Post, December 4, 2002.

[43] John Mintz, “Wahhabi Strain of Islam Faulted,” Washington Post, June 27, 2003.

[44] Susan Schmidt, “U.S. Officials Press Saudis on Aiding Terror,” Washington Post, August 6, 2003.

[45] “Cabinet OK’s anti-money laundering legislation,” Arab News, August 19, 2003; “U.S. and Saudis Join in Anti-Terror Effort,” New York Times, August 26, 2003.

[46] As of late May 2003, the body had yet to be established, according to the Saudi response to questions posed by the Counter-Terrorism Committee of the UN Security Council. The reference to the body is on page 11 of the response, Counter-Terrorism Committee document S/2003/583.

[47] See Susan Schmidt and Caryle Murphy, “U.S. Revokes Visa of Cleric at Saudi Embassy,” Washington Post, December 7, 2003.

[48] Adil al-Jubeir, foreign affairs adviser to Crown Prince Abdallah, has admitted as much. David R. Sands, “Kingdom Moves Against Terrorism,” Washington Times, June 13, 2003. See also Matthew Levitt, “Who Pays for Palestinian Terror?” The Weekly Standard, August 25, 2003.

[49] Al-Hayat, May 28, 2003, 1, 6.

[50] Al-Hayat, August 17, 2003, 1, 6.

[51] Glenn Kessler and Alan Sipress, “Western Targets Bombed in Riyadh,” Washington Post, May 13, 2003.

[52] Neil MacFarquhar, “Al Qaeda Blamed in Deadly Attack on Saudi Homes,” New York Times, November 10, 2003.

[53] Richard Burkholder, “The U.S. and the West—Through Saudi Eyes,” Gallup Tuesday Briefing, August 6, 2002.

[54] “The 10 Nation ‘Impressions of America’ Poll Report,” Zogby International, August 7, 2002.

[55] www.zogby.com/news/ReadNews.dbm?ID=725.

[56] Argued in Adam Garfinkle, “Weak Realpolitik: The Vicissitudes of Saudi Bashing,” The National Interest, no. 67 (Spring 2002).

 9. With Allies Like This: Pakistan and the War on Terrorism

Stephen Philip Cohen

During his 1999–2000 presidential campaign, George W. Bush could not name the leader of Pakistan. In June 2003, President (and army chief) Pervez Musharraf spent a high-profile day at Camp David, where a multiyear $3 billion American aid package was announced. We learn from this little anecdote that the September 11 attacks on the United States have propelled Pakistan into the limelight of U.S. national security concerns. There it remains today, labeled a “frontline ally” in the war on terrorism.[57]

To some extent, this recent contretemps repeats an old pattern of alliance and estrangement that has characterized U.S.-Pakistan relations since the early 1950s.[58] Pakistan was, in turn, an instrument of American policy in containing the Soviets and then the Chinese and then in removing the Soviets from Afghanistan. However, this time there is a difference: Pakistan is a critical ally, but it is also a potential source of terrorism, as well as a declared nuclear weapons state. Some have pointed to Pakistan's growing social extremism, its use of terror as an instrument of state policy in Kashmir, its continuing meddling in Afghanistan, and evidence of leakage of Pakistani nuclear technology to Iran, North Korea, and perhaps other states. If Pakistan is an ally as far as Afghanistan is concerned, it has not behaved like a friend of the United States in many other respects.

A closer look at Pakistan reveals that radical groups do not enjoy widespread support in the country. Despite recent electoral trends, most middle-class and urban Pakistanis do not subscribe to the radical agenda. They believe Pakistan should be a modern but Islamic state—with "Islamic" being confined to a few spheres of public life.

Nonetheless, Pakistan today finds itself at a critical juncture. Radical Islam has found a home in Pakistan, and the danger of the spread of extremism, though by no means imminent, is greater than it was a decade ago. Pakistan is also one of the world's most anti-American countries, which makes Americans especially vulnerable there.[59] If its radicalism is left unchecked, Pakistan could indeed evolve into a nuclear-armed terrorist state. Washington must seize the opportunity presented by its current alliance to help move Pakistan in the direction of moderation and stability.

To do this requires a policy of engagement on two parallel tracks. The first is short-term and "curative," ensuring that Pakistan's present terrorist groups are checked by better police, army, and intelligence operations and addressing the specific causes that motivate their acts. The second policy track is "preventive," a long-term engagement to revitalize Pakistan's enfeebled civilian and social institutions. This second track is a daunting but essential task.

 Typologies of Terrorism

Terrorism in Pakistan has several dimensions. Three distinct types can be distinguished.

Type I concerns terrorism in Afghanistan and is the focus of the new American relationship with Pakistan, which derives primarily from the latter's importance in combating al Qaeda and the Taliban. Pakistan has been cooperative in rounding up al Qaeda cadres but much less obliging about the Taliban, which receives significant support from Pakistani Pashtuns and some of Pakistan's Islamist parties. In all, about five hundred al Qaeda members have been captured by the Pakistanis and turned over to the United States.

Type II terrorism is Pakistan's direct and indirect support for Kashmir-related groups that have attacked Indian forces and innocent civilians. A few such groups seem to be intent on precipitating a war between Delhi and Islamabad and oppose the latter government because it abandoned the Taliban and reversed course on Afghanistan.[60]

Type III terrorism in Pakistan refers to the domestic dimension. Many of Pakistan's terrorists are sectarian, and some have links to one or another group operating in Kashmir/India and Afghanistan. A number of these groups have links to various Pakistani political parties, Islamabad's intelligence services, or the army. In the past, the state had used some of these groups for domestic purposes.[61]

Pakistanis do not necessarily perceive terrorism in one location in the same way as they perceive it in another location. Although sectarian violence is stigmatized, the use of terrorism in Kashmir is widely seen as a legitimate last resort in the Kashmiri "freedom struggle"—although this struggle is never called terrorism. This difference in view complicates any strategy to deal with one kind of terrorism, for the types overlap in practice. In addition, some groups are involved in more than one kind of terrorism.

 The Curative Track

An American policy designed to curb existing terrorism in Pakistan should deal with all three types. But America should take care not to get preoccupied with Type I terrorism while ignoring the other two. Along the curative track, three policies recommend themselves.

First, there should be continued support to improve the professionalism of Pakistan’s police forces, which are notorious for their abuse of power. The police are viewed by most citizens as predators, not protectors, and support for terrorist groups is often a by-product of alienation from the Pakistani state. For its part, the Pakistani government should ensure that the police receive salaries and support commensurate with their grave responsibilities; in the long run, this expenditure is more important for the security and stability of Pakistan than money spent on advanced weapons and military hardware.

Second, because the Pakistani army remains politically important, Washington should link the quantity and quality of military assistance to Pakistan to good performance in countering all three kinds of terrorist groups. The effort should begin, obviously, with the first category but should eventually include the second and third, as well. Many steps have been discussed between American and Pakistani officials in this regard, including exerting greater control over the madrassas, providing closer surveillance of suspect groups, shutting down terrorist training camps, improving surveillance along the Line of Control in Kashmir, and countering extremist propaganda. If Pakistan demonstrates vigor and competence in such matters, military aid and cooperation from the United States should be increased.

Finally, the United States should address the two major foreign policy issues that are the focus of some Pakistani terrorists and that give them broader legitimacy. Pakistan’s movement against terrorists operating in Kashmir will have to be linked to progress in a peace process with India. Absent such progress, Pakistan will not unilaterally strip itself of a vital, if provocative and risky, policy instrument. The United States must notch up its engagement in the region and promote a peace process between the two countries, even if this process is disguised as “facilitation.”[62] American support for a peace process, which has as a major component the well-being of the Kashmiri people, will blunt one of the “causes” of radical Islamists. Such a process will meet with strong resistance from the radical Pakistanis and may well include violence and terrorism designed to disrupt it. However, engagement is essential, not only for long-term U.S. interests but also for the stability of the Pakistani state.

Similarly, any comprehensive policy toward Pakistan must address Pakistan’s relationship with Afghanistan. The two states have a long and complex relationship that took an astonishing turn when American forces removed the Taliban government with Pakistan’s help. Despite recent events, there remains sympathy for the Taliban and al Qaeda among the Pakistani Pashtuns. Radical Islamic groups in Pakistan’s North-West Frontier Province are especially attuned to developments in Afghanistan. A continuing U.S. presence next door, without any tangible positive results for the Afghan people, will further intensify grievances in Pakistan.

The best American policy is one of prevention: ensuring that Afghanistan does not collapse into chaos and that Pakistan remains supportive of the Hamid Karzai regime. The United States needs to advance the effective neutralization of Afghanistan in the region as it helps Afghans to rebuild the country from within. Clearly, Afghanistan needs substantial and long-term outside assistance to help manage its own security. Washington should actively support the process, with the knowledge that the greatest danger of an Afghan collapse might be the radicalization of large parts of Pakistan.

To summarize, nothing will happen if America merely demands an end to Pakistani support for terrorist groups. The United States must also offer positive inducements in the form of additional aid to Pakistan, political support for a dialogue with India, and assurance of a friendly and stable Afghanistan.

All this is absolutely necessary, but not sufficient. Washington must also move beyond short-term cures to address the deeper causes of radicalism and terrorism in Pakistan. That brings us to the preventive track.

 The Preventive Track

The second policy track the United States needs to follow in Pakistan should focus on the mushrooming growth of extremism from which terrorists of several sorts are recruited. Pakistan is not an inherently extremist Islamic country. Despite its having reared some prominent Islamist theorists, it is not like Saudi Arabia, whose form of Salafi Islam is organic to its state formation. Pakistan's radical groups are a mixed lot. Some are criminals trying to wrap themselves in the mantle of divine justice. Some have modest, Pakistan-related objectives. Some are seized with sectarian hatred. A few are internationalist apocalyptical terrorists in tune with the al Qaeda philosophy.

The rise of all radical groups to prominence, however, can in large part be attributed to the patronage they have received from the Pakistan army. Over the years, the army has used these groups as instruments of domestic as well as foreign policy. But although the Pakistani state must bear responsibility for its cultivation of some of these terrorist groups, other problems now overwhelm the question of origins. There is currently increasing frustration with the lack of economic opportunities, the rise in crime and violence (especially against women) and a growing pool of unemployed college students and graduates who are potential supporters of terrorism. Pakistan's adverse educational and demographic trends, its enfeebled institutions, and its stagnant economy will eventually produce a situation where even the army cannot stem the growth of radical Islamism, and might even be captured by it.

To avert such a scenario, Washington must provide support to revitalize Pakistan's core institutions. Pakistan's economy requires an overhaul, its educational system must be reconstructed, and, above all, as political and administrative institutions gain strength, the army must curb its meddling in political affairs. Let us look at these three areas in turn.

* The Economy

Since the 1999 coup, international assistance, close monitoring of expenditures, and consistent policies have produced a modest economic recovery in Pakistan. The country has moved away from default, but it still has a large international debt, and both unemployment and underemployment remain high.[63] America should continue to support the economy with macro-level assistance. Continued (and even expanded) economic aid, however, should be linked to several key policy changes.

One such change is that the Pakistani people must see tangible evidence that its government's tilt in favor of the United States brings significant benefits to all layers of society and all corners of the country. Most U.S. aid is invisible to the average Pakistani, who cares little about debt relief or balance of payment problems. Without being obtrusive or boasting, the message should be that America is vitally concerned about Pakistan's economic progress and wants to see the economy adapt to a fast-changing world. Specific projects in the arena of high technology, improving indigenous manufacturing, and research and development capabilities would demonstrate that a globally competitive Pakistan is in America's interest.[64] Further, Washington should encourage American companies to invest in Pakistan in areas that are seen to be important for balanced Pakistani growth, not merely the source of fat profits for a few American companies.[65]

Aid accountability is vital. Benchmarks and guidelines should certainly be negotiated with Pakistani authorities, as usual. But once the terms are agreed upon, economic assistance should be closely monitored to ensure that the funds are not funneled into other purposes and that corruption is kept to a minimum. The United States and other donors have every right to link economic assistance with conditions that ensure that the money is being properly utilized.[66] The essential principle that American aid administrators must keep in mind is that aid is not merely a payoff to a regime; its purpose, in this case, is to help that regime make the structural changes that will prevent Pakistan from evolving into a dangerous state.

* Education

Both the American and Pakistani governments are aware of the collapse of Pakistan’s educational system, but they tend to look at different aspects of the problem. Washington has focused on the madrassas, the religious schools that are perceived to be teaching terror and preaching hatred toward the West.[67] Islamabad emphasizes the importance of improving advanced technical education and, thus, has started another scheme to massively train scientists and technicians.

While the United States must continue pressuring Pakistani authorities to revamp the madrassa system, as President Musharraf has promised to do, the agenda should not be confined to this dimension alone. The predominance of the madrassas in Pakistan is a consequence of the massive infusion of foreign, largely Saudi, funds for the conservative madrassas and of the Pakistani state’s failure to provide adequate educational facilities to begin with.[68] If modern educational institutions are not revitalized, the madrassas will continue to thrive. The new U.S. aid package only allocates $21.5 million to primary education and literacy in 2003, about a tenth of the cost of a single F-22 jet, and much of that will be swallowed up in administrative costs.

At the elementary and secondary education levels, more aid should be provided, but it must be conditional upon actual achievement in literacy levels and teacher training. Indeed, the problem of teacher training is so great that Pakistan should be encouraged to bring in foreign teachers, who will not only provide high levels of technical skill but who will also break down the cultural isolation of many Pakistanis.

At the graduate and postgraduate levels, American educational assistance should focus on restoring the many private institutions that once thrived in Pakistan (including some church-related schools) and on restoring Pakistan’s liberal arts, humanities, and social science expertise, which is so necessary for the training of an informed citizenry. The present approach, elevating colleges to the university level, does not address the absence of quality faculty. Where will these instructors come from? A massive increase in the Fulbright program would make sense, as would an emergency training program for Pakistani educational administrators and faculty members. Moreover, Pakistan should follow the lead of Bangladesh and a few other states and send some advanced students to India for technical and nontechnical training.

Perhaps the most important condition that must be put on aid for the educational sector is that the Pakistan government itself should increasingly assume the responsibility for education’s funding and administration. The share of government expenditures on education should increase; if it is cut, Pakistan should pay the price in terms of reduced military and economic aid. [69]

Finally, any educational aid program must calibrate the amount of aid relative to the sector’s absorptive capacity. Dedicational aid programs should begin small and increase only when Pakistan’s capacity has grown. To reiterate, the essential principle to bear in mind is that this aid is not being given for its own sake but to achieve permanent and positive change in Pakistan.

* Democratization

“Democratization” is one of the three benchmarks set forth by President Bush when he announced the 2003 aid package for Pakistan. Washington should encourage the Pakistani army to develop an informal timetable for the restoration of complete democracy and to stick to it. This timetable may last for several years, but now is the time to reshape the civil-military balance in Pakistan toward something resembling normalcy.

Although democracy in Pakistan may be difficult to bring about, the best way for the United States to forestall the rise of radical Islam, to safeguard a modicum of civil liberties, and to preempt separatist movements is to insist, as a condition of aid, that the Pakistani government allow the mainstream political parties (the Pakistan Muslim League and the Pakistan People’s Party) to function freely.[70] The goal should be a spectrum of Islamic and liberal parties that are willing to operate within a parliamentary context and that are tolerant of sectarian and other minorities. As long as the Pakistani establishment does not tolerate groups, parties, and leaders that have practiced and preached violence within Pakistan and across its borders in India and Afghanistan, the United States should not be concerned about the ideological outlook of the parties. Indeed, avowedly Islamic parties that eschew violence are particularly useful in a Pakistani context; they allow for the expression of views whose believers, if excluded from the public realm, might more readily turn to violence and terror.

Finally, Washington must take seriously the fact that Pakistan is an important arena of ideas. Most educated Pakistanis are not ideologically anti-American, but they are angry with the United States for changing the regimes in Afghanistan and Iraq and supporting President Musharraf. There is no one telling America’s side of the story or engaging its critics in the realm of ideas and public discourse. American information programs in the country are practically nonexistent; these programs need to be revived and vastly expanded, and private organizations must be encouraged to increase their exchange and cultural programs, especially with younger Pakistanis, academics, journalists, and opinion leaders. In the long run the greatest challenge to the United States in Pakistan is in the realm of ideas—the field must not be abandoned to Islamic radicals or those who see the United States as an inherently evil state.

 For the Long Haul

Despite its many problems, Pakistan is still one of the freest and most democratic Muslim states, even as it has become an increasingly dangerous one. While the threat from Islamic radicalism in Pakistan is not as high as is perceived by some in the West, the country is poised at a moment where further neglect could accelerate its descent into radicalism, producing a state that threatens regional and global security.

The United States should engage itself with Pakistan over the long haul, not just the short term. It needs to assist Pakistan in curbing the threat from radicalism at home while achieving a more normal relationship with India and Afghanistan. Equally important, the U.S. government should help Pakistan revitalize its enfeebled institutions and provide its population with much-needed opportunities for growth. The goal should not be to merely sustain a Pakistan that poses no threat but to help develop a stable Pakistan that can become a model for the Islamic world and, perhaps, a partner in establishing a more liberal order in parts of the Middle East and elsewhere. The best way to achieve this goal is to pursue a course of sustained engagement with Pakistan's civil side, breaking with the pattern of engagement and estrangement focusing on the military that characterized the past.

A necessary adjunct to such a policy would have global as well as Pakistan-specific components. A streamlining of laws in the United States to deal with terrorist-related detainees is in order. So is a still clearer message to repeatedly emphasize that the U.S. target in the war on terrorism is not Islam or Pakistanis, but solely terrorism.

There is no assurance that curative or preventive policies will succeed. Both would require active cooperation by the Pakistani government, as well as the support of key elites. Even with their support, some sectors of Pakistani society are so badly run down that a well-funded effort could still fail. However, we will only know this if such an attempt is made. What is certain is that without a concerted effort to curb Islamic radicalism in the short term, and to dry up its recruitment base in the long term, the worst predictions about a rogue, nuclear-armed, terrorist-supporting Pakistan are likely to come true.

 Notes

I thank Mr. Moeed Yusuf for his assistance in writing this chapter.

[57] The term “terrorism” is defined differently by many people—we treat it as attacks on unarmed civilians; a perfected definition would term it a hatred that finds an expression in violence, often designed to shock and horrify.

[58] For an outstanding overview of the relationship, see Dennis Kux, The United States and Pakistan, 1947–2000: Disenchanted Allies (Washington, D.C.: Woodrow Wilson Center Press, 2001).

[59] Graham Fuller notes that there is widespread unfavorable opinion of the United States in the Muslim world (53%) with less than half of that (22%) holding a positive view. He states that anti-American perception is the highest in Pakistan, Iran, and Saudi Arabia. Graham E. Fuller, “The Youth Factor: The New Demographics of the Middle East and Implications for U.S. Policy,” Brookings Project on U.S. Policy Towards the Islamic World, Analysis Paper 3, July 2003, 22–25.

[60] These Kashmir-specific groups may have a wider reach. A group was charged in northern Virginia as being part of a Lashkar-e-Toiba cell and accused of plotting attacks on a “friendly country” (i.e. India); at least two of the eight arrested were Pakistani nationals, with others being born in Pakistan. Dawn, June 28, 2003.

[61] Examples of such groups include Jaish-e-Muhammad, Sipah-e-Sahaba Pakistan, and Lashkar-e-Jhangvi Pakistan.

[62] American officials vehemently rejected “facilitation” at one point but now accept it as a legitimate American role. Secretary of State Powell mentioned the matter in a September 5, 2003, speech at George Washington University. The Council on Foreign Relations, in a forthcoming report, will recommend the appointment of a high-level American facilitator based in the White House.

[63] For an assessment of prospects, see “Pakistan Plans $500 Million Return to Bond Market,” Financial Times, June 20, 2003.

[64] For an outstanding review of Pakistan’s economic and governmental problems, see Dr. Akmal Hussain, Pakistan: National Human Development Report, 2003 (Islamabad: UNDP, 2003). For a discussion of American economic policy options, see Ambassador Teresita C. Schaffer, Reviving Pakistan’s Economy: A Report from the CSIS Project (Washington, D.C.: Center for Strategic and International Studies, January 2002).

[65] One group of companies to focus on would be those already invested in South Asia: General Electric, Microsoft, and Boeing already have experience in the region, and their products might help break the region’s trade barriers.

[66] Pakistan has resisted conditionality with the recent aid package. Strong political voices in Pakistan are pushing the government to reject any U.S. aid that comes with strings attached. See “Leghari Asks Govt to Reject US Aid With Strings: Congressmen’s Bias Flayed,” Dawn, July 29, 2003.

[67] There were only 250 madrassas at independence and about 5,000 in the 1980s. This number has now jumped to 45,000, according to some estimates. Those that preach hatred may only constitute 10 to 15 percent of the total—but few offer an education that prepares their graduates for a modern occupation.

[68] For a discussion of the Pakistani madrassas, see P. W. Singer, “Pakistan’s Madrassahs: Ensuring a System of Education, Not Jihad,” Brookings Project on U.S. Policy Towards the Islamic World, Analysis Paper 14, November 2001.

[69] Pakistan is showing signs of improvement in this regard. The latest federal budget (FY04) has increased the allocation for education expenditures to 1.05 percent of total expenditures, from 0.9 percent in FY03.

[70] In the October 2002 elections, the leaders of both mainstream parties were allowed neither to return to Pakistan nor to compete in the elections.

 10. American Muslims as Allies in the War on Terrorism

M. A. Muqtedar Khan

Any and every injury to America is as much an injury to American Muslims as it is to any other American. Therefore, the loss of life and property, as well as the erosion of security as a result of the attacks of September 11, 2001, hurt American Muslims as much as they hurt other Americans. More than two hundred American Muslims lost their lives on that fateful day, and many American Muslims have since suffered from the political and economic consequences of the attacks. American Muslims also suffered when America responded, militarily and otherwise, to September 11.

Today, other Americans view the entire American Muslim community with varying degrees of suspicion. The community's institutions are under siege, the status of its civil rights is in grave jeopardy, and many Muslims are suffering socially as well as professionally from rising anti-Muslim sentiments in America. American Muslims have also seen thousands of their fellow Muslims die in wars, which would not have been waged had America not been attacked.

The point is that when America is attacked, American Muslims suffer, and when America responds, American Muslims suffer again. It follows that American Muslims should be more concerned than anyone about essential American security and that they have a compelling incentive to do all they can to make sure that the international war on terrorism is effective and successful. That is not all. In the process of fighting terrorism, the U.S. government has undertaken actions that have raised the level of anti-Americanism worldwide. Perhaps these actions have been fully justified and wise, perhaps not—but there is no question that one side effect has been an antipathy toward the United States of which Americans, in general, are increasingly aware. Arab countries and Muslim organizations in America have tried to manipulate this awareness by trying to get the United States to focus more on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and less on the war on terrorism, as if doing the former would palpably aid the latter.

The growth of anti-Americanism in non-Muslim societies, especially in western Europe and to a lesser extent in eastern Asia, has become a source of delight to many Muslim commentators overseas. They see it as a vindication of their claims about America's unjust foreign policy and diplomatic heavy-handedness. Unfortunately, some American Muslims also seem to enjoy the rise of anti-Americanism. This is not very smart: Anti-Americanism overseas engenders xenophobia at home, and today nobody is more "foreign" than American Muslims. American Muslims, more than anyone else, will become the victims of xenophobia in America. It is therefore in the interest of American Muslims to work to reverse the growth of anti-Americanism everywhere, particularly in the Muslim world.

 American Muslims Need Regime Change

The American Muslim community has not been served well by its national organizations, such as the Council for American Islamic Relations and the American Muslim Council. In the aftermath of September 11, the instinctive response of the leaders of these and other, smaller organizations was to protect the Muslim world from America's revenge. They argued against any military reaction. They also hoped to cash in, quite literally, on the post–September 11 introspection in America, using the rising tempo of concern to raise money. They also sought to bring the Palestinian crisis to the front and center, thinking that enough Americans would blame the Jews for September 11 to force partisan progress on the issue.

All these tactics, and the strategy in general, have backfired. The overall strategy has undermined the credibility of these organizations and has made some of them targets of investigation.

All the major American Muslim organizations failed to condemn either Osama bin Laden or al Qaeda for weeks. They invariably hedged in their public statements by vaguely referring to “whoever was responsible.”[71] Many of these organizations encouraged a sense of denial within the community through statements that seemed vague and that even occasionally insinuated that other vested interests may have been responsible for the attacks. This sense of denial, nurtured by ridiculous conspiracy theories that still pervade the Muslim community, has undermined the capacity of many American Muslims to be effective partners in the war on terrorism. It has also undermined the efforts of liberal Muslims to heal the widening gulf between Americans and American Muslims.

Today the American Muslim community is deeply divided. For purposes of simplicity, we can define one side of the divide as consisting of those Muslims whose top priority is the future of their children and the American Muslim community and the other side as consisting of those whose top priority is advancing the interests of Arab and other Muslim nations, particularly Palestine. Among the American Muslims for the “Muslim world,” many are still in deep denial about who was responsible for September 11. They also believe that the United States is knowingly and consciously waging a war on Islam.[72] These Muslims do not recognize the dangers posed by rogue Islamists. These Muslims and some national organizations are more interested in using the American political system to advance back-home causes, even at the expense of the American Muslim community. For them, American Muslims are instruments to be manipulated and used. These groups and individuals do not constitute a significant direct threat to America, but they can and are undermining the efforts of other Muslims who do not share their vision.

In nearly every mosque, every institution, and every forum—and even within families—Muslims “for America” are locked in a struggle with Muslims for the Muslim world to shape the community’s direction. There is a silent and slow, but steady, revolution going on within the American Muslim community. More and more, Muslims for America are realizing that their national organizations are funded by foreign sources that have misguided and misrepresented them. Muslims for America are beginning to wake up to the fact that they have been gradually mesmerized by the jihad for Palestine, and they are struggling to break free.[73]

So far, however, American Muslims for the Muslim world remain dominant. Using foreign resources, they have hijacked the voice, the agenda, and even the future of what is, by every measure, an internally diverse American Muslim community. A quick survey of these organizations will immediately expose their misplaced loyalties and priorities.

A visit to the Web site of the Council for American Islamic Relations (CAIR) showed that it was more interested in Daniel Pipes and the issues concerning Iraq and Palestine than with things that affect the future and the security of America.[74] From the CAIR Web site, one would gather that America was the problem, not rogue Islamists. The recent arrest of Abdurrahman Alamoudi—the founder of the other major national organization, American Muslim Council—has exposed him as an agent of the Libyan government. He has allegedly been using the American Muslim community's goodwill to advance the interests of Mu'ammar Qadaffi's Libya.[75]

Even the more progressive Los Angeles-based Muslim Public Affairs Council (MPAC) has very little to offer in terms of a strategy for fighting terrorism or anti-Americanism in its various forms. In an eighty-page position paper on counterterrorism, MPAC is more critical of the Department of Justice and the U.S. government than it is of al Qaeda, Hamas, or any other rogue Islamist groups.[76] MPAC even includes an apologia for Wahhabism, but has no advice on how the United States should deal with the fact that fifteen of the nineteen attackers on September 11 were from Saudi Arabia. MPAC's recommendations are designed to make life easier for American Muslims (an understandable and important objective) and to advance Palestinian interests as necessary for American security (once again, revealing greater concern for the Arab world than for America itself). Indeed, the paper does not have anything substantive to say about al Qaeda or about how to deal with it and its sympathizers overseas and at home. But MPAC does deserve credit for at least trying to do the right thing. The limitations of its paper are merely reflective of a lack of policy expertise.

As long as these organizations are seen as being truly representative of American Muslims, American Muslims cannot be a useful ally in America's war on terrorism. Before that can happen, there must be a two-pronged regime change within the American Muslim community. First, those leaders who have used American Muslims to advance Arab interests must be marginalized. Second, American Muslim priorities must change. American Muslims must become a community for themselves and cease to be an instrument of the Muslim world. When American Muslim leaders and the American Muslim community begin to work in their own true self-interest, only then will they be able to assist America in fighting terrorism and other forms of anti-Americanism.

It is, however, important to note that, as early as December 2001, Imad ad-Deen Ahmad, a one-man think tank who is a libertarian and a dedicated Muslim, wrote a powerful article in which he argued that it was the Islamic duty of Muslims to bring the criminals responsible for September 11 to justice.[77] In that well-argued paper, Ahmad exhorts Muslims in general, and American Muslims in particular, to go beyond words and let their actions against bin Laden speak as their condemnation of his actions and his organization. It is amazing that Mr. Ahmad is not sought out by the National Security Council or the Department of Homeland Security. The global strategies he has proposed for dealing with al Qaeda are far better than any that the Bush administration has so far come up with. It is a pity that Muslim organizations and the Bush administration have not acted on his suggestions.

Ahmad makes several important points, the most important of which is his compelling moral argument that all Muslims, and especially American Muslims, are duty bound to bring the terrorists who perpetrated the attacks of September 11 to justice. He clearly indicates that it is not enough that Muslims unequivocally condemn the acts; they also must act, collectively and decisively, in pursuit of justice. Ahmad is also critical of the conspiracy theories that are circulating in the Muslim world, and he shows how these false claims are contrary to Islamic values. Ahmad identifies various projects that Muslim NGOs and international governmental organizations, such as the Organization of the Islamic Conference, can undertake to arrest the tide of extremism, delegitimize terrorism, and indeed launch, in his words, “a jihad against terror.”

 George W. Bush Alienates American Muslims

American Muslim organizations have not made all the mistakes, however. Several misconceived policies of the Bush administration have deprived it of valuable assistance that American Muslims could provide in the war on terrorism. The administration, in its characteristically arrogant and shortsighted way, insulted and alienated the United Nations; then, when the United States needed the United Nations, the latter was unwilling to cooperate. Similarly, the Bush administration has mistreated and alienated the American Muslim community, which once voted for him overwhelmingly but which is now determined to see his back.

Most American Muslims feel that by passing the U.S. Patriot Act, which they think undermines their freedoms, and by invading Iraq even though there was no credible intelligence about its unconventional weapons programs and the supposed linkage between Saddam Hussein and al Qaeda, Bush has betrayed their trust. They feel that he is now guided by the prejudice of supposed Islamophobes, such as Daniel Pipes, Jerry Falwell, and Pat Robertson, who are determined to roll back the growth of Islam in America. President Bush’s insistence on getting Daniel Pipes on the board of the U.S. Institute of Peace, by hook or by crook—appointing him when Congress was in recess—has convinced Muslims that Bush will go to inordinate lengths just to insult the American Muslim community.

In addition, President Bush’s steadfast support for Israel, no matter what it does, and his misadventure in Iraq strengthen the perception that there is a war on Islam and make many American Muslims less willing to do anything to assist America at this moment. Muslims are not going to help America if America is seen as using September 11 to help Israel. Perhaps, if there were a new administration in Washington, American Muslims might be more willing to come forward and work with the American government.

 What Role Can American Muslims Play in the War on Terrorism?

American Muslims have an enormous potential to become an important ally in America's war against extremism. If consulted and brought into counterterrorism planning, they can help America become more effective, more focused, and more cost effective. Four areas of assistance stand out.

First, with regard to threat assessments and threat identification, American Muslims could have provided the Bush administration with a more accurate picture of the potential for threats from within the United States. Their analysis would have helped make the Department of Homeland Security a smaller, more effective, and less expensive institution. The American government is unnecessarily spending vast amounts of resources in surveillance of groups and individuals who do not constitute a threat, while they may be overlooking those who could be problematic. American Muslim input on this subject could be immensely useful.

Many U.S. policy makers continue to err in understanding and predicting the behavior of Muslim groups; the postwar chaos in Iraq is a case in point. If American Muslims had been more involved in the management of Iraq after the war, it would have been easier for Washington to establish better communications and perhaps gain more cooperation from various groups within Iraq.

Second, American Muslims could have given a Muslim face to America's response to September 11. That option, had it been pursued, could have averted the feeling in much of the Muslim world that the war on terrorism is a Christian-Zionist crusade against Islam. The Bush administration erred by not appointing a Muslim to a high position at the Department of Homeland Security. Senator Spencer Abraham—an American Christian proud of his Arab heritage, and a trusted Republican—might better serve the country there than at the Department of Energy.

Similarly, the Bush administration should have appointed a number of prominent American Muslim athletes, such as Hakeem Olajuwon, and some imams, such as Imam Hamza Yusuf (an American convert to Islam who is well respected in the Muslim world), as special goodwill envoys to the Muslim world. The State Department is now attempting this in a less prominent way —better late than never. A more prominent Muslim presence in America's diplomatic and counterterrorism endeavors would have gone a long way, not only in preempting the rise of anti-Americanism but also in building trust between America and the Muslim world.

Third, there is the deficit in human intelligence. Some important assets that American Muslims can bring to the war on terrorism include human intelligence, cultural insights, linguistic skills, and experience and awareness of the diversity within Islamic groups and movements. It is possible that the FBI, CIA, and NSA can access these resources through recruitment, but voluntary support in this area from the community can be priceless.

Fourth is public diplomacy. Many American Muslim scholars have argued that Islam and democracy are compatible. The Bush administration could have recruited several of those scholars to make this case in Iraq and to help design Iraqi democracy and write its constitution. Without significant input from respectable Muslim scholars, the Iraqi constitution may not stand up to possible accusations that it is un-Islamic and written to make Iraq subservient to American interests.

Relatedly, an important arena where the United States badly needs its Muslim citizens is in countering anti-American propaganda. Islamists, as well as several Muslim governmental media, have launched a propaganda war against the United States in response to the war on terrorism. This anti-American media offensive is determined to focus on U.S. foreign policy excesses and failures. It also seeks to explain every aspect of American policy as if it were serving only Israeli interests. With American Muslims as spokespersons surfing the media and the airwaves in the Muslim world, the United States would have a better chance of sending out a more balanced view of its policies.

American Muslims can also counter the abuse of Islam by rogue Islamists and help to undermine their legitimacy. American Muslim scholars have consistently maintained that hirabah ("terrorism") is not jihad and is strictly prohibited by Islamic principles and law. They have also argued how suicide bombings violate the Islamic ethic of self-defense and are not legitimate instruments of jihad.[78] If the voice of American Muslim scholars were given more attention, say through a White House–sponsored conference on jihad, many of the moderate and liberal elements in the Muslim world would recognize the fallacies in the so-called Islamic edicts of rogue Islamists and the scholars who support and justify their cause.

 Restore Balance to America’s Foreign Policy

American foreign policy is currently being shaped by a small group of close-minded individuals who are open neither to criticism nor to suggestion. The White House has become a victim of groupthink. It even refuses to recognize that its foreign policy agenda is in shambles. Bin Laden is still out there, as is al Qaeda; Americans are dying nearly every day in Iraq and Afghanistan, and the American economy is bleeding constantly. Anti-Americanism has reached shocking proportions, even in countries considered to be traditional allies. The administration itself claims that serious threats to American security are still out there and that much of the world is decidedly committed to not cooperating with the United States. To put it bluntly, American foreign policy under Bush is a colossal failure and is even potentially dangerous to America’s security and economic health.

This administration would do well to listen to some moderate Muslim voices in shaping its foreign policy objectives and in determining its tactics. Most American Muslims have the same vision for the Muslim world as does the Bush administration. Most American Muslims want wholesale regime changes and the establishment of democracy in the entire Muslim world. They want to see the general human rights environment improving and wish that prosperity and freedom would take root in the Muslim world. The difference is that American Muslims would recommend strategies that are more humane and that involve less bombing and killing. The Bush administration needs American Muslims, and it is time it acted on this need and included them in its policy deliberations.

At the same time, patriotic American Muslims need the administration. Muslims for America are now locked in a struggle with Muslims for the Muslim world to determine the overall purpose and direction of the community. The government must find a way to bypass the dominant Muslim organizations that are determined to advance foreign interests, and instead recruit American Muslims whose hearts are wedded to America. Doing so could tip the balance. These Muslims must be committed to Islam as well as to America, for Muslims who reject or ridicule Islam will not enjoy support within the community and cannot mobilize the goodwill of the community to help with America's crisis of legitimacy in the Muslim world. Truly, American Muslims and the U.S. government need each other.

[71] See Khalid Abou el-Fadl, "US Muslims, Unify and Stand Up," Los Angeles Times, July 14, 2002.

[72] According to a survey conducted by Project MAPS at Georgetown University and Zogby International in November/December 2001, only one out of three American Muslims believed that the war on terror was a war on Islam. This figure most certainly has changed since the use of the Patriot Act and the war and occupation of Iraq. To review the survey, go to http://www.projectmaps.com.

[73] See Muqtedar Khan, "Putting the American in 'American Muslims,'" New York Times, September 7, 2001. Also see Jane Lampman, "Muslim in America," Christian Science Monitor, January 10, 2002.

[74] See Council on American Islamic Relations, http://www.cair-net.org.

[75] For details about Alamoudi's arrest and his connections to the Libyan government, see the brief filed against him in a Virginia court by U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (http://news.findlaw.com/hdocs/docs/terrorism/usalamoudi93003cmp.pdf).

[76] See MPAC’s position paper on terrorism, “A Review of US Counterterrorism Policy: American Muslim Critique and Recommendations,” http://www.mpac.org/bucket_downloads/CTPaper.pdf.

[77] See Imad ad-Deen Ahmad, “Islam Demands a Muslim Response to the Terror of September 11,” Middle East Affairs Journal 7, no. 2–3 (Summer-Fall 2002).

[78] Sohail H. Hashmi, “Not What the Prophet Would Want: How Can Islamic Scholars Sanction Suicidal Tactics?” Washington Post, June 9, 2002.

* Public Arts

 11. Déjà Vu: The ABCs of Public Diplomacy in the Middle East

Martin Kramer

There is a good deal of talk and hand-wringing about the “hearts and minds” problem in the global war on terrorism. Even Secretary of Defense Rumsfeld has ruminated over the matter, dropping some of his famous snowflakes on his staff in asking that a better job be done with respect to the nonmilitary aspects of the challenge. Rumsfeld is rightly concerned not only with dispatching this generation’s terrorists but also with short-circuiting the processes that are producing the terrorists of the future.

Secretary Rumsfeld is probably right to worry that the United States and its allies are not doing a thorough job on what the Pentagon calls the nonkinetic aspects of the war on terrorism. In some areas, such as monitoring and interrupting the flow of money to terrorist organizations, some progress has been made. But in others, such as education reform and U.S. public diplomacy, it is not clear how much has been achieved. It may even be that in the public diplomacy domain, the United States has gone backward.

But how to tell, and what to do? It is difficult to generalize from anecdotes; polls are often unreliable; and no one has yet collected, collated, and analyzed all the relevant data. All of that needs to be done. Meanwhile, however, it is possible to sketch out the basic dos and don’ts of a public diplomacy campaign, because such campaigns have been designed and implemented before—by others in the Middle East and by Americans elsewhere. So, before we get to the question of whether to go with satellite television alongside FM radio, or whether to emphasize American pop culture or America’s traditions of tolerance, or whether this Gallup poll or that Zogby survey tells the real story, we have to remind ourselves, on a fundamental level, what public diplomacy has been and should be about.

 Learning from France (Yes, Really)

As suggested above, the “hearts and minds” problem in the Middle East is not a new one. Every non-Muslim authority that has projected power into the Middle East has faced the problem of winning Muslim hearts and minds. This is because the projection of non-Muslim power into that part of the world has always been suspect in Muslim hearts and minds, often with good cause. Past episodes of Western public diplomacy, successful and not, offer both edification and some entertainment—and where better to begin a potted history of public diplomacy in the Middle East than in the Mediterranean Sea in 1798?

In that year, Napoleon invaded Egypt. On one of the approaching French ships, there was, of all things, an Arabic printing press. While en route, Napoleon ordered a broadsheet to be printed on that press for distribution. The points he wanted to make have an oddly familiar ring. “You will be told,” read the broadsheet, “that I have come to destroy your religion; do not believe it! Reply that I have come to restore your rights, to punish the usurpers, and that more than the Mamluks, I respect God, his Prophet, and the Qur’an.”

To drive home the point of his empathy for the Muslims, Napoleon added this evidence of sincerity: “Did we not destroy the Pope, who said that war should be waged against the Muslims? Did we not destroy the Knights of Malta, because those insane people thought God wanted them to wage war against the Muslims?” If Napoleon had hired speechwriters, he could not have paid them too much.

Not only were the French going to show friendship to Islam, or at least to claim it, they were also going to promote a revolutionary thing called equality. But they would do so in a way that presumed to be consistent with Islam. “All men are equal before God,” said Napoleon’s proclamation. “Wisdom, talents, and virtue alone make them different from one another.” Here was the first stab at democracy promotion. (Of course, the French also warned that any villages that did not surrender would be burnt to the ground, but that’s another matter.)

There is a good deal more in the 1798 French declaration to the Muslims, and every aspiring public diplomacy officer should master it. In this foundation statement of Western public diplomacy, diplomacy officers will find the two key talking points of any effective campaign already in mature readiness: promise to use your power to pursue enlightened ends that will benefit Muslims, and profess absolute respect for Islam.

There is a second famous instance of Western public diplomacy toward the Muslim world that deserves careful attention. During the First World War, France and Britain (and Russia) faced a serious problem: the Ottoman sultan, who was also the Caliph of the Islamic world and, not insignificantly, an ally of Germany, issued a jihad proclamation against them. The proclamation was circulated in every Muslim language, much like an Osama bin Laden video is circulated today by other means. The sultan’s proclamation pointed out, “He who summons you to this great holy war is the Caliph of your noble Prophet.”

At the time, all three of the aforementioned Entente powers ruled over subject Muslim peoples in the millions, and naturally, they feared the prospect of uprisings. In response, Britain and France launched very sophisticated public diplomacy campaigns. Muslim notables were persuaded to certify that the Entente powers allowed Muslims complete freedom of religion. The British and French also made strenuous efforts to get out the word that the sultan’s call to jihad was not genuine. It was, they claimed, not really the work of the Caliph but of the Young Turk regime acting at German suggestion. The proclamation, they insisted, was a fake “holy war made in Germany.”

But the big coup came for the Entente powers when the British persuaded the sharif of Mecca, a descendant of the Prophet, to raise the standard of revolt against the Ottoman caliph in Mecca itself. All in all, this worked very well. The Allies had very little trouble from their Muslim subjects throughout the war. The lessons for us today should be clear: Get Muslims with the best Islamic pedigree on your side, and try to line up whoever has the say in Mecca.

In World War II, the “hearts and minds” problem returned. Indeed, the British had an even bigger problem in the 1930s and 1940s than they had had twenty years earlier. Large portions of Muslim, and especially Arab, opinion were pro-Axis. Many Arabs thought the British had betrayed promises of independence made during the previous war—perhaps because Hitler hosted the Mufti of Jerusalem in Berlin, claiming just that. The leading German orientalists were summoned to translate Mein Kampf into Arabic, cutting out all the parts about Semites that might offend the Arabs.

This was real trouble brewing. So the British launched yet another public diplomacy campaign, predicated on the idea that Britain had more respect for Islam than any other European power. How could they demonstrate that respect in a tangible way? Build a mosque, which is how the Regent’s Park Mosque in London began—as a piece of wartime propaganda.

Lord George Ambrose Lloyd, as secretary of state for the colonies, proposed the idea when war broke out, and in 1940 Winston Churchill’s war cabinet put up the money to buy the site. In 1944, King George VI officially opened the Islamic Center in Regent’s Lodge. In the British archives, there is file after file of press releases, radio broadcast transcripts, flyers, and brochures about the mosque to be built in London. This was quite slick stuff, and for those tasked with similar duties today, it is well worth reviewing.

When the war ended, the urgency of the mosque project faded. Indeed, the mosque itself did not get built for another thirty years. But the plan to build it served its purpose. The lesson for a Western leader today? Get thee to a mosque. Do not just profess respect for Islam; get out and show it. A year ago, an Islamic Society of North America conference was broadcast on C-SPAN. When a speaker mentioned that Queen Elizabeth had entered a mosque recently and had taken her shoes off before doing so, the audience burst into spontaneous applause. Apparently, demonstrations of respect work.

 Remedial Americans

The point from this very short history is clear: other powers have done the “hearts and minds” drill before, and done it successfully. To a considerable degree, we have been there and done that. The basic components of a public diplomacy campaign to win Muslim hearts and minds are clear enough. So, why do Americans appear to be so determined not to understand them?

The main reason is that the Cold War made it too easy for the United States, just as it came into its own as a Middle Eastern power. America’s adversary for over forty years was the godless, clumsy, cumbersome and downright ugly Soviet Union. Soviet commissars ruled over Muslims directly, while the God-fearing United States did not. Those commissars busied themselves with shutting down mosques and keeping Muslims from performing the hajj. It mattered not one whit how many times the Soviets sent KGB-appointed muftis to Cairo and Damascus to say that Muslims enjoyed religious freedom under Communist rule; no one in the Arab world believed it. The Soviets could offer all sorts of enticements, from MIG jet fighters to high dams, but Moscow could never erase the stigma of its reputation for hostility to religious faith. Moreover, the Saudis were themselves zealous in leading an Islamic campaign against atheistic communism, culminating in the jihad against the Russians in Afghanistan.

As long as the United States was up against the Soviets, it did not have to spend a lot of effort burnishing America's reputation as a friend of Islam. If the enemy of thine enemy is thy friend, then the United States walked in clover in the Muslim world so long as the Soviet Union existed. In retrospect, it is clear that all that changed a decade ago when the Soviet Union folded. But it took September 11 to bring home the two truths that now compel the United States to run a serious public diplomacy campaign in the Muslim world.

The first truth is now that the United States is the only great power, everyone everywhere who has a propensity to fix blame for problems on an external power is fixing it on the United States. That propensity is endemic in the Arab and Muslim worlds; because the British, the French, and the Russians are now all in the second tier of powerful nations, all the free-floating hostility of a wounded civilization is fixing itself on the United States. America stands out all too visibly, just as the World Trade Center did; all the other powers are just so many Chrysler buildings. Whatever the Russians do in Chechnya, or the Indians do in Kashmir, or the Chinese do in Xinjiang, the United States will remain the most hated of all powers. Most Americans did not realize that before September 11; they realize it now.

The second truth is that friendly Muslim governments that used to do the public relations job for America in their general neighborhood either are not doing it any longer, or are ineffective at it. For many years, the United States relied on Saudi Arabia to provide Islamic cover. But the Saudi spell—that "protector of the holy places" halo—is beginning to wear off. The religious zeal in Saudi society remains, but the royals can no longer fire it like a missile at whatever target they choose. Instead, the royals themselves seem to have become the primary target.

The Saudis will use what is left of whatever magic charms they possess to protect themselves. To judge from the current state of things, there probably will not be much left over for America. If one were to give a title to the final chapter of a book about how the United States relied on Muslim governments to provide Islamic cover, that chapter might aptly be called "15 of the 19."

The meaning of September 11, put simply and starkly, is that the United States now has no choice but to do public diplomacy for itself. The end of the Soviet Union has supplied the problem in a new shape, and the end of Saudi cover has provided the need for a new solution.

This is a sad situation, perhaps, but not one beyond saving. American public diplomacy does not have to reinvent the wheel. It should take a page or two from the successful episodes in the history of the European powers. There is plenty to learn about what those tasked with managing big empires with lots of Muslim subjects did right. There is also much to learn from their mistakes.

American officials can also learn from their own experience. The United States did very well with public diplomacy during the Cold War. The present context is different: Poles and Russians and Czechs are not the same as Iranians, Uzbeks, and Yemenis. Yet some of that experience is relevant. Add to it a dash of American can-do optimism, some of the latest gad-getry, and a serious budget, and the United States will have pretty much all it needs. Almost.

 The Three Nos

So much for what the United States should have and should do. There are three things, however, that it should not have or do—things that need to be avoided at all costs. These three things must be mentioned, because even as Americans seem busy ignoring the relevant history—that of others and their own—some are making directional noises in the emerging discourse of public diplomacy that need to be squelched. If the United States goes down these roads, it will surely fail.

First, the United States must not confuse public diplomacy with policy making. This confusion comes in two forms. The less dangerous form is the argument that the best way to pursue a successful public diplomacy is simply to alter American policy to make it that much easier to sell. This argument obviously confuses ends with means. There would be no need for public diplomacy if policies were easy to sell, and, just as obviously, diplomacies that are hard to sell can still be very much the right diplomacies. The purpose of public diplomacy may be formulated in a single phrase: to persuade foreign peoples to support, accept, or at least acquiesce to policies that, at first blush, they are likely to dislike, resent, or oppose.

To achieve this goal requires working in the teeth of what marketers call sales resistance. That has to be acknowledged as a given. American foreign policy is the product of a complex process; it is the job of the public diplomacy officer not to lament the outcome of the process but to sell the end product (and to do so without dwelling on its defects when presenting it to customers). Put another way, policy is not there to create leeway for public diplomacy; public diplomacy is there to create leeway for policy.

As fundamental and obvious as this point is, the public diplomacy function itself can become bureaucratically entrenched, and thus entrenched it will conceive itself to have its own interests. In light of this danger, the job of the real policy makers is to give public diplomacy its reading assignment and to keep it on the same page.

Confusing public diplomacy with policy making is the less dangerous of the two, precisely because it is so obvious. The second and more dangerous confusion could arise from putting the public diplomacy apparatus too close to the decision-making apparatus. Just such a confusion has been proposed by the Council on Foreign Relations' task force on public diplomacy, which recommends creating something parallel to the National Security Council for public diplomacy. The Djerejian Report proposes something similar, in the form of a new White House office to manage and coordinate public diplomacy.

No doubt, there should be someone near the Oval Office who can tell the president that it is not a good idea to use the word crusade in dealing with anything Middle Eastern. It would also be a good thing to have the occasional estimate of how a proposed course of action might affect Arab or Muslim public opinion—although the room for error in such assessments is enormous. But it is simply dangerous to put public diplomacy considerations too close to the policy-formulating machinery, because public diplomacy could then become a virtual interest group representing foreign opinion. Although that is the legitimate role of foreign embassies, the State Department’s foreign contacts, and perhaps some of the ethnic lobbies that line K Street, putting public diplomacy smack in the middle of the Old Executive Office Building is to overprivilege foreign opinion in policy making, which is not the best idea in a democracy.

The second path to be avoided is this: Do not turn public diplomacy into an instrument for the domestic promotion of the multicultural ideal. In the United States, there has been a manifest temptation to do this, and it is a truly terrible idea. Arabs who live in Tunis or Damascus do not need to be convinced that Muslims in the United States can live happy and fulfilling lives as Muslims; they already know that. Anyway, it has nothing to do with promoting U.S. policy goals in the region.

The kind of distortion to which the multicultural idea gives rise has already twisted some aspects of homeland security. Anyone who has flown across an ocean on an airplane recently knows that certain “security” procedures are really rituals meant to affirm the multicultural ideal that we are all as one—and thus, we are all equally likely to be terrorists. This is nonsense, but the same potential exists in public diplomacy, which could too easily end up being an affirmative action or empowerment program for Arab-Americans. This may or may not be an end worth pursuing, but even if it is, public diplomacy is not the place to pursue it.

Public diplomacy, like homeland security, should be about getting the job done. If it can appease the gods of multicultural diversity along the way, fine—but that is not its main objective. If doing so becomes a primary objective, such concern for diversity will invariably produce a message that is muddled by diverse messengers. The United States needs to put out a message that is clear and unambiguous. The American ritual of presenting every possible perspective—in this case, to Arabs and Muslims in the Middle East—will leave friends isolated and bewildered and enemies dangerously confused. To the extent that the U.S. government has been guilty of such error in the past three years accounts for the counterproductive consequences of public diplomacy efforts thus far.

The third situation to avoid is an inverted structure for public diplomacy that would have Americans listening to Middle Easterners as much as or more than persuading them. This danger is implicit in the name “public diplomacy,” for what is diplomacy if not a process of give and take that ultimately ends in compromise?

This belief is a popular error. The Council on Foreign Relations study, mentioned earlier, recommends “listening tours” for special panels, for example. Of course listening is important, but there is already an apparatus —American embassies and intelligence organizations—in place for that. If public diplomacy simply adds one more layer of reportage about foreign opinion, then it will have been a wasted opportunity. The point is to get the message out—to make the other guy listen.

Getting that message out is probably the most difficult aspect for public diplomacy to insure, because “dialogue” and “exchange” and “people-to-people” are all parts of the lexicon of public diplomacy. But one of the lessons of September 11 is that there has been too much “people-to-people”—including very free movement of people—and not enough direct persuading. The United States is not going to win hearts and minds by listening to someone complain about America and then giving him a visa.

Unfortunately, some of the initiatives now under consideration in U.S. government circles do not seem to amount to much more than that. The mere experience of America is insufficient to inoculate against anti-Americanism—we know this from numerous cases, from Sayyid Qutb to Muhammad Atta. The only possible inoculation is a steady and relentless irradiation of the Arab and Muslim worlds by a unified message, and every muscle and sinew of public diplomacy should be devoted to just that.

 Road Work Ahead

At the end of the day, it may well be that public diplomacy will not make the United States loved and admired. No matter. It is no less important, and perhaps more important, that the United States be feared and respected. Indeed, no amount of explanatory verbiage emanating from Washington can substitute for the sure knowledge that the United States will defend its interests with vigor, regardless of what anyone thinks. So let us not have exaggerated expectations of public diplomacy. Public diplomacy can magnify the effect of a victory, but it cannot mitigate the effect of a defeat. In a war, even a somewhat unusual one, it is no substitute for winning.

Just ask Napoleon.

 12. Fixing Public Diplomacy for Arab and Muslim Audiences

William A. Rugh

The phrase “American public diplomacy” means, as it has meant for decades, U.S. government programs intended to support our national interests by providing information and interpretation to foreign audiences about matters relating to the United States. Unlike traditional diplomacy, which is essentially confined to intergovernmental relations, the target audience of public diplomacy is primarily nongovernmental foreign opinion leaders in the media, academia, and elsewhere.

For more than forty years, from 1958 to 1999, the primary responsibility for American public diplomacy was lodged in the U.S. Information Agency (USIA). In 1999, President Clinton decided to transfer this responsibility to the U.S. Department of State. It is true that many other government agencies, as well as many private organizations and individuals, have an impact on American public diplomacy programs when foreign audiences become aware of American actions and opinions reported in the public domain. In these days of expanding international media technology and volume, it is fair to say that the percentage of nongovernmental communications that affect the conduct of public diplomacy is growing. Nonetheless, the management of public diplomacy is strictly the State Department’s responsibility, and the fact that

State Department views are known to express U.S. government policy makes those views more significant than nearly all other sources of American opinion and interpretation available to foreign audiences.

 The New Problem of Public Diplomacy

How should America’s public diplomacy problem with Arabs in particular and the Muslim world as a whole be defined? The most urgent question for Americans today is a very specific one: How can significant Arab and Muslim support for, or acquiescence to, terrorism be counteracted? Looked at closely, that support is of a relatively narrow sort.

Recent polls show that the overwhelming majority of Arab opinion of the United States is positive toward American values and essentially all aspects of American culture and society—with the sole exception of American foreign policy. Most Arabs admire American society and U.S. leadership in science, technology, and economics. Many who are able to do so want to send their children to American universities. But Arabs are invariably critical of U.S. foreign policy, and nearly all Muslims tend to share similar views about U.S. foreign policy.[79]

Arab and Muslim criticism of U.S. foreign policy has increased over the past half century, and particularly in recent years. The reasons seem fairly obvious. American involvement in the Middle East was minimal before World War II, when that involvement was confined primarily to work by educators and oilmen who, in general, were regarded as bringing benefits to the region. Strong Arab nationalist sentiment in the 1950s and 1960s increasingly focused negative attention on American support for Israel, as Arabs believed that Washington was unfairly taking the wrong side in the Arab-Israeli dispute. Most Arabs and Muslims, however, continued to respect most aspects of American society and culture. Also, since pious Muslims believed communism to be a threat to Islam, America’s stance against communism tended to reinforce positive attitudes toward the United States.

Since September 11, criticism of American policy has steadily increased. For the majority of Arabs and Muslims, the immediate reaction to the September 11 attack was sympathy for Americans as victims. The Arab world tended to understand the U.S. military invasion of Afghanistan and the elimination of the Taliban regime as an act of legitimate self-defense. They also regarded President Bush's initial declaration of war against terrorism as justified. As the president expanded the definition of "the enemy" beyond al Qaeda, Arabs and Muslims concluded that Bush's perception of the problem, and of the enemy, differed substantially from theirs.

Washington issued a list of terrorist organizations that was limited to Arab and Muslim groups, including, for example, Hizballah, an organization that is considered a legitimate political party in Lebanon with representatives in parliament. President Bush declared that any state not fighting terrorism was as bad as the terrorists themselves, and when American commentators writing in the press blamed Saudi Arabia and Egypt for not doing enough to counter terrorism, Saudis and Egyptians felt unfairly criticized. They replied that they had been combating terrorism for years before September 11, detaining or deporting terrorists acting against their governments. Also, as the violence between Palestinians and Israelis continued, it seemed to Arabs and Muslims that President Bush was unfairly siding with Israel and blaming only the Palestinians. Some argued and more believed that Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon had hijacked Bush's war on terrorism for his own purposes. President Bush's subsequent linking of Iran and Iraq with North Korea as an "axis of evil" also ran counter to the trend that had developed in the Arab world to effect reconciliation with Iran and Iraq.

Washington's confrontation with Iraq, followed by the coalition's invasion, was widely opposed by Arabs and Muslims, because they did not regard Iraq as a threat to them and because they resented outside intervention. Moreover, the war seemed to them further evidence of American hostility toward Arabs and Islam, and of a dangerous willingness to use force over the objections of others. Their satisfaction in seeing Saddam Hussein toppled was undercut by increased feelings of humiliation and weakness against the lone superpower acting without soliciting or caring about their views. Unlike 1991, when the first President Bush had support from most of the Arab and Muslim world in ending the Iraqi occupation of Kuwait, President George W.

Bush was widely seen as imposing a new occupation on Iraq for parochial U.S. interests.

All of these American policy behaviors seem to most Arabs and Muslims to be anti-Muslim, despite the fact that President Bush, from time to time, has said he respects Islam and has repeatedly denied that the war on terrorism is either a clash of civilizations or a war against Islam. But post–September 11 American security measures having to do with visa procedures, as well as comments critical of Islam by people like Jerry Falwell, Frank Graham, and the occasional U.S. Army officer—comments immediately conveyed to audiences abroad by CNN, Fox, and foreign media—have reinforced the impression among Arabs and Muslims that the American government and its people have turned hostile. Since September 11, the gap between the Arab perception of the world and that of Washington has steadily increased, leading to an unprecedented level of tension between the two sides.

President Bush's endorsement after the Iraq War of a new "road map" for Arab-Israeli peace was welcomed by many Arabs as a sign of American interest in helping resolve the Arab's self-declared highest-priority issue. The welcome, however, was tempered by deep skepticism that the president possessed neither the evenhandedness nor the resolve necessary to broker a settlement, mainly because, up to that point, his policies on many issues had severely undermined American credibility in the eyes of most Arabs and Muslims.

 Who Is the Target of Public Diplomacy?

With all this as background, we can see that the highest-priority problem for the United States is, for the most part, restricted to foreign policy issues. Fanatical Islamists aside, most Arabs and Muslims do not hate America for what it is; they dislike America for what they think it does.

Beyond that, however, it is useful, for practical purposes, to regard Arab opinion as divided into three broad categories: friends who know us, enemies who sometimes know us and sometimes don’t, and a vast middle of those who mostly don’t care.

On one end of the spectrum are people who have spent time in the United States, as students or on business, and who have a reasonably sophisticated understanding of America. These are people who know some or a lot of English, who have had access to American culture and its information environment, and who tend to be the most favorably disposed to this country. They have informed, moderate, and basically positive opinions of the United States, although they too have been critical of aspects of our foreign policy. They have given us the benefit of the doubt and even defended America in discussion with their compatriots.

At the opposite extreme is a small group of radicals who are highly critical of the United States, based primarily on fear and apprehension that American involvement in their part of the world threatens their culture. Most of these radicals know little of America and have never been to America. Some, however, have been radicalized by their experience in the West—in Europe and the United States. The majority of these radicals are literate, reasonably well-educated people by standards of the region. As a rule, they are not from poor families nor from families near the bottom of their local social hierarchy.

Arab radicals have opposed existing Arab regimes as well as the United States, and the extremists among them have tended to support the use of violence and terrorism for political ends. Although these radicals have been doing this for a long time, in earlier decades they were essentially secular and leftist in orientation. But since the 1980s, they have tended increasingly to use, and presumably believe in, an Islamic fundamentalist vocabulary.

The third group is a large silent majority that tends not to focus on America very much, unless events in the region, such as the Palestinian uprising or the Iraq War, bring America to the group’s inescapable attention. Members of this group come from the lower rungs of society for the most part, where considerable percentages of people—more than half in Egypt—are either literally or functionally illiterate when it comes to political matters.

Since September 11, developments have tended to strengthen the radical group and to weaken the pro-American group. The members of the latter group have generally stopped speaking up in defense of the United States because public opinion has become so hostile. At the same time, recent events have raised the consciousness of the silent majority in ways unhelpful to American interests. Support for active opposition to America, and for terrorism, has increased among the radical minority, and others in the remaining two categories have become more reluctant to speak out against that support.

It is tempting to dismiss third world public opinion as irrelevant, and many do just that. But public opinion matters everywhere. Even rulers in authoritarian states pay careful attention to it. This is truer than ever since the growth of satellite television has eroded government controls over the information and opinion available to citizens. In the Arab world in particular, Arab satellite television that developed during the 1990s has amplified Arab voices throughout the Middle East, where local government-owned and Western media had previously dominated the discussion of international events.

It is also tempting to conclude that the only way to undermine foreign support for terrorism and to close the attitudinal gap between Washington and public opinion in the Arab and Muslim worlds would be for Washington to change its policies. Obviously, we should not change or abandon well-considered policies just because others abroad may not like them—whether because they misunderstand those policies (as is often the case in the Middle East) or because their interests genuinely conflict with our own. If that were to happen, public diplomacy would become a decidedly secondary concern.

An additional problem is that President Bush, by his policies, has badly eroded American credibility abroad, causing foreign audiences to doubt his intentions. If his administration can lead a transformation of Iraq and Afghanistan into internationally recognized successes, and if it can bring about a stable resolution to the Arab-Israeli conflict, Arab and Muslim opinion would become more favorable. But the Arab world strongly doubts that he will succeed at any of this.

Yet even in lieu of foreign policy shifts or eventual policy successes, foreign opinion can be affected by a substantial public diplomacy effort that is well planned, systematic, and well targeted. In terms of the three groups here described, it is probably futile to try to convert the few extremists away from their anti-Americanism. It is possible, however, to work with and embolden those with pro-American views and, hence, to influence the great middle of Arab and Muslim opinion, which, thanks to new technologies, is gradually being brought into the public realm.

 Tools of Public Diplomacy

Decades of experience demonstrate that an effective public diplomacy program that efficiently provides relevant information about the United States and its policies must have a well-defined target audience, clear priorities for its substantive content, the most effective instruments and communication tools, and a structure of responsibility that ensures coordination. Let us briefly review these criteria as they pertain to the problem at hand.

First, as noted, the target audience should include two of the three groups mentioned above: the silent majority and friendly moderates who know and appreciate America and its values. Because it is impractical to reach all the members of those two groups, the major effort should be directed at each group’s opinion leaders who are influential in their own societies today or who will be in the near future. The American effort should not try to directly target radical groups that are hostile to our values. We should leave that to others within the Arab and Muslim community, as they have a far better chance of effectively reaching the radicals than we do. For example, a moderate Muslim cleric with a following in his community should be a high-priority target because he can help deal with radicals and would-be radicals in terms that they understand. When appealing to moderate clerics, an important part of the message should be that it is in their own interest to keep radicals from controlling the agenda and the public discussion in their countries.

American public diplomacy priorities need to be based on an analysis of the major issues affecting Arab and Muslim opinion about America. Under current circumstances this means the highest priority should be given to explaining U.S. foreign policy and encouraging sympathetic understanding of it, because foreign policy is by far the most important source of criticism and misunderstanding of the United States today. In this context, it is important to note that although the foreign policies of the George W. Bush administration have been severely criticized abroad, they have enjoyed the support of large majorities of the American public and Congress. This huge disconnect between American and foreign opinion opens the door for the central function of public diplomacy to be activated, namely, to help explain to foreign audiences how Americans are thinking and why they support U.S. foreign policy. Arab and Muslim audiences should be told that the majority of American society supports U.S. foreign policies that Arabs and Muslims oppose. The hope is that this will help open the Arab and Muslim community to new information and interpretation.

The second priority after foreign policy should be to provide information about basic characteristics of American society that are important for Arab and Muslim audiences to know and understand. In today’s world, most of these audiences have access to large amounts of information about America through various channels. Indeed, at a basic informational level, they generally know much more about us than all but a tiny minority of Americans know about Arabs and Muslims.

Nevertheless, most Arabs and Muslims have important gaps in their knowledge of America—especially in terms of American government and politics. They may know from the media about our popular culture, and they may hear public statements by prominent personalities, but they tend to know little about our political system, such as the roles of Congress and the press, the court system, and the practical impact of the Bill of Rights. A broad program containing what USIA used to call “Americana” content is important in conveying an understanding of our foreign policy.

Recent American public diplomacy efforts, led until March 2003 by undersecretary of state Charlotte Beers, tended to give highest priority to Americana issues rather than to foreign policy. This is because policy under Beers focused primarily on those radical groups that hate American society and its values. Thus, considerable sums were spent on a film project showing how well Muslims were treated in America. This policy focused on the wrong target audience (the radicals), however, and did not sufficiently address the key foreign policy complaints that important audiences were expressing.

Before Beers' tenure, the Clinton administration gave insufficient attention to foreign policy advocacy—for example, on the question of our confrontation with Saddam Hussein during the 1990s. Arab opinion increasingly criticized the UN embargo as hurting only Iraqi citizens. The U.S. government did not aggressively make public the case for continuing our policy by showing how the sanctions policy was caused by the Iraqi government's behavior. We did not explain how that policy was being manipulated to harm those segments of Iraqi society that the Iraqi regime held to be potential dangers.

Experience shows that the key to effective public diplomacy is people. There should be a cadre of professionals in our diplomatic missions abroad who are experienced in techniques of policy advocacy and Americana explication, and who are in direct contact with our target audiences. In the Muslim and Arab worlds especially, the most effective way to influence opinions and convey information is in face-to-face dialogue. Edward R. Murrow famously said that in public diplomacy, "It is the last three feet that count." Other U.S. officials abroad, including U.S. ambassadors, are also in a position to carry out public diplomacy functions when they interact with media editors, academics, and other opinion leaders.

Unfortunately, the large budget cuts for public diplomacy after the end of the Cold War, followed by the 1999 merger of USIA into the State Department, have severely reduced the number of public diplomacy specialists and undercut effective coordination between Washington and U.S. embassies abroad. The budget fell in real terms by 21 percent from 1988 to 1998. The budget has increased slightly since September 11, but it is nowhere near earlier levels. As the Djerejian Report on public diplomacy emphasized, there is an absurdly low level of support for such a critical function.

The merger of USIA into the State Department has weakened the public diplomacy function rather than strengthening it, as advocates had promised. Officers with experience in public diplomacy have less influence now and less control over programs, and public diplomacy positions are frequently filled with nonspecialists. In addition to the decline in funding, professionalism and cohesion have declined drastically. After the departure of Beers, the undersecretary for public diplomacy position was left vacant for nearly nine months—all during the recent war in Iraq and its daunting aftermath. Then Beers' replacement, Margaret Tutweiler, left the job after only a few months. The combination of resource scarcity and organizational weakness has been very harmful to the recent public diplomacy effort, at a time when that effort is needed more than ever.

The dual techniques of listening carefully to foreign opinion and engaging in dialogue are essential. For persuasion and conveying understanding, dialogue is a more powerful tool than monologue. Listening carefully to foreign opinion has the added benefit of showing respect for foreign concerns, a posture that, in itself, is likely to encourage a more rational dialogue and more moderate views. A public diplomacy professional must know what foreign audiences are thinking in matters relating to the United States. Monitoring editorials and headlines in foreign media and engaging in private discussions with key members of the foreign audience are absolutely necessary for understanding the depth of feelings and of matters that may not be clearly expressed in public forums. Most Americans would be surprised to learn how little attention U.S. policy makers pay to foreign media and that what is monitored is not systematically analyzed.

This is especially true of our efforts in the Muslim world. There is no adequate budget for it nor are there enough linguists to do this essential task. Similarly, Voice of America (VOA) call-in programs with American officials can deal effectively with foreign concerns, but these have been cut back since the 1999 merger.

Senior officials in Washington, starting with the president himself, have a significant impact on public diplomacy every time they make public statements. Yet very often, Washington officials speaking publicly are thinking about an American audience rather than a foreign one. In today's world of heavy media coverage and instant reporting, it is impossible, and unwise, to imagine that senior officials can speak only to a domestic audience. The daily briefings given at the White House and at the Departments of State and Defense are exchanges almost exclusively with American journalists asking questions that are on the minds of Americans. Rarely are the journalists sensitive to foreign opinions and concerns.

The president and other senior officials, including State Department and Pentagon briefers, must be kept aware of major issues that arise in foreign public opinion so that they can address any important misunderstandings or distortions that affect American interests. They need public diplomacy professionals to monitor and analyze foreign opinion and to report their findings so foreign opinion will be taken into account when policy decisions and statements are made. Sometimes this happens, notably when a particularly egregious mistake is made. For example, after President Bush referred to his war on terrorism as a "crusade," he was told that word was counterproductive for foreign audiences, so he did not repeat it. But Muslims remember, and it would be better had such a mistake not been made in the first place. For that, however, senior officials must be cognizant of the public diplomacy role they invariably play, and well-trained public diplomacy professionals must be there, in adequate numbers and properly placed, to do their work.

Finally, public diplomacy professionals must have an array of communication tools that they can use to carry out their responsibilities. The following paragraphs cover the most important tools for the current circumstances.

A well-designed exchange-of-persons program can be a powerful support for American public diplomacy, again because face-to-face encounters have proven to be the most effective. Scholarships, such as Fulbrights and others, that make it possible for Arab and Muslim students, scholars, and others to come to the United States are extremely valuable means to educate those audiences about all aspects of America. Such programs do not always produce friends, of course. But they produce far more friends than avowed enemies, and knowledgeable critics are usually easier to deal with than ignorant ones.

Similarly, Americans sent abroad to study or lecture can be very helpful. The participants must be carefully chosen to ensure that they are fair-minded. It has been the wise practice not to tell American scholars what to say and for them to tolerate a certain amount of criticism of America because that usually enhances their credibility and effectiveness. Also, Arab Americans and American Muslims can often explain America abroad most effectively, just as the late Alistair Cook used to explain America on the BBC to British audiences.

Accurate, up-to-date, factual information about U.S. policy and developments in American society and culture is also essential to public diplomacy professionals. They must have information if they are to present it effectively to foreign audiences. Accuracy and truthfulness are keys to maintaining credibility in public diplomacy.[80] Officers at embassies abroad depend on daily transmissions from Washington containing texts of U.S. statements, policy guidance messages, excerpts from American media, and reports on developments in the United States. They pass this information to target audiences based on current audience interests, drawing special attention to materials that are helpful.

Publications written for Arab and Muslim audiences can also be helpful tools, especially if they are in local languages. There used to be many such publications, but Congress cut the public diplomacy budget after the Cold War so that most were forced to go out of print. The State Department has revived the idea of magazines in Arabic aimed at Arab readers, which is a most welcome development.

The Voice of America, too, is an important public diplomacy tool because its programs are specifically designed for foreign audiences. Unfortunately, two recent developments have weakened its impact. For many years, VOA was required to follow State Department policy guidance, but under the Clinton administration, this link was broken so that VOA no longer functions in coordination with the government’s public diplomacy professionals. This was a mistake; it should be fixed.

Then in 2002, the VOA Arabic service, which for decades had carried extensive policy-relevant and Americana material to a wide range of Arab audiences, was replaced by Radio Sawa, which mostly plays music for young people, severely reducing the effectiveness of our broadcasting in public diplomacy terms. Although Radio Sawa may be useful in some ways, it does not replace more serious broadcasts. There is no reason that we should be limited to sponsoring only one radio broadcast in Arabic. Radio stations are inexpensive, all things considered, especially when compared with the cost of fighter aircraft or tanks.

Gaining access to foreign media for helpful American material and for interviews with U.S. officials has also proven to be a vital means for reaching the largest numbers of target audience members with the greatest credibility and impact. Again, personal contact with the editors of foreign media is often what persuades them to carry materials and commentaries helpful to understanding the United States. Rather than boycotting al-Jazeera and other Arab media because they carry hostile attacks on the United States, we should seek more access to them. Secretary of State Powell was wise to appear on al-Jazeera; however, very blunt, if private, pressure on the Qatari government to exercise more control over al-Jazeera may be less wise. The U.S. government should not be insisting that other governments censor their media, particularly not in the midst of a campaign to advance democracy in the Arab world.

Several other tools have also proven useful in the past and should be sharpened. One involves overseas libraries and book translations, as suggested in the Djerejian Report. Because these programs take a great deal of time and only pay off in the longer run, however, they should currently be given lower priority due to the urgency of closing the gap with the Arab and Muslim worlds.

Finally, as suggested previously, public diplomacy must have the appropriate organization and adequate funding to be effective. After the end of the Cold War, funding for American public diplomacy declined too fast and too far. This was a terrible mistake. Spending cuts mandated by Congress have reduced the number of public diplomacy professionals working abroad, reduced educational exchange programs, closed libraries, canceled vernacular language magazines, and hampered other efforts. This did not have to happen. The 1999 merger of USIA into the State Department fragmented public diplomacy and undermined it as a profession. The merger did not have to have those consequences, but it did. The coherence and professionalism of the public diplomacy function should be restored, if not by recreating USIA, then by elevating and consolidating it within the State Department. For the future of American foreign policy, it is urgent that we use proven techniques and that we find a better coordinated system and increased funding for public diplomacy for Arab and Muslim audiences.

[79] Polls reported by James J. Zogby, “What Arabs Think,” Zogby International (September 2002), and Shibley Telhami, The Stakes (Boulder: Westview, 2002), 46–49.

[80] In contrast, “propaganda” is usually defined as advocacy that can use lies and distortions and that need not be attributed.

 13. A Civilized Way to Fight Terror

Daoud Kuttab

It might seem like a contradiction to pose the question of how the United States can deal with international terror in a civilized way, but there are many nonviolent things that can be done short of, or alongside, violent responses. To understand what these might be, we must first recognize the nature of the main actor: the United States.

 America the Exceptional

In a unipolar world, in which the United States has lone superpower status on the political, financial, and military levels, much more is expected of America than of any other country. As the world leader, the United States has both a kind of authority as well as a level of responsibility toward the rest of the world that no other actor has. Consequently, U.S. actions, and nonactions, carry much more weight than the actions of other countries. The country's leading status makes everything it does shine brighter than do actions of other countries and sets such actions as reference points, especially for countries in the third world that look up to the United States, even as they criticize it from time to time.

In short, America is exceptional; hence, its words have exceptional impact. What America says or even hints at has wide-ranging effects the world over. This means that with the information age in which we are living, the United States can no longer hide from the rest of the world what it says and does in America. As a result of twenty-four-hour live television, beamed nearly everywhere, every utterance of the U.S. president, his spokespersons, or people in his cabinet and his party can be heard, read, and analyzed within seconds. Statements can no longer be packaged only for a local or ethnic audience. Everyone can hear and read everything within the public discourse.

This consequent need for consistency is essential not only in the content of statements but also in the mood and style of their delivery. A smile, a frown, as well as noteworthy body language can often be interpreted and explained differently from what is intended. So it is not enough for U.S. officials to guard what they say; they need to take an active stance in following up and correcting, if need be, how their views are interpreted the world over.

The authority and power of the words spoken by U.S. officials carry great responsibility. This responsibility requires a greater degree of care about how words might be interpreted and what they might mean in different cultures. When President Bush used the word crusade to describe the U.S. campaign against terrorism, the word took on a life of its own. In the Arab world, the term was translated as "Christian war." The modern American usage of the word as a mere campaign was totally missing. It took some time for the correction to be made and even longer for many in the Arab and Muslim worlds to accept that what was meant was not a religious war but rather a campaign against terrorism.

 Words, Values, and Double Standards

Although words are important, values are an even more important reference point. America has taken on the positive image not only of a successful, powerful, and rich country but also of a country based on great values. The United States stands for the best things people everywhere can hope for. The U.S. Constitution, the First Amendment, and the respect for individual rights are values beyond dispute virtually the world over. These are not just words on paper; for every American, these values are experienced every day in every state of the union.

Unfortunately, however, that is sometimes as far as it goes. Once outside the United States or when dealing with foreign policy, these values are often replaced with a variety of other considerations. People who have not lived in America, especially those who have been on the receiving end of certain realpolitik-oriented U.S. foreign policies, have little appreciation of what America stands for.

For years, people in the Middle East have been exposed to what seems to them a Janus-faced U.S. foreign policy. Human rights, the great Wilsonian concept of the people’s right to self-determination, seems to stop when the subjects of discussion are Palestinians. But this has been the case for some years, so why is antipathy to the United States so high in the Arab world today? What has the United States done recently to trigger this unprecedented response?

Although these are important questions, the answers are not necessarily in any specific action by the United States, but rather in the fact that people around the world have much more access in real time, and in full Technicolor, to acts, events, and pronouncements of American officials regarding foreign policy issues. The spread of satellite television, for example, has meant that stories about, say, the human suffering of Palestinians living under Israeli military occupation enter the sitting rooms of hundreds of millions of people every day. When top U.S. officials defend or justify or merely look away from human rights violations in third world countries, few people can go back and think of the rosy picture of America as the defender of rights and the protector of freedoms.

When Vice President Cheney told Fox television that the United States "understands" Israel's need to assassinate top Palestinian officials, his statement was widely broadcast all over the Arab and Muslim world. To have a senior U.S. official understand the use of U.S. Apache helicopters by an ally in an offensive attack was hard to fathom. Some Arab commentators noted that even Timothy McVeigh was entitled to a trial, while in Palestine, Israeli generals are allowed to act as judge, jury, and executioner, with full support from the world's greatest champion of human rights, democracy, and the rule of law.

The double standard that is seen to be part of U.S. policy mystifies people in the Arab world. They cannot see how such policies can be based on U.S. national interests, let alone U.S. values, if these policies lead to 1.3 billion Muslims being alienated from the United States. Most people know that a country's foreign policy cannot be based solely on values, but where is the interest of the United States in such a result? This question leads many to conclude that the power of domestic groups to influence external policies that are not in the best national interest of the United States must be the explanation.

Most Arabs and Muslims cannot imagine that U.S. sympathy for Israel is based on genuine concern with Israel's security dilemma and its being an outpost of democracy in an otherwise authoritarian region. Their view of Israel has been shaped by a very different historical prism, which many assume America must share because it is so obvious to them. The result is that most Arabs and Muslims have become unsure of whether they are America's friend or foe, and they are prone to explaining U.S. policy behaviors in ways that most Americans, in turn, judge to be peculiar, if not conspiratorial, in nature.

Whatever the reasons for Arab and Muslim attitudes, the public attacks by many of America's own Arab allies against American policy in the Levant and in Iraq have not satisfied a population that daily witnesses what it defines as humiliation against fellow Arabs and Muslims. This is partly because Arab governments have proved themselves completely inept at doing anything about it.

Shortly after the terrorist attacks in New York and Washington, President Bush spoke to the American people calling what happened an attack against America's values. He ended by saying, "We go forward to defend freedom and all that is good and just in our world." For Americans living in the United States, these words sounded true and genuine. But for many around the world, these values have not been translated in U.S. foreign policy; these words were empty rhetoric.

The values that America stands for are the envy of well-informed human beings living in authoritarian countries around the world. Those who have lived in America and who have experienced that great country try their best to tell people around the world about it. They do so hoping that these values can be emulated in their own countries. Those who only see the results of American foreign policy, however, often attack such efforts by pointing to the apparent contradiction between values preached and practices observed.

In the past, the U.S. government was often able to get away with this contradiction. Although accused of not doing enough by some right-wing circles in America, friendly Arab countries would protect the U.S. image, and their government-controlled media would ensure that America's policies were defended. But globalization, which has been a main vehicle of America's recent economic and political successes, has also brought with it media instruments (Internet and satellites) that circumvent government-controlled media and allow people freer access to the reality of U.S. foreign policy. Is it possible that the very instruments of its own success now haunt America? Preaching democracy, human rights, and transparency while supporting despots around the world weakens the U.S. position tremendously.

Within international agencies, this same issue also arises. In 2000, when the U.S. delegation walked out of the UN World Conference against Racism, held in Durban, South Africa, many around the world felt that America had allowed its policy to be hijacked by a single country, and for clearly domestic reasons. A world leader like the United States is expected to have a much more tolerant attitude and to understand that being on top means that it is more likely to be criticized than others. If the United States wants to defeat terrorism, it will have to tolerate indignities it might not otherwise tolerate.

 Against Hopelessness

Although terrorism has different shapes and versions, the most dangerous kind is based on religious conviction. This danger is multiplied when one's mortal life is seen as being worthless, while the eternal life promised by religious leaders seems so grand. To counter such religious zealotry, various levels of responses are needed. Proper religious education and preaching are extremely important in this case. It is also critical to provide young people with alternative examples of religious leaders who can combine spiritual knowledge with a realistic and moderate view of life and world events.

Media geared toward the community where terrorism is based are critical. What is needed is not alternative media through public diplomacy channels, because people in the region will not trust it. Instead, local, indigenous media must be influenced. Although it might be more difficult to get a message into these media outlets, any success with such media can have beneficial long-term effects. Influencing local media should not be limited to news. Drama, soap operas, game shows, and children's programs provide many opportunities that are rarely used to effect change in attitudes.

Public opinion is not restricted to media, of course. Positive role models are needed to encourage young people. For example, sports heroes and music stars can be tapped to give messages of tolerance and moderation.

After all, terrorism does not fall from the sky. It needs a fertile environment in which to develop. Terrorism is not a virtual reality but a real act that requires flesh-and-blood individuals to carry it out. A true search for the causes that drive people to act in such a violent way is a necessary first step in understanding and dealing with this threat. Such an attempt ought not be done in a heavy-handed, arrogant manner, but rather with a genuine interest in understanding those affected. Such empathy is a prerequisite to a true understanding of the underlying causes; without it, we will be unable to tackle those causes in an effective way.

Finally, to tackle these worldwide problems, one must come down to the level of the individuals who are involved. Understanding that terrorism is the weapon of the weak and helpless is a step toward understanding what drives people to carry out such inhumane acts, even at the cost of their own lives. A psychological profile of those carrying out acts of terrorism clearly shows the extremely high level of frustration and helplessness they felt. When a person’s own life becomes so worthless and when the hope of a future disappears, individuals have little care or concern for the lives of others.

Therefore, the best ways to combat terrorism are to change the atmosphere in which it grows and to replace the sense of hopelessness that so many young people experience with a vision for a better tomorrow. Naturally, lip service is not enough. People need to see that realistic and genuine visions are being followed in such a way that they can be convinced that their lives will likely improve. Public diplomacy can be an adjunct to such a process but never a substitute for it.

 14. Relating to the Muslim World: Less Is More?

Ellen Laipson

Twenty-two years ago, Ramadan fell in the middle of summer, and I was residing in Rabat, Morocco, doing research and enjoying the opportunity to live in a Muslim country of great charm and beauty. I had no formal link to the U.S. embassy. However, as a courtesy to me as a Library of Congress employee, I was allowed some office space at the U.S. cultural office, part of what was then called the U.S. Information Agency—since integrated into the Department of State.

The USIA office was in a modest downtown office building that happened to be close to the cultural office of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics. To this day, I remember that USIA virtually shut down its programming during Ramadan, while the Soviets held a daily film program, allowing young people to spend an hour in a cool dark place off the shimmering sidewalks. The films were not memorable, to say the least. But as I sat in the Soviet cultural center, I wondered whether the access provided to these regular folk—decidedly not denizens of the embassy cocktail circuit—would make a lasting impression on their political views.

Perhaps not. But it stimulated me to reflect on whether our own ideas of outreach are too elitist and whether our tradition of respecting others' religion actually cuts us off from benign interactions with people of different faiths. In the years after my visit, the U.S. cultural office moved to the affluent suburbs for security reasons; even fewer Moroccans now have access to films, libraries, or cultural activities sponsored by the U.S. embassy. Today, too, we hear of U.S. reluctance to be visibly associated with secular or missionary schools in the Muslim world, out of fear of offending local sensibilities. In addition, many American nongovernment organizations and embassies struggle to interact in a normal way with "moderate" Islamists without running afoul of all the new antiterrorism rules and regulations.

The secretary of state, meanwhile, hosts elaborate iftar receptions with Muslim ambassadors, and the president has learned to send end-of-Ramadan greetings to Muslim Americans and to Muslim leaders around the world. The United States has much goodwill and good intentions to do the right thing by Muslim friends and partners, but there is clearly a lot of confusion and fumbling, too.

How do we get it right? Is it possible to be fair, open, and honest and have our message understood as transmitted? Or are our efforts to communicate officially with Muslim societies doomed to fail because our own cultural norms are so different from Islamic ones, and because of the agitated state of mind that many, if not most, Muslims have toward the United States these days?

 The New Context of Public Diplomacy

I believe we have serious problems on both the sending side and the receiving side of public diplomacy. We need now to reflect carefully on how much, if any, of the critical society-to-society communication can be managed by government. In the information age, after all, it is increasingly difficult to keep different kinds of messages in distinctly separate channels. Governments have many information-related policies and strategies: there is information generated by the bureaucracy for internal deliberations on policy; there is information in the official exchanges of diplomacy and intelligence prepared to convince allies or to bully adversaries; there is occasionally information deliberately altered to influence a foreign population (psychological operations or propaganda); and then there is the regular press function, with information prepared to inform the American public and the American media about the government's policies and activities. I believe that the information revolution has made it virtually impossible to keep these channels separate. Information moves too fast, and there is much greater transparency in government operations than there used to be. The result is that a message designed for a particular audience is now instantly available to a global audience. It is no longer possible to fine-tune a message for a distant Muslim audience and not have your political rivals at home know about it. It is equally difficult to share with the American public a policy's nuances without having it dissected in salons in Cairo and Karachi.

Public diplomacy, therefore, is an anachronism in today's world, and as such, it is probably doing more harm than good. The transparency required in our own society clashes directly with the notion of manipulating perceptions and opinions. For successful manipulation to occur, you must appear to be doing something sincere and straightforward. But in today's world, we talk in real time about why and how our government functions; one cannot publicly acknowledge that we are "spinning" our stories without that acknowledgment having an effect on the target of the spinning.

Would it not make more sense, therefore, to expand the press and information capacity to work in a more direct and honest way in talking about our policies and, yes, their shortcomings? Couldn't our press spokesmen take on a bit of additional work, giving more background and explanation of our policies, as opposed to the highly condensed sound bites they are expected to provide? Couldn't our media be staffed by people who can retrieve, on request, additional data or background on our policies and their impact?

Public diplomacy as conceived and ridiculed during the Bush administration has been too close to the marketplace and not nearly close enough to the underlying logic of our policies. By admitting that the government was importing some Madison Avenue techniques, we revealed too much of an inclination to our own crass thinking—that policies are commodities that must appeal to the current fads of consumers. The Madison Avenue approach undermined the more noble and often contradictory struggles behind policies that may not please everyone but that nevertheless embody our national aspirations and our democratic processes.

Public diplomacy toward the Muslim world also contains many other pitfalls. Muslims in general and Arabs in particular can distinguish between American consumer goods they like and American official policies they loathe. But we act as if we are surprised that consumers of our goods don't like us after all. We have also conflated the pro-Americanism that may exist in the Muslim world, often very superficially, with support for other aspects of American culture and power. We need to understand the complex attitudes toward us in a more nuanced way. We should not try to label people in the region; it is an insult to them and to our own political culture, which professes to have high tolerance for political disagreement.

 Missing the Mark

There are at least three specific respects in which our efforts to communicate with Muslim audiences from official platforms have missed the mark:

economics, the pace of change, and the role of religion in public life. Let’s take a quick look at each.

* Economics

When we try to commoditize our foreign policy for Muslims, we show glaring insensitivity to prevailing views about economic values. In mainstream American political discourse, free elections and free markets are equally important principles. For Muslim believers, however, the allocation of resources needs to address social justice, which resembles an economic model probably closer to European social democratic party positions than to American capitalism. Muslims may be able to embrace some, even many, of the core political concepts we hold dear, but preaching capitalism to societies with already distorted markets and income distributions—and with rampant poverty—may not make sense to most Arabs. It sets us up for a policy failure.

Of course, there are many capitalists in Muslim societies who have thrived due to their entrepreneurial skills and their business acumen. They are important members of the political and social elite in Egypt, Syria, North Africa, and Pakistan. Sometimes these capitalists become advocates for economic reforms because they are more attuned to the need to adapt to new EU policies, for example, or because they see opportunities in seeking free trade agreements with the United States. But when we think about the broader malaise in the Muslim Middle East, we are often talking about the part of the population that has not benefited from the profits of the private sector. New linkages between our capitalist system and Arab economic elites would not foster greater sympathy or support for U.S. policies among the ranks of the unemployed.

If we are truly open to an agenda for change in the region, as the Bush administration has declared, then we must be in a listening mode. Demand for change in the Arab world or in the large Muslim societies of southern Asia does not even remotely mean that would-be reformers or democrats would choose the American model, which has no social safety net, underfunded retirement programs, and no universal health care. Instead, agents for change who may be our best partners on the political side may have quite different ideas about how to distribute and share a state's wealth and its foreign aid revenues. It is important that we show some flexibility and tolerance; a relentless drumbeat extolling the virtues of the Washington consensus on market economics will not serve our broader goals in the Muslim world.

* Timing

We also miss each others' signals when it comes to matters of timing. Americans are impatient and want to measure attitudes of the moment. Our public diplomacy bureaucrats want to know how people in other countries are reacting to our "message" so that they can fine-tune it for the next poll, or even for the next day's news cycle. But attitudes in nondemocratic societies, where most Muslims live, are not easily changed. Cynicism from living with hypocritical rulers does not easily dissipate, as is evident in post-Saddam Iraq. The would-be democrats of the Muslim world have acquired some deeply ingrained beliefs about how the world works, and these beliefs cannot be shaken quickly with a few advertisements or articles.

We must reconcile ourselves to the fact that attitudes and behavior do not change quickly and that our efforts to manipulate or change deeply ingrained beliefs and experiences are often feckless. If attempted in culturally inappropriate ways, these efforts can do more harm than good and, in so doing, can feed the region's robust proclivity to conspiracy theories. For example, in our saturated information market, there is enormous pressure to have "news" of change in Iraq that actually misinforms world publics about how change truly does occur.

* Religion in the Public Sphere

We do a poor job communicating about religion in public and about the ties between religion and state. Clearly, across the Muslim world, theologians and independent thinkers are in a fierce and important debate on this issue. There is a wide range of issues and opinions: Should clergy be employees of the state? Have Iran's clerics been given, or taken, too much authority in matters of state? How should new constitutions address religion in societies where not all citizens are Muslim?

The United States, again, cannot claim to have the answers to such questions. Americans are raised with a myth about the separation of church and state, but our behavior suggests considerable confusion on the point. We have had presidents, including George W. Bush, who are deeply religious and speak of their beliefs in ways that can alienate or offend citizens who hold different beliefs, or who do not believe the president should see his official duties as having any religious content whatsoever.

Meanwhile, the secretary of state invites Muslim diplomats to the formal diplomatic rooms at the Department of State to celebrate the breaking of the fast on Ramadan. At first glance, many are pleased, even touched, at this gesture of cultural goodwill to the world's Muslims. But such a gesture seems strange, even patronizing, as a public demonstration of respect for a religious rite. Would it not be simpler and truer to our own principles to be consistent with respect to defining religion as a private matter? All that a liberal, Lockean state needs to do is create and preserve an environment in which there is freedom of religion and tolerance for all. Wouldn't that be the most appropriate U.S. message for the Muslim world?

 Other Ways to Communicate

I am not suggesting that engaging with Muslim societies is too hard or should not be a goal of U.S. policy. I am simply suggesting that "public diplomacy" is not the way to do it. If one considers the current structure of the State Department, there is an undersecretary for public diplomacy and public affairs, with three bureaus reporting to that senior official (the Charlotte Beers position, vacant for many months until filled briefly by Margaret Tutweiler). The three bureaus that report to the undersecretary run important and useful programs that permit interaction with diverse groups in Muslim societies. There are cultural and educational programs, media exchanges, training opportunities, and more. I would reallocate the funding of this part of the State Department to maximize impact on the long-haul issues, education in particular. I would phase out the more questionable public diplomacy activities that have generated controversy with no discernible benefit to the United States.

For example, our press activities should be expanded. We should help new foreign media establish professional standards—a worthy contribution as countries even in the more closed parts of the Muslim world make the transition from government monopolies on news and information to the wider world of open information.

If we are open to changing our ways of engaging with the Muslim world in the hopes of avoiding further estrangement, we also need to grapple with the elitism of our policies. More often than not, our programs are looking for winners, trying to scout out future leaders in whom to invest. This is true across a range of overseas activities that the U.S. government supports, with the notable exception of antipoverty programs and humanitarian relief activities. In diplomatic, educational, and military exchanges, we aim high. We are looking to invest in success, in individuals who may well emerge as a next generation of leaders and decision makers.

There is nothing inherently wrong with this policy, but it may not be sufficient as a communications strategy. Given the widening gap between haves and have-nots in Muslim societies, should we not also try to reach out to the populations that are vulnerable to hatred and despair and violence? Might a different kind of U.S. engagement help prevent the spread of suicide bombers? Former U.S. peace negotiators have expressed regret for neglecting civil society in Israel and Palestine, the nonofficial populations that must minimally accept the governments' policies for those policies to succeed, even in nondemocratic places. One former negotiator, Aaron David Miller, now heads Seeds for Peace, the innovative program that brings teenagers from key conflict zones (Arab-Israel, India-Pakistan) to the United States to communicate and even form bonds of friendship. It is worth considering whether a restructuring of programming priorities from elites to a mix that includes more popular audiences, and young people in particular, might not be the strategic investment that this particular historic juncture requires.

These modest ideas remain at a level of generality and cannot adequately address the deep divide that exists between the West and segments of Muslim society in a large group of countries. Generalizations can also cause harm by failing to recognize the enormous diversity of both American and Muslim societies. In the end, it is up to individuals to build the bridges and to find ways to communicate. In an increasingly interdependent world, more business partnerships, marriages, and friendships can be formed, and we should encourage and celebrate those ties. But governments do matter because they represent, for good or ill, the idea of a nation, the aspirations of a culture and its people. Our government has labored hard, and many individuals do so with great sensitivity and skill, but we need to look very closely at our policies and our style of communicating with the Muslim world. Perhaps it's time for our government to simplify and reduce the number of information initiatives it generates toward the Muslim world and to spend more time making sure its policies are wise and grounded in fairness and principle. Then the communication piece will follow naturally.

 15. A Practical Guide to Tapping America's Underappreciated, Underutilized Anti-Islamist Allies across the Muslim World

Robert Satloff

With more than 1.3 billion Muslims worldwide, it is not realistic for the United States government—working both independently and in concert with other governments, international organizations, and private initiatives—to thoroughly "drain the swamp" in which Islamist[81] terrorist organizations find their recruits. Even if one were to accept a low-end estimate of the number of Islamists worldwide (say, 5 percent of all Muslims) and a low-end estimate of the number of terrorists or their activist sympathizers—financiers, logistical supporters, ideological advocates—among them (say, 1 percent of all Islamists), then there are at least 600,000 hard-core radicals fishing for followers in a sea of at least 60,000,000 potential recruits.[82] To identify, target, isolate, co-opt, and, in some cases, neutralize the former is a gargantuan task. To do the same to the latter is patently impossible.

If fully “draining the swamp” is not achievable, however, there remains much that can be done to decrease the number of Muslims who become Islamists and to decrease the number of Islamists who become terrorists or their activist sympathizers. Each of these challenges requires different tools and different strategies. In essence, whereas decreasing the number of Islamists who become terrorists is principally the province of intelligence and security agencies, decreasing the number of Muslims who become Islamists is a much wider concern that touches on numerous aspects of U.S. foreign policy.

Curtailing the appeal of Islamism should be a matter of prime importance to practitioners of what is popularly known as “public diplomacy.” To many, public diplomacy is merely a less grating term for “public relations abroad,” or the less-than-fine-art of packaging and selling America to foreign audiences. Although that is an element of the larger picture, public diplomacy is—or ought to be—much more than that.

Just as traditional diplomacy revolves around strengthening allies, weakening adversaries, and advancing America’s interests and values, the same can be said of public diplomacy. Although the targets are different (peoples, not government) and the operational time frame is often longer, the objectives are similar: empowering friends, undermining the influence of adversaries, and nurturing popular understanding of (and, one hopes, support for) U.S. national interests and values. Unfortunately, too few professional public diplomats view their mission in terms of allies and adversaries. Indeed, the fundamental problem of U.S. public diplomacy in the post–September 11 era is that it has rarely evinced a clear sense of mission, has rarely differentiated clearly between friend and foe, and has rarely focused its energies on extending a helping hand to those elements in society—especially in Muslim-majority countries—that are America’s natural allies in the struggle against radical Islamism.

Defining a detailed, full-scale, soup-to-nuts program to achieve those objectives is beyond the scope of this brief essay. However, what follows are three broad suggestions that, if implemented, would begin to put U.S. public diplomacy squarely on the right side of the fight against Islamism.

 Identifying and Supporting Allies

As noted above, the overwhelming majority of the world's Muslims are not Islamists. However, Islamists are often highly motivated and well funded. Although they are not choreographed by some all-knowing Islamist wizard, they coordinate well among themselves and (especially the nonviolent ones) have a sophisticated, long-range plan to advance their goals. They are people of action. In contrast, non-Islamist Muslims are defined more by who they are not rather than by who they are. They range across political and religious spectra, from radical atheists to secular, lapsed Muslims to pious, traditional, orthodox believers. They have no common program, no organizational cohesion, no way even to know who in society shares their views.

An important, and rarely pursued, step toward minimizing recruits to Islamism is to identify the potential allies among these non-Islamist Muslims, build networks of common purpose among them, and show that the United States supports them in the currency that matters in local society—that is, visibility and money.

This task requires a different sort of outreach effort than is the norm for U.S. embassies in the Muslim world. Rather than seek out "moderate Islamists" for dialogue designed to promote understanding of U.S. policies and to narrow differences over contested issues, this alternative approach would have U.S. embassies pointedly avoid contact with Islamists (except for intelligence gathering). Instead, it highlights contacts with liberal, even secular, anti-Islamist individuals and organizations. Invitations to embassy functions, participation in ambassadorial press conferences, and opportunities for exchange visits and study tours to the United States are all ways for U.S. officials to shower favor upon groups and individuals. These actions should be viewed as arrows in the larger public diplomacy quiver, for even in this era of pessimistic Pew Research Center polls of America's standing abroad, the imprimatur of the United States is sorely coveted. So are the dollars that U.S. governmental agencies and quasi-official nongovernmental organizations (like the National Endowment for Democracy's recipient agencies) dole out to local groups.

In all these programs, the guiding principle should be that the United States supports its current friends and would welcome new ones. Local political communities around the Muslim world are sophisticated: when they see that anti-Islamists of varying stripes (whether female entrepreneurs, crusading investigative journalists, or kids who win English-language spelling bees) are featured at embassy events, receive embassy grants, and win trips to the United States—with nary an Islamist among them—the message will be clear. Conversely, a clear and damaging message is transmitted when Islamists, even of the mild variety, are the honored guests, lucky beneficiaries, and welcome visitors on those events, grants, and trips.

In addition to highlighting contact with cultural and political allies, U.S. embassies abroad and U.S. public diplomacy in general should focus efforts on networking among groups and individuals that, at least on the Islamist issue, share a common approach. Like building a popular front against Nazism in World War II or against Communism in the Cold War, this may involve bringing together people of very different world-views to work together for the larger cause of fighting the spread of Islamism. Ironically, U.S. officials who either shun “secularists” for fear of offending Muslim sensibilities, or who have little expertise in distinguishing between traditionalist Muslims and Islamists, are more likely to be reluctant to adopt this approach than are local anti-Islamist Muslims themselves. Because the latter are on the “front line,” facing the rising tide of Islamism in schools, mosques, youth groups, grassroots organizations, and civic groups, they are more likely to take risks. The United States should not leave such allies and potential allies out in the cold.

Building such networks is not only important for creating a force-multiplier of reformist activism to counter the Islamists, it is also useful for identifying individuals who could play lead roles in specific public policy issues. Curriculum reform, for example, is a critical battleground of the culture wars in many Muslim societies. The traditional U.S. approach is to offer technical assistance to ministries of education (in the form of consultants, study trips to the United States, the professional advice of English-language officers at embassies, and so forth). However, these efforts periodically fuel criticism and resentment toward U.S. interference in one of the most sensitive areas of local concern.

A more effective and longer-lasting change—and one with fewer fingerprints of U.S. intervention—would result from behind-the-scenes U.S. endorsement of key reform-minded people from within the bureaucracy and civil society to positions of authority on the local and national review boards often formed to review curricula. Trying to influence the composition of various government bodies both removes the United States from direct interference in the actual process of curriculum reform and ensures that right-thinking people will be in important positions when the current battle is over and the next one is ready to be joined. This can only be achieved if U.S. embassies have already done the vital work of identifying local allies and building a communications infrastructure for networking among them.

 Empowering Allies

Although lending visible political support to anti-Islamists is essential, it is not sufficient. The U.S. government should also find innovative ways to strengthen its local anti-Islamist allies. One critical, yet low-cost, arena in which the United States can empower anti-Islamists is in the information field.

One of the lesser-known phenomena in Arab and Muslim society in recent years is the flowering of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs). From remote mountainous regions in the High Atlas to the urban slums of Cairo, these organizations have sprouted up to fulfill all sorts of communal and social needs. Sometimes they emerge from the commitment of local community organizers. Sometimes they are creatures of the government, which may construct ad hoc local groups to perform special functions or fulfill services that the government chooses to channel outside the formal system. Sometimes they are local branches of organizations that have large, international followings.

Whatever their origins, tens of thousands of these organizations now exist throughout the Middle East, and a large number of them are Islamist in orientation. Many of these are registered with local governments in accordance with law, but many others operate in a legal vacuum. In a region where the central government's delivery of basic social services is notoriously bad, NGOs have emerged in many places to supply what governments either cannot or do not provide. Of course, Islamist organizations only compensate for a small fraction of what governments are not able or willing to do, but the model they offer still provides a pathway for the spread of Islamist thought and, possibly, terrorist sympathies to millions of Muslims.

Throughout Arab and Muslim countries, for example, Islamist NGOs—many financed from Saudi Arabia, some with al Qaeda links—have established powerful networks of Islamist-oriented social welfare initiatives. Following a long-term strategy of nurturing the next generation of Islamists, some of the most insidious Islamist NGOs focus exclusively on children. (Hence, for example, they might opt to fund primary schools, youth camps, and after-school programming but not current needs of the adult population, such as adult literacy programs, vocational training classes, or battered women's shelters.) Often, these NGOs operate without formal government license because their services often fill a local need. Local administrators often either look the other way or welcome these organizations, regardless of what officialdom in faraway capitals might prefer (or say they prefer).

Among anti-Islamists, even without knowing about the shadier international links of many of these groups, there is a rising sense of alarm at the spread of such Islamist social welfare activities. Many civic activists, including journalists, would take up the cudgel against the presence of these foreign-funded Islamist organizations and would be especially moved to act if they knew about the possible terrorist connections of some of these outfits. What these activists lack, however, is information, such as documentary evidence describing the political activities and funding sources of these groups and, when it exists, evidence of connection to terrorist acts and organizations. Such information is, to a large extent, part of the U.S. public record, from court transcripts, FBI documents, and congressional reports and testimonies. Indeed, the Treasury Department's Office of Foreign Asset Control publishes a list of "specially designated nationals and blocked persons" that, in the version of September 23, 2003, is 116 pages long. Many of the institutions cited on this list are the same Islamist NGOs that are active in many corners of the Muslim world.[83]

A simple, low-cost but high-value solution would be the creation of a user-friendly, Internet-based clearinghouse of information in Arabic and other local languages, outlining the operations, management, administration, financing, and personnel of all Islamist-oriented initiatives and NGOs and the linkages among them. Such an effort, if brought to the attention of the growing number of anti-Islamist activists and organizations through an aggressive, imaginative outreach campaign, would be a forceful stimulant to action. Information is power, and this sort of information would help empower anti-Islamist Muslims who are concerned about the direction of their own countries and communities to take matters into their own hands.

 Nurturing Future Allies

In the campaign to limit the spread of Islamism, identifying, supporting, and empowering current allies is necessary but still not sufficient. To stand any chance of undercutting the Islamists' popular appeal, the United States must invest much more substantially in developing new and future allies. Here, a central battleground is children's education. Indeed, this is one area in which anti-Islamists should take their cue from Islamists, who, as noted above, have made the battle for the "hearts and minds" of young people a top priority. So far, the United States is not even putting up a fight.

In approaching this problem, it is important to remember another lesson learned from the Islamists: the power of example. In the context of populous countries like Egypt, Morocco, Algeria, and Yemen, Islamist social welfare programming is a proverbial drop in the bucket compared with what actual needs are, and even compared with what existing governments currently do. In a medium-sized town, for example, Islamists may successfully operate a model school, a professionally staffed hospital, or a well-functioning day-care center, but they cannot replace the government's massive, though admittedly broken-down, educational or health care systems. Like terrorists who have learned the ways of asymmetric warfare against conventional armies, Islamists have mastered the tools of reaping considerable public sympathy from providing examples of a better-run alternative system without having the responsibility or burden of actually providing such an alternative system.

Curtailing the popular appeal of Islamism should be pursued with a similar strategy. Although the U.S. government can provide some assistance to help fix local school systems, the problems are too huge—and the Islamist challenge is too urgent—to rely on that approach. Instead, Washington needs to develop alternative opportunities for anti-Islamist excellence and highly visible models of it.

Promoting English-language education should be a central focus of this effort. Knowing English does not necessarily translate into liberal thought or pro-Americanism, as the legacy of Islamist radicals from Sayyid Qutb to the September 11 bombers underscores. But English is both a portal to Anglo-American culture as well as the access route to the Internet-based information revolution. Knowing English at least gives a resident in a Muslim-majority country the opportunity to learn about America and make judgments about its policies and values without the filter of translation or reliance on biased sources of information. Indeed, studies show that access to information is not itself the key criterion in shaping views on U.S. policy; rather, it is access to different sorts and sources of information—for example, CNN versus al-Jazeera—that could be the key to determining attitudes toward the United States.[84]

Specific initiatives that could be pursued in this strategy include the following:

- Create “English-for-all” after-school programs, at no or nominal cost to parents, in cities and towns throughout the Muslim world. This should be pursued cooperatively with existing NGOs as well as with the governments of other English-speaking countries and the English Speaking Union, the British-based organization that seeks to promote the use of the English language around the globe. Similarly, U.S. funds should subsidize the high fees that older students are currently asked to pay for English-language training at specialized programs like AMIDEAST, thereby making those classes more accessible to a wider segment of the population. Few steps could earn the United States more goodwill in Muslim countries than to invest enough money to make English-language study free or extremely low-cost.

- Expand the existing paltry financial support for American-style educational opportunities for students of all ages throughout the Muslim world. Of the 185 U.S. government-recognized “American schools” around the world, fully one-quarter are in Muslim-majority countries and one-tenth are in Arab countries.[85] These schools—ready-made incubators of pro-Americanism—receive paltry levels of assistance from the U.S. government, only $8 million out of a combined annual operating budget of $450 million. Some schools receive as little as 1 percent of their annual operating budget from government funds. Many of these schools attract high concentrations—one-third to one-half—of local students but their often five-digit tuition fees mean that only wealthy, elite local children can attend, sometimes without regard to academic excellence. (Tuition fees for most other students are paid for by governments and international corporations.) Washington should target schools in Arab and Muslim countries for expanded merit-based, academic scholarship funds. These would help to expand the pool of local entrants and to reach beyond “old money” families to the rising middle class who yearn for a U.S.-style education and who are willing to pay substantial sums for it, but who cannot afford the exorbitant costs that cash-strapped schools are forced to charge to make ends meet.

- Support the development of U.S.-style universities throughout the Muslim world through enhanced distance-learning facilities, provision of books and supplies, educational training grants, and the like. The long-term goal should be the creation of at least one fully accredited English-language university in every country. The fact that new, U.S.-style, English-language universities are opening throughout the Muslim world—Kuwait’s is the most recent, scheduled to begin instruction in September 2004—is a trend to be embraced and cultivated. Given the heightened security concerns about foreign students in the United States, combined with a financial crunch that forced a cutback in foreign Muslim and Arab students in the United States well before September 11, promoting U.S.-style universities in Muslim countries is an especially smart idea.

- Promote the distribution in Muslim countries of overstock U.S. textbooks and academic materials. Current law provides for tax breaks for book publishers to donate overstocks, but the number of books that make their way to Arab or Muslim countries is shockingly low.[86]

- Integrate the U.S. private sector, especially U.S. companies operating abroad, in English-language promotion. This could range from developing incentive programs that promise postgraduation employment for students who complete certain coursework or technical training to providing tax incentives to corporations that provide financial support to book-purchasing initiatives, English-language programs, or scholarship funds in their local overseas communities.

Even a long list of initiatives such as this (and the list could be much longer) will only touch a relatively small number of students at all ages. But just as Islamists enjoy a reputation for providing efficient social welfare services far beyond the actual reach of people that receive such services, so, too, will the example of successful English-language programming attract admirers far beyond the actual number of students that directly benefit from it. And along the way, the United States will have invested in the next generation of Muslim allies to carry on the campaign to limit the appeal of Islamism.

 A Diplomacy of Doing

There is a tendency to see public diplomacy as mainly talking: whether through radio broadcasts, speaker programs, or print publications and the like. That is about as inadequate a view of public diplomacy as demarching foreign governments is of traditional diplomacy. To be effective, public diplomacy requires action—assertive, aggressive, creative efforts to engage foreign publics, nurture friends, empower allies, build future supporters, and undercut the leverage of America’s adversaries. To succeed against as wily and sophisticated a challenge as Islamism requires resorting to means not usually the hallmark of traditional diplomacy. These means include more public-private partnerships, for example, and the encouragement of a more entrepreneurial, risk-taking, opportunistic, and decentralized way of doing business by America's embassies and diplomats.

This, in turn, will require changes from the current pattern of foreign service recruitment, education, training, and placement. Indeed, to a great extent, a successful public diplomacy campaign against Islamism means a throwback to the days before all diplomacy was directed from Washington, to the era when embassies and diplomats were active, frontline agents in the advance of American national interests. Only a diplomatic corps imbued with mission, charged with action, and unleashed from bureaucracy can win the friends and allies America needs to triumph in the battle to curtail the appeal of Islamism.

[81] Islamist is defined here as a Muslim who seeks—either through peaceful or violent means—the imposition of Qur'anic law (Sharia) and a Qur'anic-based state, rejecting the legitimacy of the existing political structure in his/her country or region. Although organically antidemocratic (i.e., opposed to "rule of the people"), Islamists can equally reject democratic systems and monarchical ones, the principal point of departure for them being the imperative to impose "divine law" in place of human-made systems of governance.

[82] Daniel Pipes, for example, suggests that "perhaps 10 to 15 percent" of all Muslims subscribe to "militant Islam." See Pipes, Militant Islam Reaches America (New York: W.W. Norton, 2002), 3.

[83] For the OFAC list, periodically updated, see http://www.treas.org/office/eotffc/ofac/sdn/t11sdn.pdf.

[84] See Matthew A. Gentzkow and Jesse M. Shapiro, “Education, Media and Anti-Americanism in the Muslim World,” a study by two Harvard University students based on data from the 2002 Gallup poll of the Islamic World, http://www.people.fas.harvard.edu/~jmshapir/summary100303.pdf.

[85] For details on American schools around the world, see the Web site of the U.S. State Department’s Office of Overseas Schools, http://www.state.gov/m/a/os/.

[86] For details of tax exemptions and one overseas book-distribution program, see the Sabre Foundation, http://www.sabre.org.

* Last Exhibit

 16. Anti-Americanism, U.S. Foreign Policy, and the War on Terrorism

Adam Garfinkle

To the extent that those who do not like America admit the fact, nearly all contend that the reason lies not with them but with and within America. A few such persons go beyond dislike to hatred, and a few of those go from passive to active expressions of that hatred. A few of those active expressions are violent, and a few of those, if they randomly target civilians, are terrorist. And a very few of those, if they cross trend lines with WMD proliferation, are arguably the most dangerous national security threat facing America today.

Now, if anti-Americanism is really the fault of the United States, if American policies justify the hatred of others toward the United States, then it follows logically that we can eliminate the terrorist threat if and only if we change our policies. If that is true, then all our exertions at public diplomacy, all our efforts to understand the sociology of the Arab and Muslim worlds, all our labors to liberalize the political cultures of the Middle East are pointless and futile. If such a view were true, it would be very important to know it, because such knowledge could save us an enormous amount of time, money, and misplaced expectations. Armed with such knowledge, we could simply economically change the bad policies with dispatch, and that, presumably, would be that.

A good example of that very view is exemplified in a fairly recent article by Lamis Andoni, a Jordanian journalist who is by no means a radical, a terrorist, or an irrational hysteric. This well-known and well-respected Arab journalist is sure that American policies “perpetuate inequities and exacerbate regional conflicts,” which is a code phrase, of course, for America’s support for Israel. That support is why, Andoni claims, “neither U.S. control over the flow of news, nor the efforts of Pentagon and Madison Avenue spin doctors, can ease the resentment of U.S. policies and actions that have affected the lives, hearts, and minds of the people of the region.”

More than that, Andoni is “alarmed” that “the United States fails to realize that a foreign policy based solely on such principles of power and domination leave no room for legitimate political opposition, driving all discontent into the camp of extremists and terrorists.”[87] Hence the conclusion, so widespread even among those who do not hate America, that we “deserved” what we got on September 11, 2001. We presumably deserved what we got because we exacerbate conflicts, and we are responsible for authoritarian Arab and Muslim governments that repress all dissent and force people to extremism and terrorism. Our victimhood, in short, is all our own fault.

Those who believe this line of argument are thoroughly unconcerned about the principles and interests that might be adversely affected by abrupt and major changes in U.S. policy. They are unconcerned for one, or both, of two reasons. The first reason is the assumption that there would be no adverse effects—that policies that deserve to be hated ought to be changed, terrorism or no terrorism. The second is that no principle or interest could be as important as eliminating the threat of mass-casualty terrorism that confronts America.

If the situation is really so simple and clear-cut, why, then, do such supposedly terrible and counterproductive U.S. policies persist as they do? Many abroad, and some in the United States, who take this point of view have a handy explanation: because U.S. policy is in thrall to a powerful domestic lobby—the Jews.[88] It never occurs to most such people that the president and those of his cabinet members who are relevant to foreign policy—none of whom are Jews—might have good reasons, fully in the U.S. national interest, for the policies they determine. Were these people to acknowledge such reasons, however, it would mean that their own views were not so obviously justified after all. So, those who hold such views of the origins of U.S. policies instead prefer explanations based on plots and conspiracies because those explanations are so easy on the brain and are so comforting to preconceived biases.

Not a single element of what we may call the Andoni et al. argument is correct. Only some anti-Americanism is a function of American policy, and the most dangerous kind linked to terrorism really is not (of which, more below). Changing good, reasonable policies under the pressure of terrorist threats would not make us safer. To the contrary, it would unleash a feeding frenzy of pressure on American interests worldwide. A self-interested, parochial cabal does not control American foreign policy against the national interest. Nor is it true, as always implied if not always stated, that U.S. support for Israel is really at the top of every Arab and Muslim’s agenda, despite the efforts of al-Jazeera’s electronic yellow journalism to make it so.[89] And American foreign policy is most certainly not based solely on “principles of power and domination.”

For what it may be worth, the United States is also not responsible for the rise of authoritarian government in the Middle East. Such authoritarianism was firmly in place long before American influence arrived on the scene, and our capacity to change it today is much more limited than many think. In addition, the very same people who chastise us for intervening imperially into affairs that are supposedly none of our business are often the first ones to urge us to intervene into the affairs of those they dislike and wish to constrain or harm.

But because the general story line sketched above is so widely believed in the Middle East, and increasingly in Europe, public diplomacy and other “soft” instruments of American policy are necessary and important and can surely do some good if wisely employed.

Of course, there are limits. We will never convince most of our enemies that their addled, paranoid, conspiratorial way of seeing the world is mistaken, and we must still do what we think is right, even if others misunderstand our motives for doing it. The clearest and most unapologetic articulation of this truth is that of Fouad Ajami:

<quote>

There should be no illusions about the sort of Arab landscape that America is destined to find if, or when, it embarks on a war against the Iraqi regime. There would be no “hearts and minds” to be won in the Arab world, no public diplomacy that would convince the overwhelming majority of Arabs that this war would be a just war. An American expedition in the wake of thwarted UN inspections would be seen by the vast majority of Arabs as an imperial reach into their world, a favor to Israel, or a way for the United States to secure control over Iraq’s oil. No hearing would be given to the great foreign power.

America ought to be able to live with this distrust and discount a good deal of this anti-Americanism as the “road rage” of a thwarted Arab world—the congenital condition of a culture yet to take full responsibility for its self-inflicted wounds. There is no need to pay excessive deference to the political pieties and givens of the region.[90]

</quote>

All of this is true enough. But that misunderstanding, as pervasive as it is, is an autonomous factor—it is part of our problem, and not, all things considered, a small part. We can convince some in the Middle East that this story line is wrong, not least because it is wrong. We have to try. To try, however, we need a more sophisticated understanding of anti-Americanism and of a growing Middle Eastern anti-Semitism that is closely related to it.

 The Nature of Anti-Americanism

There is loose in the world a perception of sharply rising anti-Americanism. That perception resides not least in the minds of many newspaper and journal editors and sundry other intellectuals, both in the United States and abroad. The frequent repetition of this perception bears influence in its own right, whether or not the facts match the perception—and to a considerable extent, they don't.

Let's be honest: much of the commentary on rising anti-Americanism presumes a cause—the supposed arrogance, self-absorption, and unilateralism of the George W. Bush administration. Those members of the "commentariat" who accept this characterization of the U.S. administration often begin with a conclusion that then presumes to sire its own factual premise.[91]

The actual facts say otherwise. True, there has been an increase in anti-Americanism in the past few years, and there has been a sharp spike corresponding to the period of the war in Iraq. But the increase has not been nearly as great as the commentariat typically suggests, and the reasons for the increase are more varied than usually averred. So says not only the U.S. Department of State's global opinion monitors but also a host of private professional polling and opinion analysis organizations.

Of course, measuring opinion is notoriously difficult, even in one's own country. It is harder still in countries with different attitudes toward the press and the common weal in general. Establishing the reasons that people express the opinions they do is harder still (of which also, more below). The beginning of wisdom in making one's way through this thorny topic is recognizing that distinctions matter. Anti-Americanism is, in truth, not one phenomenon but several.

Some people loathe the very idea of America. Even after “the end of history,” in Francis Fukuyama’s famous phrase, there are those who disparage the institutions of constitutional liberalism, who deprecate democracy, and who despise free-market economies. There are still many outside the zone of Western culture who equate liberty with license and equality under the law with the violation of some imagined hierarchy thought to inhere in nature itself. Opposition to America as an idea is an old prejudice indeed, going back to the very founding of the Republic. One may call it philosophical anti-Americanism.

Others do not like what they know of American culture, which inundates many societies these days without asking the permission of their elders. Not everyone likes popular cultural artifacts that are steeped in vulgarity, disrespect for elders and teachers, and countless variations on puerile promiscuity; even in the United States, there are a few of us left who feel the same way. We see, however, that freedom entails the right of others to debase themselves, and we know that we need not join their clubs if we do not wish to do so. But many abroad miss this subtlety. One may call their distate cultural anti-Americanism.

Still others like neither the particular policies of the American government nor the key personalities in a particular American administration. We may call this contingent anti-Americanism.

Sometimes philosophical, cultural, and contingent forms of anti-Americanism overlap. Often, however, they do not. Nor are these three varieties or facets of anti-Americanism evenly distributed around the world. The data show the sharpest contemporary anti-Americanism to be concentrated in two groups; but, as we will see, these groups do not much share the same kind of anti-Americanism.

The first of these groups is large: average citizens in most Arab and many majority-Muslim societies. Anti-Americanism is often expressed in these societies in terms of particular policies: toward the Arab-Israeli conflict, toward the stationing of U.S. military forces in the region, and, until spring 2003, toward the sanctions regime against Iraq (and since then toward the American “occupation” of Iraq). Many people in the Arab and Muslim worlds distinguish between America and the American people on the one hand, and the American government on the other. This distinction is why it is really not so hard to understand why the same people who publicly excoriate America in one breath are often eager to express a desire to visit, work, and even immigrate to the United States in the next.

Not all Arab and Muslim anti-Americanism is of the contingent sort. Certainly, the supporters of Osama bin Laden are possessed of a rabid philosophical anti-Americanism. But in between the typical man on the street and the Islamist ideologue is a growing cultural anti-Americanism.

In this era of information technology diffusion, cultural anti-Americanism is spreading worldwide. So too, oddly enough as it would seem, is the popularity of American massmarket culture—rock music, jeans, backward baseball caps, and the rest. This seeming contradiction is not a contradiction at all, however. The fact is that rapid social change, accelerated by the information revolution, has produced a huge generation gap in many traditional and transitional societies. The young abroad tend to anathematize American policies while embracing American styles. Older people tend to anathematize American styles, regardless of what they may think and feel about American policies.

America’s image in the world, popular or not, is seriously distorted by our pop cultural extrusions. The source of the distortion exists, in part, because Hollywood and the American advertising culture export images of America abroad that do not match American social realities.

Several studies—including many directed by Dr. George Gerbner at the University of Pennsylvania’s Annenberg School of Communications—have shown, for example, that characters on network television are at least fifty times more likely to fall victim to acts of violence than the citizens of the real America. Violence is even more prevalent in exports of American television shows and movies, for the simple reason that the main expense in preparing a film for export is the cost of translation, whether dubbing or writing subtitles. The richer and more subtle the dialogue and plot, the harder and more costly the translation. Explosions and gunfire, alas, do not require translation, so films rich in such pyrotechnics are usually cheaper to export, hence more profitable for the studios.

In American entertainment exports, depictions of sex outside marriage are nine to fourteen times more common than dramatizations of marital sex. This is a fictional proportionality, one can safely assume, that is wildly out of whack with the real America. It would be wildly out of whack even with the real France, Italy, and Germany. One hopes so, anyway.

For better and for worse, there is little the U.S. government can do about America's entertainment industry exports. However, the cumulative impact of those exports on how America is seen and judged outside our borders is not so small. This is particularly so in parts of the world where traditional religious attitudes toward sexuality remain intact—in other words, where they resemble attitudes almost universally held in the United States until only a few generations ago. (It is very important for Americans to realize that the values gap between American society and societies like those of Iran and Egypt has been produced not by recent changes in Iran and Egypt but by recent changes in America.)

The second major focus of contemporary anti-Americanism is much smaller in terms of the number of people involved: certain groups of intellectuals, mainly in Europe. But the influence of a small number of intellectuals is not thereby small. Ideas, even bad ones, have power. For these groups, disenchantment with American policies is more the pretext for an anti-Americanism that is philosophically deep-seated. This philosophical anti-Americanism has an old pedigree in resentment of a free and socially freewheeling America by the conservative, aristocratic blue bloods of Europe.

That such a prejudice, in somewhat modified form, has spread to the European Left over the past half-century is an ironic and interesting development. This spread can be seen in the recent book by Emmanuel Todd, Aprés I'Empire: Essai sur la décomposition du systéme américain, which was enormously popular and influential in France, and elsewhere in Europe, just before and during the war in Iraq. However,

Todd, who describes America as the “singular threat to global stability weighing on the world today,” has not been able to overtake the popularity of Michael Moore in Germany. “Stupid White Men”: Eine Abrechnung dem Amerika unter George W. Bush has been, by far, the best-selling item of its kind in German translation. This anti-administration diatribe has sold well over a million copies and was on the German best-seller list for more than forty weeks running in 2002 and 2003. For several weeks in spring 2003, it topped the list. As of this writing, Moore’s book has sold more copies in German than has the original English-language edition in North America, where the market is far larger.

Moore’s film Bowling for Columbine has also been very popular in Germany; about a million people have viewed it to date, according to sources in the U.S. embassy in Berlin. Touted as a true-to-life depiction of America’s violent culture, some German middle and high school teachers have proclaimed mandatory field trips to take students to see it. As Fred Kempe of the European Wall Street Journal put it, it cannot be without some significance (significance for Germany, not for the United States) that Michael Moore is the most popular American in Germany.

In Germany, and elsewhere in western Europe, cultural and contingent anti-Americanism have clearly mixed with and helped spread philosophical anti-Americanism during the past two years. Whether this new mixture will “take,” however, and give rise to a new anti-American reality in Europe remains an open question. Most likely it won’t, at least not among typical Europeans. Among Muslims living in Europe, however, it is another matter.

Outside of these two groups—the Arab/Muslim domain and a small group of European intellectuals—recent increases in anti-Americanism are either modest or nonexistent. One highly respected survey, the Pew Global Attitudes Project (PGAP), put it this way in 2002: “While criticism of America is on the rise, a reserve of goodwill toward the United States still remains.” The United States and its citizens were positively rated by majorities in thirty-five out of forty-two countries in the PGAP survey.

It is worth recalling, too, that recent increases in anti-Americanism have followed a period, after September 11, 2001, in which sympathy for the United States spiked up in most regions and countries. Increased anti-Americanism has also come in train with two U.S.-led wars, in Afghanistan and Iraq, that took place within a relatively short period. Clearly, the need for the United States to respond with military force to the events of September 11 inevitably magnified the perception of American “hard” power in a way that has made many people abroad uncomfortable.

Nonetheless, despite these special circumstances, the level of ill will for the United States expressed in the past two to three years is not markedly different from that expressed five or ten or twenty years ago. We have not, therefore, witnessed a deepening groundswell of hatred for the United States. In addition, it is very likely that the increases we have witnessed with the Iraq War will subside in due course, notably in Europe. Indeed, some recent data suggest that they already are.

Beyond media exaggerations, the perception of a sharp rise in anti-Americanism owes much to a key misperception among many Americans. The terrorist attacks of September 11 surprised most Americans, as well as frightened them. As the spate of “Why do they hate us?” press features illustrated, most Americans were not aware of much anti-American resentment in the world until it issued forth in large-scale murder on U.S. soil. As a rule, Americans are fairly informal and friendly people. Unless given a reason not to, they are inclined to like other peoples, and they expect other peoples to like them. Our citizens have been disturbed to learn that not everyone does like Americans, and this sudden awareness has led many to overestimate now what they underestimated before.

Other sorts of dynamics affect opinion and polling outside the United States. Some of what gets counted as anti-Americanism is not always as it seems. Anti-Americanism in some Middle Eastern climes has an almost allegorical character to it. In authoritarian political cultures, the average person is often reluctant to answer pollsters’ questions honestly. In some of those cultures, too, citizens may be tempted to deflect frustration with their own government and society by blaming America. After all, America is far away, and it will not send goons with guns and billy clubs to knock on the door in the middle of the night.

Some authoritarian governments, justifiably frightened of their own people's wrath, actively encourage such deflectionary anti-Americanism in their official press. Many such governments have systematically been doing this for years, and some, amazingly, still claim to be true allies of the United States. If asked for a political opinion by a pollster, typical respondents stuck in such an information environment may say what they think their government wants them to say. They may believe their own answers, or they may not; it is almost impossible to know. Either way, toeing the official line is a way to stay out of trouble and to please those who control status, jobs, and access to credit.

The genealogy of Europe's philosophical anti-Americanism, on the other hand, has nothing to do with allegory. As James W. Ceaser pointed out in the summer 2002 issue of The Public Interest, in the late eighteenth century, many educated Europeans believed that the climate of America was prone to creating degeneracy and monstrosity in all living things. The Count de Buffon originated this preposterous thesis, which was taken up and popularized by Cornelius de Pauw. Thomas Jefferson took pains in his only book, Notes on the State of Virginia, to debunk it.

In the nineteenth century, European anti-Americanism focused on opposition to the universalist principles of American public life. Many anti-Americans were romantics who found in America an excess of rationalism and who excoriated America for having no real culture or history and no noteworthy national bloodline. What America did have, as many European intellectuals from privileged classes saw it, was a dangerous obsession with leveling of all kinds.

From Joseph de Maistre to Heinrich Heine, this anti-American view dominated European intellectual life for decades and it was joined toward the end of the nineteenth century by a more explicitly racist element. Americans were racially impure and hence degenerate, said Arthur de Gobineau, the inventor, it so happens, of modern "scientific" anti-Semitism. This idea was more widespread than one would like nowadays to think. (The association of anti-Semitism with anti-Americanism has precedent, by the way: much anti-British sentiment during the heyday of British power, when London epitomized modernity and rationality, was also heavily laden with anti-Semitism, as the rantings of John Atkinson Hobson illustrate.)

In the twentieth century, anti-Americanism joined with newer streams of antimodernism. As Ceaser points out, not a small number of European intellectuals loathed standardized industrial production and were deeply suspicious of “culture for the masses.” Thus, for example, Friedrich Nietzsche and Rainer Marie Rilke’s intense dislike of America. The term Americanization was coined to mean turning true culture and spirit into base materialism. Thus, the influential view of Martin Heidegger, who started as a Nazi sympathizer but whose fulminations subsequently infused the postwar European Left through Jean-Paul Sartre and others. As prelude to Europe’s Luddite-like antiglobalization movement of our own time, to the thinking of Emmanuel Todd as well as Jose Bové, this legacy of European thought finds its place.

 The Old-New Anti-Semitism

Obviously, there are many people in the Arab and Muslim worlds who are in no way anti-American. Obviously, too, most Europeans do not share the prejudices of a segment of their intellectual elite. Even so, anti-Americanism is a problem, not least because, as noted at the outset, a small number of people are motivated to translate their prejudice into violence. What is interesting, but also worrisome, is the coming together of strains of both anti-Americanism and anti-Semitism among radicalized Muslims born in Europe.

Olivier Roy’s analysis points to a rich and varied Muslim sociology in western Europe. Roy has given thought, in passing in this volume and in greater length elsewhere, to the possibility that radical Islam in Europe might ally with radical left-wing movements (and maybe even radical right-wing movements). If so, the rabid anti-Semitism of both would serve as an anchor of common belief.

Roy has also pointed out that radical Muslims really come in two different categories. There are local or regional radicals, whose targets tend to be all that they define as alien to Islam in their midst: Jews and foreigners and the locals who “serve” them. For example, recent attacks in Morocco, Turkey, Saudi Arabia, and elsewhere were aimed not at local residents or even at government targets, such as police or political figures; instead, they were aimed at synagogues, foreign consulates, and restaurants and facilities where nonresidents congregate. In the Saudi case of November 2003, the attacks were aimed at non-Saudi Arabs.

The other category Roy (and others) defines as internationalist. These are mostly Arabs who live in the West, speak a Western language, lack a formal Islamic religious education, and have taken a Western academic program. Most have been radicalized in Europe; some are immigrants, but most are European-born. Many do not speak Arabic or any Middle Eastern language. In the course of their radicalization, they break with their families and, indeed, with traditional Islamic and diaspora traditions. These are rootless internationalist radicals, who were followers of Sayyid Qutb before they were followers of Osama bin Laden. Their aim is to strike at the source of the humiliation and powerlessness of Islam—the West, led by the United States.

Such radicals have one foot in the West and one in an idealist Islam that lacks genuine Middle Eastern roots. They are a modern, or postmodern, phenomenon of deculturation under the pressures of globalization. Their methods, too, are modern, and their aims have little to do with the Middle East. Roy points out that the favorite destinations for jihad of Muslim internationalists are at the periphery of the Muslim world: Chechnya, Bosnia, Kashmir, and New York. There are no examples of people like Muhammad Atta returning to their or their family’s country of origin to engage in jihad.

These radicals, the most dangerous international terrorists, do not care about parochial conflicts in Algeria, Egypt, or Palestine. Osama bin Laden’s fatwa against Jews and crusaders was issued when the Oslo process appeared to be going fine. If they hate Ariel Sharon, they hated Ehud Barak no less. The contention that a settlement of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict would have a significant positive effect on the kind of threat al Qaeda poses to the United States is therefore completely false.

A solution to that conflict would be a good thing, of course, for several other reasons. But any solution with which the United States would be involved would obviously leave Israel as a Jewish state in one set of borders or another. In return for that, the Palestinian Authority would have to agree to end the conflict short of totally recovering all of historical, geographical Palestine. If the Palestinians as a whole accept that sort of compromise, most Arabs and most Muslims would accept it, too. But some would not. Muslim radicals would see any Palestinian who agreed to such a settlement just as Istambuli saw Sadat: as an apostate from true Islam who deserves to be killed. Even among local Islamists, the prospect of such a settlement could be expected to increase terrorism, not reduce it, at least in the short term.

Such a settlement's impact on al Qaeda terrorists would probably not be very significant. But any impact it would have would most likely lead to more terrorism, against the United States, not less, for its having sponsored or mediated such an unacceptable settlement. The fact is that when most Arabs and Muslims argue that U.S. policy unfairly tilts in favor of Israel, they do not mean that the United States emboldens and supports Israel's occupation of territories taken in the June 1967 war. Rather, they refer to "occupied Palestinian territories," which to most means all of Palestine. Over the years, the Arab media, official and otherwise, have peddled a truly demonic image of Israel—state, society, ideology, everything. Israel sterilizes Egyptian women by putting secret ingredients in chewing gum. Israel deliberately spreads AIDS to the Arabs. Israelis kill Arab children to bake their blood into matzos for Passover. An extraordinary number of Arabs actually believe that such utter nonsense is true.

With such demonization has come a European-imported "literary" anti-Semitism circa the 1930s, complete with popular Arabic versions of The Protocols of the Elders of Zion.[92] The way Israel has been depicted makes the idea of peace and normalization with it virtually unthinkable to most Arabs—except, ironically, to many Palestinians, who actually have some degree of personal familiarity with Israel.

Given this “vision” of what Israel is, which is very widely shared from Morocco to Indonesia, no imaginable American-sponsored compromise settlement could erase the contention that American policy is one-sided, unfair, perpetuates inequities, and so forth. Indeed, for America to be truly liked these days in much of the Arab and Muslim worlds, American society and policy would have to become as routinely and as matter-of-factly anti-Semitic as theirs. Happily, this is not very likely.

The issue of Palestine has special resonance in the Arab and Muslim worlds for several reasons. One is that it is the quintessential pan-Islamic issue, largely because of the status of the Haram al-Sharif, the area in Jerusalem containing the al-Aqsa Mosque and the Dome of the Rock. In addition, Palestine is a collective symbol of Arab humiliation, particularly so at the hands of the Jews, who don’t come out too well in the Qur’an.

However, the Palestine issue is one that works only at the high symbolic level. It has nothing to do with borders, security arrangements, water rights, and all the other elements in dispute that Western analysts, casual and otherwise, spend almost all their time trying to figure out. Most Arabs and Muslims in countries that have no border with Israel are almost completely ignorant of the state of play on such discrete issues and couldn’t care less about them. All they know is that Israel is illegitimate, occupies holy Jerusalem, and is an anti-Islamic spearhead of the Christian West—a message whose resonance comes from the continued perseveration on Western colonialism in these societies. Failing elites deploy such a fixation to explain (away) the pathetic state of most of these countries.[93]

In short, those who see an imposed solution to the Israeli-Palestinian/Arab conflict as a U.S. strategic imperative because of the general context of the war on terrorism are mistaken about every one of their premises. If the United States were to pressure a democratic ally to make concessions to Islamist terrorism, it would be open season on U.S. interests wherever those interests touch the Muslim world. India, Russia, China, and other non-Muslim countries that share borders with Islam, either internally or externally, would come to regret such a decision, too.

It is true, however, that America supports Israel and that, because of Israel's wildly distorted image in the Arab and Muslim worlds, America suffers by association. What can be done about this?

As Ajami suggests, not much can be done, soon or directly. Ironically, the best way to go at this problem would be for Palestinian Arabs to become truth-tellers to the rest of the Arab and Muslim world. That could happen if Palestinians and Israelis, on their own, not by imposition, could arrive at a stable compromise peace. This is possible; it is even likely over the next half dozen years. Then it might be possible for Jordanians and Egyptians to get to know the real Israel better; the anti-Israel and anti-Semitic stereotypes so prevalent in the region might become weakened over time through Palestinian, Egyptian, and Jordanian media and word-of-mouth. In other words, if there is peace, reality will eventually intrude on lurid fantasy. In the meantime, there is a real limit to what American public diplomacy can achieve, particularly official, government-sponsored public diplomacy.

 Last Words

A certain amount of anti-Americanism is inevitable. It goes with the territory of being number one in terms of raw military, political, and economic clout. The United States did not actively seek such a global status. Gideon Rose put it well: "America's role in international affairs today is not a sign of a quest for power, but a reflection of it."[94] But it doesn't matter how we got to be number one. There will always be those who fear the power of others, no matter the disposition of those who control that power. There will always be those whose capacity for envy exceeds their capacity for appreciation. It is as Machiavelli said: "Men's hatreds generally spring from fear and envy." That means, these days, that the potential for terrorism based in anti-Americanism can probably never be eliminated completely, only controlled and managed.

Although a certain amount of anti-Americanism does come with the territory of great power status, the U.S. government has no business making an unfortunate situation worse. Those in government must be sensitive to the tone of their pronouncements, more so now than ever in the past: As U.S. power waxes, so must its sense of restraint and responsibility. American policy makers must exercise forethought as to how actions, even when taken with the most benevolent of motives, may be seen by others.

This means that public diplomacy functions must be taken more seriously. American officials can no longer assume, as has historically been their inclination, that the truth about American intentions will be obvious to everyone, or at least to everyone who matters. This is particularly true in regard to people in societies without access to free media and in which conspiracy theories are often accepted as matters of fact. Official American public diplomacy must do a much better job at monitoring falsehood and incitement, talking back to it, and unapologetically explaining American policies. As the Djerejian Report insists, we need to spend more money—a lot more money—to do this right.[95]

But getting at the broader cultural side of the problem is, as Ellen Laipson argues, no longer a job for government.[96] This function is very important, but it needs to be privatized. American and international foundations should be set up for such purposes, and those already in existence need to be quietly supported. Government can help coordinate some of these activities, encourage them with tax breaks, and help make sure the basic message is consistent with government policy. But any more direct role than that for government is the kiss of death as long as America’s image remains as sullied, justifably or not, as it is today. That is why the general “new” approach of Radio Sawa and Radio Farda is unfortunate; these media outlets are examples of approaches that ought to be in the private sector.[97] It is also why the U.S. government–run Al Hurra Arabic satellite television station, based in Springfield, Virginia, is likely to be a failure and a waste of money.[98]

The distinction between government and private sector efforts is important; but there is another distinction that bears stressing, or repeating. To the extent that anti-Americanism is based on honest disagreement with American philosophy or policies, Americans, in government and out, should accept it and learn to live with it. In some cases, some Americans see anti-

Americanism where there is only honest disagreement with a policy choice. Americans who cannot distinguish between those who hate Americans and those who disagree on the merits with the policy choices of the American government are liable to cause more anti-Americanism than they can possibly identify.

But to the extent that anti-Americanism is based on irrational premises that spring from social-political dysfunction abroad, we need to unmask and contend with that irrationality and dysfunction. Americans are, by and large, open to rational persuasion, and sometimes we are persuaded. But the American government should not, and will not, alter policies it knows to be correct just to please those who threaten the United States. It certainly will not bend before those who defame and impugn the United States from pathologies of their own making. After all, as many a wit has pointed out, it can be an honor to be hated, if one is hated by the right sort of people.

 Note

This chapter reflects the author’s own views and does not represent the views of the U.S. government or the Department of State.

[87] Lamis Andoni, “Deeds Speak Louder Than Words,” in The Battle for Hearts and Minds: Using Soft Power to Undermine Terrorist Networks, ed. Alexander T.J. Lennon (Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 2003), 262–63. A similar account of Muslim/Indonesian views may be gleaned from Jane Perlez, “U.S. Asks Muslims Why It Is Unloved. Indonesians Reply,” New York Times, September 27, 2003; and Pakistani views from Hussein Haqqaqi, “The Rage of Moderate Islam,” Foreign Policy, January/February 2004, 74–76. Haqqaqi reviews Khurshid

Ahmed's Amrika: Luslim Dunya ki Bey-Itminani ("America and Unrest in the Muslim World") (Islamabad: Institute of Policy Studies, 2002).

[88] A popular example in a European context is Michael Lind, "The Israel Lobby," Prospect (April 2002). My rebuttal may be found in "The Israel Lobby—Part II," Prospect (September 2002). In the United States, almost any issue of Patrick Buchanan's magazine The American Conservative will display an example.

[89] It certainly is not a big concern in post-Ba'athi Iraq, to take one important example. Ambassador Hume Horan was attached to the Coalition Provisional Authority in Baghdad, from which he traveled the country for several months, having hundreds of conversations with Iraqis from all walks of life. "I've been here four months," Ambassador Horan wrote to me, "and no one has ever raised the Palestinians or the Arab-Israeli issue with me. Stale Arab causes are in the doghouse these days." E-mail communication, September 4, 2003 (emphasis in original).

[90] Fouad Ajami, "Iraq and the Arabs' Future," Foreign Affairs (January–February 2003).

[91] A similar argument is advanced by Secretary of State Colin L. Powell in The Economist's special issue, "The World in 2004" (January 2004): 66.

[92] See Robert S. Wistrich, "The Old-New Anti-Semitism," The National Interest, no. 72 (Summer 2003).

[93] See the excellent analysis on this point of Michael Doran, "Palestine, Iraq and American Strategy," Foreign Affairs (January-February 2002).

[94] Gideon Rose, “Imperialism: The Highest State of American Capitalism?” The National Interest, no. 71 (Spring 2003).

[95] Changing Minds, Winning Peace: A New Strategic Direction for U.S. Public Diplomacy in the Arab and Muslim World (Washington, D.C.: Advisory Group on Public Diplomacy in the Muslim World, October 1, 2003): 25–26.

[96] See also Michael Holtzman, “Privatize Public Diplomacy” and “Selling America to the Muslims,” New York Times, August 8, 2002, and October 7, 2003, respectively.

[97] Radio Sawa isn’t working. See, for example, Duraid al-Baik, “Media Battle Rages on Air to Win Over Arab Minds,” Arab News (Dubai), (November 11, 2003).

[98] See Jim Rutenberg, “Coming Soon to Arab TVs: U.S. Answer to Al Jazeera, Production Values and All,” New York Times, December 27, 2003.

z

Encyclopedia Entries

#title Mawlid

#author Dale F. Eickelman

#date 1987

#source Mircea Eliade ed. The Encyclopedia of Religion, vol. 9. New York: Macmillan Publishing Company, 292–93. <[[https://archive.org/details/encyclopediaofre00mir_wg0/page/292] [archive.org/details/encyclopediaofre00mir_wg0/page/292]]>

#lang en

#pubdate 2024-07-17T06:15:01

#topics

#DELETED temporarily

MAWLID is an Arabic word that literally means the time and place of a birth, but the word is used in particular for the birth of the prophet Muḥammad (mawlid al-nabī). In some Islamic countries it also refers to the festival days of local saints (walī s). The actual birth date of the prophet Muḥammad is unknown, but the anniversary of his birth is celebrated on 12 Rabīʿah al-Awwal of the Islamic lunar calendar, a day prior to the anniversary of his death (in 632 ce).

Muḥammad is portrayed in the Qurʾān as a messenger of God who was an ordinary mortal in other respects. Only in later centuries did many Muslims begin to assert a higher sanctity for his person. The first recorded celebrations of his birth occurred during the latter part of Fatimid rule in Egypt (909–1171). As Shīʿī Muslims who held descendants of the Prophet in particularly high esteem, the Fatimid elite similarly observed the mawlid s of Muḥammad’s son-in-law ʿAlī, his daughter Fāṭimah, and the reigning caliph. Palace dignitaries and religious notables held daylight processions and delivered sermons, a practice briefly prohibited but later revived. The Sunnī majority in Egypt took no part in these ceremonies.

The first popular mawlid occurred in 1207. Muẓaffar al-Dīn Kökbürü, brother-in-law of the famed Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn (Saladin), arranged for a festival in Arbalāʾ, a town near Mosul in present-day northern Iraq. As described by the historian Ibn Khallikān (d. 1282), a native of the town, the mawlid became an elaborate annual event, attracting scholars, notables, preachers, and poets from throughout the region. The deeds and person of Muḥammad were celebrated in religious poetry and songs and culminated on the eve of the mawlid in a torchlight procession led by the prince. Followers of Ṣūfī orders were also prominent in the celebrations, and gifts were lavishly distributed to participants.

Some aspects of early mawlid s appear to have been influenced by Middle Eastern Christian traditions of the period, such as lavish entertainments and nighttime processions in honor of saints. Even as mawlid s also developed for saints and other holy persons, especially in Egypt, the Prophet’s mawlid continued to be the most elaborate. Mawlid s quickly became highly popular occasions associated with mysticism, during which Ṣūfī orders congregated in public, reciting rhythmical chants in praise of God and in some cases entering into trance. From Egypt, mawlid s spread to many other parts of the Islamic world.

The popularity of mawlid s met initial resistance from some theologians. Ibn Taymīyah (d. 1328) and others condemned the Prophet’s mawlid as a harmful innovation (bidʿah). After considerable discussion, most theologians, except those precursors of the later Wahhābī movement, who espoused Islam in its most idealized and fundamental form, tolerated the mawlid as a praiseworthy innovation (bidʿah ḥasanah), since it inspired reverence for the Prophet. The central activity of mawlid s is the recital of long panegyrical poems and legends commemorating Muḥammad and his deeds, recitations so popular that they are repeated on festive occasions throughout the year.

The acceptance of popular practice by theologians shows the Islamic principle of consensus (ijmāʿ) at work. A key doctrinal tenet in Islam is that the community of believers cannot agree upon error. The legal opinions of religious jurists appear to have had minimal influence in reducing the popularity of mawlid s, so that most jurists were encouraged to accommodate theological doctrine to social realities.

As with other Islamic celebrations and rites of passage, mawlid s show considerable differences throughout the Islamic world. In some contexts, the mawlid is minimally distinguished from other festive occasions; elsewhere, it is one of the most important annual religious events. In nineteenth-century Cairo, mawlid celebrations started on the first day of Rabīʿah al-Awwal. Large tents were pitched in one of Cairo’s quarters and decorated with lamps and Qurʾanic inscriptions. Each night Ṣūfī orders carried their banners in procession to their tents, where they chanted the name of God, recited poems in praise of Muḥammad, and provided refreshments to guests. In the daytime, dancers, clowns, and storytellers entertained the audience in a carnival atmosphere. Festivities climaxed on the eleventh and twelfth evenings of the month, with elaborate poems and songs in praise of Muḥammad that continued until morning. In recent times government restrictions against large public gatherings sought to curtail these events. Nonetheless, the Prophet’s mawlid and to a lesser extent those for local saints continue to be large communal festivals attracting hundreds of thousands of people in Egypt’s larger towns.

Elsewhere in the Islamic world, religious orders play a less central role in mawlid festivities. In Morocco, the month in which the Prophet’s birthday occurs is popularly known as mulūd, the local pronunciation of mawlid. Children born during this month are considered especially fortunate and are often named after it, and it is a good time to circumcise boys. Celebrations last a week, culminating with recitations of panegyrics of Muḥammad in decorated and illuminated community mosques. On the final night, recitations continue until daybreak. Some families offer a feast and distribute food to the poor; women decorate their hands and feet with henna and visit cemeteries. In Java, a feast is offered for the mawlid, which is one of the two most important calendrical ceremonies in a region given over to elaborate festival cycles. A popular Javanese belief is that the giving of feasts for the Prophet’s birthday and the end of Ramaḍān distinguishes Muslims from non-Muslims and humans from animals; this view of the importance of the occasion is not necessarily shared by those Javanese who have a more elaborate understanding of Islamic doctrine and ritual.

The symbolism of the mawlid is especially highly developed among Swahili-speaking East African Muslims. In the town and island of Lamu, located off the northern coast of Kenya, most Muslims hold that the prophet Muḥammad, created of dust, like all other persons, carried “light” to the earth in this month. The discipline of fasting during the month of Ramadan emphasizes the separation of nature and culture and the distance between actual human society and the Islamic ideal. Likewise, the month of Muḥammad’s birth is regarded as a joyous occasion that emphasizes life as lived here and now, combined with belief in the Prophet’s willingness to intervene on behalf of his people and to accept them in full recognition of their individual shortcomings. It is said that during this month the Prophet lives on the earth like a human being and loves and hates just as they do. The first twelve days of the month are marked by processions, singing, and the music of tambourines and flutes. Intense competitions are held on successive evenings in the mosques and religious associations of the various quarters in Lamu. Each quarter vies in enthusiasm to praise Muḥammad’s life and deeds in song and prose and to show its love for the Prophet. Sharīf s, descendants of Muḥammad, are especially honored in Lamu during this period.

Sharīf‘s are invited to recite poems in praise of Muḥammad in most of the nineteen mosques of Lamu town. In beautiful performances on successive evenings, assemblies of young boys from mosque schools and musicians perform songs and poems that have been rehearsed for months. Brightly colored tunics, donated by wealthy Muslims, are worn for the ceremonies. The freeborn and the ex-slaves, members of two important local social categories, compete with one another during these celebrations to express a willingness to use earthly wealth—the offer of food and refreshments to guests—and talent to show their love for the Prophet. If not enough effort is put into the preparations for quarter festivities, the sharīf s are said to participate with less enthusiasm and to attract fewer blessings for the quarter. Love of the Prophet is said to join together the world of nature and the world of culture. Ceremonies include the sacrifice of cows, highly valued on the island, visits to cemeteries, and the distribution of rose water by sharīf s to symbolize Muḥammad’s ability to cleanse his followers of their sins. Until the 1970s distinctions between freeborn and ex-slave and sharīf and commoner remained significant for many East African Muslims, although in recent years such distinctions have been eroded under pressure from reformist Muslims.

 Bibliography

In his Muhammadan Festivals (New York, 1951) G. E. Von Grunebaum discusses the early history of the mawlid and includes translations from original source materials. For the mawlid in more recent times, see Edward W. Lane’s An Account of the Manners and Customs of the Modern Egyptians, 3d ed. (1846; reprint, New York, 1973), which includes a description of the celebrations as he saw them in Cairo in 1834. Michael Gilsenan’s Saint and Sufi in Modern Egypt (Oxford, 1973) provides a brief commentary on contemporary Egyptian practices. For Morocco, Edward A. Westermarck’s Ritual and Belief in Morocco, vol. 2 (1926; reprint, New Hyde Park, N. Y., 1968), remains the best-documented ethnographic account, while Pessah Shinar’s “Traditional and Reformist Mawlid Celebrations in the Maghrib,” in Studies in Memory of Gaston Wiet, edited by Myriam Rosen-Ayalon (Jerusalem, 1977), pp. 371–413, provides a richly analytic account of how mawlid practices have changed over time throughout North Africa. In The Religion of Java (Glencoe, Ill., 1960) Clifford Geertz mentions the mawlid only briefly but fully situates it in a highly elaborate ritual context. By far the most extensive discussion of the symbolism of occasion as elaborated in one local context is Abdul Hamid M. el-Zein’s The Sacred Meadows: A Structural Analysis of Religious Symbolism in an East African Town (Evanston, Ill., 1974).

<right>

Dale F. Eickelman (1987)

</right>

#title Rites Of Passage: Muslim Rites

#author Dale F. Eickelman

#date 1987

#lang en

#pubdate 2024-07-17T01:01:26

#topics

#source Mircea Eliade ed. The Encyclopedia of Religion, vol. 12. New York: Macmillan Publishing Company, 398–403.
<[[https://archive.org/details/encyclopediaofre00mir_26q/page/402] [archive.org/details/encyclopediaofre00mir_26q/page/402]]>

#DELETED temporarily

While Muslims throughout the world emphasize the unity of Islam, they also recognize the impressive diversity of cultural and historical contexts in which Islamic civilization has been elaborated and expressed. Because of this diversity, rites of passage in the Islamic world draw equally upon ritual forms and metaphors specific to local cultural contexts and upon the more universal elements of the Islamic tradition. Some of these ritual and expressive forms existed prior to the advent of Islam in the seventh century CE and were incorporated with appropriate shifts in context and meaning into the Islamic tradition. Others developed concurrently with the Islamic tradition.

Some transitions marked by rites of passage, including birth, naming, circumcision, social puberty, betrothal, marriage, pregnancy, motherhood, fatherhood, death, and mourning, are not specific to the Islamic world. These rites show an especially wide diversity of form and content because they incorporate major elements of local belief and practice. Marriage, for instance, is a secular contract in Islam. Muslim jurisprudence specifies certain legal requirements but not the form taken by marriage ceremonies. Provided that preexisting rites of passage are not directly contrary to the more universalistic aspects of the Islamic tradition, they remain a part of accepted local practice. Likewise, socially recognized transitions considered significant in some Islamic societies may be given much less emphasis in others. Some transitions, including the completion of Qurʾanic schooling and the pilgrimage (ḥājj) to Mecca, are specifically Islamic, yet how these occasions are ritually marked varies considerably with location.

Because of this diversity, rites of passage considered to be inherent components of the Islamic tradition in some parts of the Islamic world or by some social groups are not always accepted as having anything to do with Islam by Muslims elsewhere. For example, before departing for the pilgrimage to Mecca, many North African Muslims first circumambulate their town or village, visiting its principal shrines in the company of friends and relatives. Flags or banners associated with these shrines are carried in the procession. On their return from Mecca, the pilgrims participate in a similar procession and visit local shrines before crossing the thresholds of their homes. Modernist Muslims claim that these “local” ceremonies have nothing to do with Islam or the pilgrimage proper, but for many North Africans these practices remain an integral part of Islam as they practice and understand their faith. Modernist sentiments are even more intense against the annual festivals (mūsim s) of some ethnic groups in North Africa, especially Morocco, in which ethnic collectivities renew their “covenant” (ʿahd) with particular saints and their living descendants through the offering of a sacrifice. Many such festivals occur annually just before the planting season and the moving of herds from summer to winter pastures. Similarly, the Alevi (Arab., ʿAlawī) Muslims of eastern Turkey, Syria, and northern Iraq fast only twelve days per year, in honor of the twelve imams (leaders of the Islamic community) whom they recognize, instead of for an entire lunar month. Alevis also consider that the true ḥājj is carried out in one’s heart, not in travel to Mecca. Their interpretation of Islamic obligations and practice is not recognized as valid by neighboring Muslims of other sects.

Although some rites of passage resemble one another in general form throughout the Muslim world, a thorough knowledge of how they are locally elaborated is essential to understanding their contextual meaning. Most of these rites derive in part from formal Islamic doctrine but are equally shaped by, and in turn shape, diverse underlying local conceptions of society. In Marrakesh, for example, the ceremonies marking birth, circumcision, marriage, and pilgrimage resemble one another because they share an underlying conception of social boundaries and social space. These conceptions are not derived from Islamic doctrine, but neither are they opposed to it. After a woman gives birth, she and her child are confined for seven days to the room in which the birth took place. Ceremonies involving only close relatives are then performed, but until the fortieth day after birth, the mother and her child refrain from crossing the threshold of the house. At the end of this period, they visit one of the principal shrines of Marrakesh. After a child is circumcised, he and his mother are likewise confined to one room of the house for the first week then to the entire house for another interval; finally, all restrictions on movement end after a visit to one of the major local shrines. For marriage, newly wed couples remain seven days in the nuptial chamber, followed by a few days in the house itself and finally a visit to one of the principal shrines. Returning pilgrims, once they have entered their houses, follow a similar progression to regain the full use of social space and to reincorporate themselves into ordinary society. Even with the widespread expansion of mass education in recent years, which has the effect in many parts of the world of modifying or eliminating local ritual practices, those of Marrakesh remain largely intact.

In Islamic societies, as in others, the social and cultural significance accorded to specific rites of passage becomes clear only when the rites are considered in their full social context. In some parts of the Muslim world—in Silwa, a village in Egypt's Aswan province, for example—weddings are an important marker of transition, especially for women. Upon marriage a woman leaves the residence of her own parents and becomes part of her husband's domestic group. However, the significance of marriage elsewhere—as in Atjeh, in northern Sumatra, for example—is overshadowed by a woman's first live birth. In Atjeh, when a woman becomes a mother, she also becomes an adult and takes legal possession of her house. The ceremonies associated with her becoming a mother and the naming of her child are locally regarded as much more significant than marriage itself: Women claim that they are girls until they have children.

In the interior of Oman, a country in the southeastern corner of the Arabian Peninsula, marriages generally occur within the extended family and often involve a move of no more than several hundred feet for the bride, from the house of her father to that of a nearby relative. She continues to spend the better part of the day in the house of her own mother, although elsewhere in the Muslim world it is common to have a period of avoidance between a new wife and her family of birth. Marriage ceremonies in the Omani interior are such subdued, private occasions that non-family members often learn that they have taken place only after the event. In contrast, once a woman gives birth, the naming ceremony for her child is elaborate. It occasions visits from every household in the community and results in the mother's achieving full social status as a woman. The mother, not the child, is the center of attention at naming ceremonies.

Since the interpretation of rites of passage is dependent upon local cultural contexts, principal Moroccan practices are described here to illustrate a complete set of major social transitions. Examples are also provided from elsewhere in the Islamic world to indicate the range of major variation.

 Birth and Naming

In Morocco, if a woman wishes to induce pregnancy or fears a difficult one, she visits the sanctuaries of marabouts (walī s) reputed for their efficacy in dealing with such difficulties. She will often leave a strip of cloth from her own dress as a promise that, if her childbirth occurs, she will return and sacrifice a sheep or goat, distributing its meat either to descendants of the walī or to the poor. Once a woman knows she is pregnant, she begins to eat special foods and to receive visits from female neighbors and relatives, practices that are common elsewhere in the Islamic world.

After she has given birth, a woman is confined to her house for a period that varies from a week to forty days. During this period she is regarded as ritually unclean and is unable to pray and fast, an indication of her marginal status. At the end of her confinement she is taken by female friends and relatives to the public bath, resumes normal activities, and is able once again to leave her house. The child is kept in its swaddling clothes during this period and is constantly guarded for fear that he or she might be exchanged for a malevolent spirit (jinnī). Most women unaffected by modernist Islamic belief and practice perform a series of rituals designed to propitiate any such spirits that might be nearby.

The most important event in the child’s life is the naming ceremony (subūʿ), which ideally occurs a week after the birth of a child of either sex. On this day the child is named, usually by its father but in agreement with the mother and other relatives. The mother is bathed, dressed in new clothes, and painted with henna, often by the midwife who has delivered the child. The child also has henna applied to its face, hands, and feet, both because henna is thought to be pleasing to the eye and because it is thought to protect the child’s spirit from harm. The mother receives visits from female relatives and neighbors on this occasion.

There is no fixed set of relatives involved in the naming of a child in Morocco. The choice is primarily a personal one and may also involve consultation with patrons or close friends. Likewise, the selection of names reflects a variety of influences and personal choices. Some persons prefer distinctly religious names such as Muḥammad (Mḥā in Berber-speaking regions) or ʿAbd Allāh (“servant of God”) for men, and Fāṭimah, the name of the Prophet’s daughter, for women. Other children are named after a religious feast day, such as Mulūdī for a man born on or near the Prophet’s birthday (colloquially, ʿĪd al-Mulūd). Other names reflect a commitment to nationalism, as in using the name ʿAllāl, after the Moroccan nationalist leader ʿAllāl al-Fāsī. The name chosen may honor a recently deceased relative; it is a bad omen to name a child after a living relative. In non-Arabic-speaking countries, such as Indonesia and Bangladesh, the growing use of Arabic names instead of non-Islamic ones or names in local languages is a direct result of a growing commitment to reform Islam.

For boys in Morocco, the naming ceremony is always accompanied by the sacrifice of a sheep or goat, although a blood sacrifice is often omitted in the case of girls. This sacrifice is known as the ʿaqīqah ceremony. The male relatives and friends of the father are invited to a midday feast, the child’s hair is cut for the first time, and alms are distributed to the poor. A separate feast is held for female relatives in the evening. This rite of passage is so significant that in wealthy families it is not unusual for hundreds of guests from throughout the country to attend. In many villages, each part of the sacrificed animal has a special significance and is designated for particular persons. The liver is eaten only by members of the household, and the heart and stomach fat are eaten by the mother alone. Other parts of the animal, usually including the skin and entrails, are destined for the midwife.

Moroccans consider the sacrifice for the naming ceremony to be an Islamic obligation, although of the four legal schools of Sunnī Islam only the Ḥanbali school regards it as compulsory. The other schools merely allow the practice, although Islamic tradition ascribes the sacrifice, which has pre-Islamic antecedents, to the prophet Muḥammad (d. 632). The sacrifice, like the haircutting, is thought to avert evil from the child by offering a substitute sacrifice. At the same time, with the acquisition of a name, the child becomes a full social person.

 Circumcision

Circumcision is the next major rite of passage for boys. It usually occurs between the ages of two and seven. There is no equivalent ceremony in Morocco for girls. The day before the circumcision, the boy is bathed, and his head is shaved. His mother paints henna on his hands and feet to ward off the evil eye. A sacrifice is made, and a feast is prepared for friends, neighbors, and relatives, to which the guests bring small gifts. Many households wait until ʿĪd al-Aḍḥā or a marriage in the family or arrange with other households to have their children circumcised together. On the day after the circumcision feast, the boy, dressed in fine clothes and accompanied by musicians, is led around town on a mule. In the past in some areas, his clothes would have resembled those of a bride. Elements of the circumcision ceremonies are exactly parallel to those of marriage. The boy’s mother and sisters wear their hair loose, as they would for a wedding. Just before the circumcision itself, usually performed by an itinerant specialist but increasingly by medical personnel, the boy is dressed in a new, white shift, often similar to that worn by pilgrims to Mecca. The garment is another indication of the purificatory intent of the ritual.

In classical Arabic, circumcision is known as khitān, although in Morocco and elsewhere in the Arab world it is usually known as ṭahārah (“purification”), and in Turkey as sünnet, or the practice of the Prophet. Although not mentioned in the Qurʾān, circumcision is attributed to the Prophet and recognized as a pre-Islamic Arabian tradition; it appears to have been performed at puberty and as a preliminary to marriage. There is a modern tendency among educated Moroccans to have their children circumcised at an earlier age, sometimes even at birth, although for most families circumcision still takes place when a child, toward the age of six or seven, prepares to assume the responsibilities of an adult Muslim, including the daily prayers and the Ramaḍān fast.

In Morocco, as elsewhere in the Muslim world, the possession of reason (ʿaql) informed by accepted Islamic practice implies the ability of Muslims to subordinate their “natural” passions or personal inclinations (hawa nafs) to God’s will. The concepts of ʿaql and hawa nafs occur in almost all Islamic societies. Children are said to be “ignorant” (jāhil) because they lack knowledge of the Islamic code of conduct and the capacity to abide by it. Thus, when circumcision occurs at the traditionally preferred age of six or seven, it marks the beginning of full participation in the Islamic community. Memorization of the Qurʾān, for those children who accomplish this feat, also sets a child apart from ordinary society through the mnemonic possession of the word of God. Like circumcision, the event is marked by a public procession and announcement of the child’s new status.

 Marriage

After discreet private negotiations between the families involved, a date for the wedding and the size of the marriage payment (ṣadāq) are set. This payment, relative to the value placed on the girl and her family, is used to buy domestic furnishings that remain the bride’s property. By Islamic law, payment must be made in order for the marriage to be valid. The contract is usually signed in the presence of notaries or valid witnesses just after a ceremonial dinner at the girl’s home at which her father or guardian is formally asked for her hand. Later, an engagement party is held. This is primarily a woman’s party, with dancing and singing, the closing of the marriage contract, and payment of the bridewealth.

A day or two before the actual wedding, the bride’s family delivers to the bridegroom’s home the furnishings purchased with the ṣadāq money. These are publicly displayed, often on the back of a truck, and accompanied by drummers and musicians. There is often a small celebration at the woman’s house before she is taken to that of her future husband. In rural areas, the groom’s party may bring an animal to be sacrificed at her house. Several days later they return to carry the bride away to the groom’s house, where the major ceremony is held. As the groom’s party, often accompanied by the blowing of horns and drumming, approaches the woman’s house, there is a mock battle between the bride’s family and the groom’s, at the end of which the girl is allowed to be taken away. She has been prepared by purification with water and henna.

The day before the wedding, the groom also undergoes purification. He goes to the bath, accompanied by his friends, and is treated as if he were a sultan with his court. He is often painted with henna and entertained by musicians. In the past in some regions, the groom was himself dressed like a bride for a brief period, a custom that emphasized all the more the imminent transformation of his status. Afterward, he is washed, shaved, and dressed in new clothes.

Upon arrival at the groom’s house, the bride is ceremonially dressed in heavy layers of fine brocades and jewels, often rented for the occasion. After a long evening of music and feasting, the groom leaves his guests, enters the bridal chamber, lifts the bride’s veil, and ceremonially offers her milk and dates. Depending upon the region of Morocco and the social class, close relatives may visit the couple briefly at this stage. Wedding gifts are publicly announced and displayed at this time. Religious specialists are invited to the wedding feast, where they recite the Qurʾān and invoke blessings upon the couple but do not play a central role. Celebrations continue until proof of the bride’s virginity is brought to the guests, although Moroccans are rapidly abandoning this practice. For a week thereafter, the wife remains confined to her husband’s house, receiving visits only from close female friends. So that the bride may become accustomed to new patterns of domestic authority, she is forbidden to see her father, brothers, and other male relatives for at least three months. The public nature of parts of the ceremony, the bride’s change of residence, and the restrictions on her conduct formally denote the couple’s change of marital status.

 Death

Deaths and funeral ceremonies show the most consistency in essential features throughout the Muslim world. More so than the other rites of passage, those for death and mourning are largely common to all Muslims. If the death is expected, the Qurʾān is recited continuously in the presence of the ailing person. At the point of death, the eyes and mouth of the person are closed, and the arms are straightened alongside the body. The deceased is placed with his or her face turned toward Mecca. For the duration of mourning, regular social life is suspended for those affected. A person of the same sex who knows the prescribed ritual washing and preparation of the dead is called in. The women of the family are expected to cry and lose their composure, but men’s expressions of grief are expected to be much more restrained. The deceased is wrapped in a white seamless cloth similar to that worn for the pilgrimage; in the case of those who have actually made the ḥājj, the seamless white garments worn while in Mecca are used. The Qurʾān is recited. Burial occurs quickly, on the same day if death occurs in the morning or early afternoon; if death occurs late in the day, burial is postponed until the next morning. Friends and relatives accompany the procession to the cemetery, where a prayer for the dead is recited by a religious specialist. On returning from the cemetery, participants in the procession are provided with a meal at the house of the deceased. In some rural areas, food is also placed over the grave for the first three days after death.

Mourning continues for three days, the period thought to be sanctioned by the Qurʾān, and consolations are received by the relatives of the deceased. Since death is ordained by God, proper conduct for a Muslim after the initial shock of grief is to accept the will of God. The lack of forbearance and composure (ʿazaʾ) implies a lack of reason, in this context the capacity to adjust to an expression of God’s will. A widow remains in seclusion for four months and ten days, a period prescribed by the Qurʾān and the minimum legal waiting period (ʿiddah) before she is allowed to remarry. In Morocco, it is not unusual for elaborate stone markers or enclosures to be erected around the grave, a sharp contrast with, for example, the custom of the Ibāḍīyah of Oman, who indicate the equality of all Muslims after death by marking graves with simple stones, none of which carry inscriptions.

 Major Variations

If there are numerous points of resemblance among rites of passage in the Islamic world, divergences are just as pronounced. In Egyptian villages along the Nile, women visit shrines and cross the river to encourage conception; the latter practice is directly related to a wish to induce a change in the woman’s status. In these practices, the parallels with Morocco are almost exact, yet divergences also become clear when overall patterns are considered. In Atjeh, for instance, an elaborate series of visits takes place between the mothers of the wife and the husband, both before and after births, accompanied by complex food restrictions. Some of these restrictions occur only for odd-numbered pregnancies. In Java, the various rituals associated with birth are timed by the Javanese calendar, in which each month has thirty-five days. Many of the rituals involve a rich mixture of Islamic, Hindu-Buddhist, and indigenous spirits, and each food and gesture associated with these rituals has a specific implication. Thus, in the small feast for household members only, which occurs just before birth, a dish of rice is served with a peeled banana in the middle, to symbolize an easy birth. The precision with which events are timed and the punctilious concern with ritual detail are alien to other parts of the Islamic world. After childbirth in Atjeh, a woman may not leave her house for forty-four days. For much of this time, she lies on a platform over hot bricks with her legs extended and her ankles together. The idea behind this “roasting” is to become as dry as possible in order to expel the aftereffects of childbirth, again a set of notions without direct correspondences elsewhere.

The obligations incurred by guests at life-crisis ceremonies and the comportment appropriate to them also show considerable range. Egyptian villagers keep punctilious written accounts of the gifts they give to other members of the community and the value of those they receive in return. By contrast, the notion of strict, explicit equality of value is lacking in the Arabian Peninsula and is there considered to be against the spirit of Islam. In Java, certain foods such as wafer-thin disks of rice are served at major life-crisis feasts. Sharing them is meant to symbolize that all guests are internally composed and free from strong emotions such as envy, hate, and jealousy, a concern not equally emphasized elsewhere.

Circumcision shows two major patterns of variation throughout the Islamic world. Although all males are circumcised, women are circumcised only in certain areas, notably in Upper Egypt, the Sudan, Somalia, Ethiopia, West Africa, and Atjeh. Circumcision for women, which occurs between the ages of six or seven (Egypt) and twelve (Atjeh), occasions a minimum of ceremony. It does not result in any significant change of status for a girl, although the operation is considered a necessary prerequisite to marriage. Unlike boys undergoing circumcision, girls are allowed and even encouraged to cry out in pain. The Islamic jurist al–Shāfiʿī (767–820 ce) argues that circumcision is obligatory for both sexes. Other jurists argue that it is merely “honorable” for women. The more extreme forms of circumcision, including infibulation, have been declared illegal in recent years by many governments, although enforcement is highly variable.

The age at which male circumcision occurs varies according to its significance in a particular cultural context. In northern Yemen, for example, circumcision until recently took place between the ages of twelve and fifteen and, despite official government bans, continues in some areas. The youth is surrounded by men and women of his village. A knife is held to his foreskin as he recites three times, “There is no god but God and Muḥammad is his Prophet.” The foreskin is then cut and thrown into the crowd. The youth retrieves it and is carried on his mother’s shoulders while he continues to display it proudly, leading a procession of dancers and brandishing his dagger. He is humiliated for life if he shows any sign of pain. In this context, circumcision is more a test of virility and a marker of young adult status than a point of entry into participation in the religious community, which is the case when circumcision occurs at the age of six or seven, as in Morocco. In Java, it traditionally occurred after a youth had completed religious studies, between the ages of ten and fourteen; two transitions that are kept separate elsewhere in the Islamic world were thus fused. Circumcision is also seen as a prelude to marriage, which is not the case when it occurs at a much younger age.

The vitality of the Islamic tradition is indicated in its capacity for self-renewal and transformation. The rites of passage described here for the Islamic world are inseparable from basic notions of social and cultural identity. As notions of identity shift, so do the forms of many of these rituals, even in the face of traditions previously accepted and taken for granted in specific contexts. Since the late nineteenth century, modernist and reform movements in Islam have given impetus to a reappraisal of the links between Islam and personal identity. Likewise, the abandonment or modification of practices not considered authentically Islamic, even if locally tolerated, signifies that notions of self and community are in a process of change, a process that is ongoing throughout the Islamic world.

 Bibliography

The relevant entries in the old edition of The Encyclopaedia of Islam, 4 vols. and supplement (Leiden, 1913–1938), and the new edition in progress (Leiden, 1960–) are strongest in summarizing Islamic legal thought and classical writing on rites of passage and include extensive bibliographies for these fields. W. Robertson Smith’s Kinship and Marriage in Early Arabia, edited by Stanley A. Cook (1903; new ed., Oosterhout, Netherlands, 1966), and Lectures on the Religion of the Semites, 2d ed. (1894; reprint, New York, 1956), remain valuable for comparing early Islamic rites of passage with earlier Semitic practice. Christiaan Snouck Hurgronje’s Mekka in the Latter Part of the Nineteenth Century (1888–1889), translated by J. H. Monahan (1931; reprint, Leiden, 1970), provides extensive ethnographic description. For Morocco, Edward A. Westermarck’s Marriage Ceremonies in Morocco (1914; reprint, London, 1972) and Ritual and Belief in Morocco, vol. 2 (1926; reprint, New Hyde Park, N. Y., 1968), provides meticulous ethnographic detail useful to contrast with descriptions contained in studies of more recent practice.

Among modern studies, see my Moroccan Islam: Tradition and Society in a Pilgrimage Center (Austin, Tex, 1976). For a psychoanalytic perspective on a single ritual, see Vincent Crapanzano’s “Rite of Return: Circumcision in Morocco,” in volume 9 of The Psychoanalytic Study of Society, edited by Warner Muensterberger and L. Bryce Boyer (New York, 1981), pp. 15–36. Excellent discussions of rites of passage in other countries are included in Hamed Ammar’s Growing Up in an Egyptian Village (1954; reprint, London, 1956); James T. Siegel’s The Rope of God (Berkeley, 1969), for Atjeh; Clifford Geertz’s The Religion of Java (New York, 1964); and John R. Bowen’s “Death and the History of Islam in Highland Aceh,” Indonesia 38 (October 1984): 21–38. For an excellent study of historical change in naming practices, see Richard W. Bulliet’s “First Names and Political Change in Modern Turkey,” International Journal of Middle East Studies 9 (November 1978): 489–495.

<right>

Dale F. Eickelman (1987)

</right>

#title Christiaan Snouck Hurgronje

#author Dale F. Eickelman

#date 1987

#source Mircea Eliade ed. The Encyclopedia of Religion, vol. 13. New York: Macmillan Publishing Company, 374-75. <[[https://archive.org/details/encyclopediaofre00mac_qwm/page/374] [archive.org/details/encyclopediaofre00mac_qwm/page/374]]>

#lang en

#pubdate 2024-07-17T06:15:01

#topics

#DELETED temporarily

SNOUCK HURGRONJE, CHRISTIAAN (1857- 1936), Dutch Islamicist and colonial adviser. At the University of Leiden, Christiaan Snouck Hurgronje studied theology and initially intended to become a minister. His early interest in literary and historical criticism of the Bible, a field then still regarded as suspect by some conservative Christians, contributed to his decision in 1878 to renounce the ministry and pursue a scholarly career in Arabic and Islamic studies. In 1880 he defended a doctoral thesis on the origins of the traditional pilgrimage to Mecca. In August 1884 he traveled to Jidda, where he was invited by Meccan religious scholars and notables to visit Mecca. Although he dressed as a Muslim and adopted a Muslim name, 'Abd al-Ghaffar, Snouck Hurgronje did not conceal his identity as a non-Muslim from his hosts; he remained in Mecca from February to August 1884. In 1889 he published, with photographs, a detailed ethnographic account of contemporary Meccan social and intellectual life, translated as Mecca in the Latter Part of the Nineteenth Century (1931). A chapter of this work is devoted to Mecca’s Javanese colony.

Snouck Hurgronje’s interests as a historian of religions were strongly informed by ethnography. For Snouck Hurgronje, both historical and contemporary religious beliefs and movements had to be understood in terms of the social and political contexts in which they occurred. After his return to Europe from Mecca, he continued to lecture and write on general themes in Islam and Islamic jurisprudence but he became increasingly interested in the Dutch East Indies (present-day Indonesia). In 1889 he was sent to Batavia (present-day Djakarta), where he served as a colonial adviser while remaining an ethnographer and a religious scholar. In 1892 he was posted at Aceh, a region of Sumatra in frequent rebellion against Dutch rule since 1873. Living like a Muslim (though again not concealing his European identity) and reestablishing ties with Acehnese he had first met in Mecca, his comprehensive reporting on Islamic political and religious movements began to shape colonial policy. He recommended that the government co-opt the secular chieftains, while suppressing the Islamic leaders who were the instigators of the rebellion. His advice was informed by his view of the Islamic leadership as alien agitators intent upon imposing norms and values contrary to local customs. Snouck Hurgronje continued his role as Islamicist and colonial adviser to the Dutch government from his return to Leiden in 1906 until his retirement in 1927.

[See also Acehnese Religion.]

 Bibliography

Snouck Hurgronje's ethnography, The Achehnese, 2 vols, translated by A. W. S. O’Sullivan (Leiden, 1906), remains a classic. For an analysis of his scholarship on Islam, see Jacques Waardenburg's L’Islam dans le miroir de I'occident (The Hague, 1970), which contains an extensive bibliography. James T. Siegal’s The Rope of God (Berkeley, 1969) contains an extensive discussion of Snouck Hurgronje's views on Islam and Acehnese society.

<right>

DALE F. EICKELMAN

</right>

#title Transnational Religious Identities

#subtitle (Islam, Catholicism, and Judaism): Cultural Concerns

#author Dale F Eickelman

#date 2015

#source International Encyclopedia of the Social and Behavioral Sciences, 2nd edn, vol. 24, 602-6.

#lang en

#pubdate 2024-07-22T21:24:11

#topics

#notes Dartmouth College, Hanover, NH, USA

#copyright 2015 Elsevier Ltd. All rights reserved.

#DELETED temporarily

Abstract

‘Transnational religious identity’ refers to personal or collective religious identities that transcend enclaves, localities, regions, nations, and states to achieve a wider unity of belief, practice, and community. The term implies the existence of the nationstate as the principal worldwide form of political sovereignty. Transnational religious identities are continuously reconstructed in differing contexts and ongoing struggles over ideology and authority in which shifting coalitions of elites, counterelites, ethnic groups, and those excluded from local authority structures compete for voice and recognition.

The subject of ‘transnational religious identity’ is unexpectedly complex. It refers to personal or collective religious identities that transcend enclaves, localities, regions, nations, and states to attain a wider unity of belief, practice, or community. Transnational religious identities also imply an inherent tension between claims to universality and the specifics of language, ethnicity, place of origin, locally shared culture, values, and history. The term also implies the existence of the nation-state system - with its own competing claims for personal and collective identity - as the principal worldwide form of political sovereignty. Transnational religious identities are continuously reconstructed in different contexts and ongoing struggles over ideology and authority in which shifting coalitions of elites, counterelites, ethnic groups, or those excluded from local authority structures compete for voice and recognition.

 Constructing Religious Identities

Transnational religious identities, like other personal and collective identities, are socially constructed. They are not given or ‘natural,’ although the advocates of some religious identities, like secular nationalists, often make such claims. In the nineteenth century, William Robertson Smith’s influential Lectures on the Religion of the Semites (Smith, 1956) traced the development of Semitic religious practices and institutions, stressing how a people’s social and political institutions, and the shifting boundaries between their own and ‘other’ communities, contributed to shaping their religious and ethical conceptions. Thus, the prophecies of Ezekiel and Samuel differed not because of a contradiction in the Bible, but because each prophet addressed himself to different groups and historical contexts.

For Smith and his successors, a key element in the growth and development of religions was the growing awareness that ideas and practices of community are socially constructed even if they are firmly rooted in divine revelation. In this view, a more ‘modern’ understanding of religious belief and practice implies a self-consciousness of ritual and tradition, places a high value on individual responsibility and commitment, and recognizes the existence of other religions and accords them some measure of legitimacy. In Christianity, Islam, and Judaism, this individual ‘taking charge’ of faith and practice also led to the greater role of a nonclerical ‘public’ in determining the role of religion in society (Salvatore, 2007). In this respect, Quranic verses such as the following, revealed in seventh century Arabia, are distinctly modern: “To each among you, we have ordained a law and assigned a path for each of you. Had God pleased, he could have made you one nation, but His will is to test you by what He has given you; so compete in goodness” (Quran 5: 48). From its beginnings in seventh-century Arabia, Islam as religious tradition and practice has been remarkably open to the outside world (Ernst, 2011). The vast expanse of the Muslim majority world, ranging from Morocco to Indonesia, inevitably meant that it came to encompass a variety of civilizations and cultural forms. In Arabic, the Quran exhorted its initial seventh-century audience to break through parochial identities of tribe and kinship and aspire to a wider, more inclusive community of belief and practice.

Other religious traditions, including Judaism and Christianity, show similar diversity of form and interpretation, commingling local and universal elements. Pilgrimages in all faiths serve to project believers across lines of immediate locality or group. Pilgrims - and visitors to shrines and holy places - set off from home in the hope of reaffirming contact with a spiritual center, encountering ‘others’ and returning home with a sharpened awareness of difference and similarity (Eickelman and Piscatori, 2003; Sumption, 1975). Whether to Mecca, Jerusalem, Ayodhya, Rome, the holy places of Shi’a Muslims, or to the shrines of Sephardic saints (zaddiqim) in North Africa and Israel, pilgrimages and visitations create unity as they highlight differences of locality. In the Mediterranean (for Christians, Muslims, and Jews), as for South Asia (for Hindus and Muslims), pilgrimages and visitations often involve shared sacred spaces (Albera and Couroucli, 2012; Pemberton and Nijhawan, 2008).

Catholic missionaries and the adepts of Sufi religious brotherhoods also carried the word and practice of their respective faiths across vast spaces before they became nationstates (Rudolph and Piscatori, 1997). The missionary activities of the Catholic Church in Latin America date from the Spanish conquests of the sixteenth century. Missionary orders such as the Jesuits and Franciscans implanted complex networks of churches, missions, and schools, transferring people and resources between Spain and the colonies. In the Middle East in the nineteenth century, French Catholic and American Protestant missionaries opened religious schools in the Levant, and from the 1880s onward, the Alliance Israelite Universelle sent emissaries throughout North Africa and the Ottoman Empire. Although not primarily religious in orientation, Alliance missionaries had a profound impact on the self-perception of the Jewish communities where they worked. The work of these missionary enterprises was aimed, respectively, at Christians and Jews. These activities occurred within a framework of economic hegemony and political domination in which foreign powers actively sought to protect the interests of Middle Eastern Jews and Christians. However, these ‘minority’ communities were widely distributed geographically throughout the Middle East in the nineteenth century, so that missionary activities aimed at them had a significant indirect impact on the region’s Muslim majority. For example, the founder of the Muslim Brotherhood, Hasan al-Banna (1906-49), a strong opponent of Christian missionaries in Egypt and elsewhere, may have been strongly influenced by what he saw of their activities and organization when he was posted as a primary school teacher to Isma‘iliya, a town in the Suez Canal Zone, in 1927. Such ‘learning’ from other religious traditions is an important element in transnational religious movements and not confined to the last two centuries (Hofert and Salvatore, 2004).

Sufi orders had a major role in propagating Islam, both in the Islamization of North Africa and in the subsequent consolidation of Islamic domination. Some orders, such as the Bektashiya, attracted as adepts the political elite of the Ottoman Empire. Others, such as the Tijaniyya, had a major role in the spread of Islam to West Africa. Some orders were highly structured, but most were only loosely linked through informal but pervasive networks of affinity and trust. Their forms of association were widely understood and respected throughout the Muslim world, and their organizational forms continue to serve as a template for many contemporary religious movements.

 Religious Identity and Nationalism in the Nineteenth Century

In nineteenth century Europe, the idea took hold that peoples could be divided into nations sharing a common language, religion, ethnicity, and culture, and therefore should form separate political units. This notion was complemented by a heightened self-consciousness, systematization, and explicitness of religious traditions. By the 1830s, the plural ‘religions’ came into common currency, with a similar development in Arabic, to signify the idea of ‘religion’ as a system of beliefs and practices that could be set alongside nonreligious elements of the human condition and apart from other religions (Smith, 1963). This idea added impetus to the erosion of clerical authority over public discussions about religion in all faiths, an idea that often crossed from one faith to another (Hofert and Salvatore, 2004), as in the heated discussions between Ernest Renan and Jamal al-Din al-Afghani.

The linkage between nationalism and religion was implicit and the boundaries of religious and national identities rarely coincided. Partially in response to political and ideological developments in nineteenth-century Europe, a pan-Islamic movement developed in the late nineteenth century. Although the pan-Islamic movements of the 1880s bore similarities to the pan-Hellenic and pan-German movements of the time, only pan-Islam was based formally on a religious commonality (Landau, 1994). The pan-Islamic movements were initially confined to the educated elite, although this elite claimed to speak for all Muslims. The combined French and Spanish effort to crush the rebellion of Abd al-Karim al-Khattabi in 1927 generated protests throughout the Muslim world and appeals for pan-Islamic unity, but the results were transient and minimal. Equally profound is the accelerated nonelite transformation of world religions as they incrementally are influenced by the diverse national contexts in which they develop. For example, some observers write of the birth of a ‘French Islam’ (Kepel, 2011, p. 11).

 The Reemergence of Religion in Public Life

Prevailing theories of modernity and modernization in the midtwentieth century assumed that religious movements, identities, and practice had become increasingly marginal to modern or modernizing societies and that only those religious intellectuals and leaders who attached themselves to the nation-state would continue to play a significant role in public life. As Casanova (1994) notes, by the late 1970s this prevalent view rapidly eroded through the impact of several nearly simultaneous developments: the Iranian revolution, the rise of the Solidarity movement in Poland, the role of liberation theology in political movements throughout Latin America, and the return of Protestant fundamentalism as a force in American politics. Religion continues to play a significant role in politics and society worldwide. Even locally rooted movements benefit significantly with transnational sponsors or supporters, whether emigrants, states, or others sharing a group’s objectives. Opposition to the Shah’s regime was firmly rooted in Iran, but the safe haven provided for opposition leaders in exile and their transnational ties and freedom of movement and action were integral to the revolution’s success, just as such transnational ties contribute strongly to reshaping how Iranians think of Islam and politics in the era of the post-1979 Islamic Republic (Adelkhah, 2012).

Contemporary religious transnationalism and the identities it supports take many forms. Some are highly structured, while others are only informally organized and related primarily by affinity of goals. Informality and the lack of formal structure can be a strength in contexts of political and religious oppression.

At one end of the spectrum of organizational structure is the vertical transnationalism of the Roman Catholic Church. In its encounter with the emerging system of sovereign nation-states in Europe, the Church incrementally reached an accommodation with nation-states so that the Church hierarchy, although transcending the boundaries of nation-states, also worked within them. The close ties formed with sovereign states often preserved a large measure of local freedom of action for the Church, but they also checked its ability to serve as a voice for social and political reform and for human rights.

The Second Vatican Council (1962-65) significantly altered the nature of Catholic transnationalism. With the Vatican’s Declaration of Religious Freedom, Dignitatis Humanae, it unambiguously supported the doctrine of universal human rights and used its voice internationally to secure these rights for all peoples and not just Catholics. Vatican II also intensified interfaith dialogue and formally recognized the diversity of Catholic belief and practice. It spurred the translation of liturgies into local languages and promoted lay participation in Church activities, further adapting the Church to local political and social circumstances.

The Church’s overall hierarchical structure remained intact after Vatican II, but it was complemented and sometimes overshadowed in importance by decentralized grassroots networks and organizations created for purposes as diverse as Bible study, evangelism, and social and political actions. Many organizations and networks had direct ties to the Church hierarchy, while others operated autonomously. In Latin America, as elsewhere, both types of networks benefited from transnational support. Dutch, Italian, French, Swiss, the United States, Spanish, and other organizations acting transnationally contribute funds and personnel to sustain local developmental programs and action networks. Church-related human rights networks (along with groups with no religious affiliation, such as Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch) have played a significant role in sustaining resistance to authoritarianism and repression, giving concrete form to the idea and practice of transnational civil society.

Protestant transnationalism lacks the time depth of the Catholic presence in Latin America, Africa, and elsewhere, but missionaries from mainline Protestant denominations established a stronghold in Africa by the last part of the nineteenth century, often informally dividing spheres of influence with competing Catholic and Protestant groups, establishing schools and hospitals that often had no state counterparts. Schools have been especially important, and often formed the cadres of early nationalist movements (Beidelman, 1982). Education, intended to inculcate Christian identity and practice, ironically undermined colonial authority and provided the cadres for African independence movements.

The first Protestant churches in Latin America were established primarily for European immigrants. By the 1960s, however, the mainline denominations were increasingly displaced by evangelical, Pentecostal, and fundamentalist churches and missionaries, trained and supported primarily from North America. Levine and Stoll (1997, p. 71) describe the growth of these groups, especially the ‘Religious Right,’ mixing evangelism with nationalism and anticommunism, as ‘spectacular.’ They suggest that these groups, in addition to providing needed community services, hospitals, and schools in areas where state facilities are minimal, appeal primarily to people experiencing intense social change and aspiring to improve their status and lives.

The ease of travel and the greatly enhanced role of the mass media have also enhanced the scope and ability of nongovernmental associations and networks to infuse an inherent transnational dimension to contemporary religious identity and practice. Once established, the ‘horizontal’ networks of civic and religious engagement for both Catholic and Protestant groups became durable and self-sustaining. The transnational ties engendered through travel for labor migration, missionary activity, civic action, and human rights work creates both institutional ties and a sense of moral community for all participants, not just for the elite. Unlike the hierarchical transnationalism of the Church in earlier periods, the loose network organization that characterizes many contemporary groups is more difficult for states to regulate or control. Moreover, the ease with which participants in such networks can spread information across state boundaries and secure external support serves as a brake on the state abuse of authority. This is as much the case for Latin America as elsewhere. Della Cava (1993), for example, notes the influential role of Catholic nongovernmental philanthropic and service organizations in Central and Eastern Europe as a catalyst for change and an alternative, although not a replacement, for attachment to the nation-state.

 Transnational Islamic Identities

Islamic transnational movements occur in a significantly different context than Christian ones because Islam lacks a central organizational hierarchy. Although some Muslim intellectuals call for a spiritual or political unity, the Muslim world has almost always been characterized by a de facto pluralism of belief and practice. Even radical Islamic groups such as Lebanon’s Hizbullah use the universal language of Islam but in practice seek only to establish an Islamic state or an Islamic order within their respective national borders even if they secure external support (Norton, 2009).

Some Islamic transnationalism is formal, organized, and linked to state organizations. After an arsonist’s attack on the al-Aqsa mosque in Jerusalem in 1969, Muslim majority states founded the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC), which consists of 56 member states. However, this group has never advocated political unity and some member states, such as Nigeria, are anxious not to appear too closely identified with the organization. Nor has the OIC proved effective in the Iran-Iraq war (1980-88), in defusing the Iraqi- Kuwaiti tension that led to the 1990-91 Gulf War, or in other conflicts among Muslim majority states. However, its Islamic Development Bank, established in Saudi Arabia in 1974, has become one of the most effective aid agencies in the developing world, and various charitable funds associated with it have had a significant impact in its regions of activity.

Unlike Catholicism, in which vertical and horizontal transnationalism coexist, Islamic transnationalism is entirely horizontal. In addition to formal organizations such as the OIC, some clandestine or 'deniable' transnationalism is state supported. After the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan in 1979, for example, the United States, with the cooperation of Pakistani and Saudi Arabian security services, supported the recruitment and training of mercenaries from other countries, including Egypt, Algeria, the Yemen, and Sudan to operate alongside Afghan refugees from bases in Pakistan. This 'joint venture' subsequently turned against its initial sponsors. Relationships among like-minded groups are highly fluid, with loosely organized networks of ideological support, financing, and practical training (Sageman, 2008).

Islamic transnationalism is also manifested in nongovernmental movements such as the Muslim World League (Rabitat al-'alam al Islami). It sponsors educational programs, religious scholarships for students to study at Saudi and Muslim world universities, and a vigorous publication program throughout the world. Such nonstate organizations, particularly through their formal presentation of Islamic issues and standardization of language and approach, help create common ideological communities that transcend state and national frontiers. Such organizations also show an increasing concern over the situation of Muslim minorities throughout the world, bringing their plight to the wider Islamic community worldwide. The concern of these groups with Muslims living in North America, Europe, and Australia is reciprocated by the emigrants' active concern with the situation of coreligionists in their countries of origin or heritage and with the situation of Muslims in general. Other movements, such as those associated with the Turkish religious leader, Fetullah Gulen, are based on loosely connected clusters of supporters who lack formal central direction. Gulen's movement sponsors schools throughout Turkey, Central Asia, and Eastern Europe, as well as radio, newspaper, and television stations; notwithstanding the lack of central organization, the movement's educational and media programs have emerged as one of the most enduring forms of Turkish presence in Central Asia and Turkish immigrant communities in Europe, North America, and Australia (Turam, 2006).

An even less formal and structured form of transnationalism is represented by da'wa (call to Islam) movements such as the Tablighi Jama'at (Masud, 2000). Founded in India in 1927, the movement expanded worldwide after 1947 and currently operates in 80 countries. One principle of the movement is that the practice of Islam does not depend on educated elites alone. The movement's main efforts are directed at deepening the faith of other Muslims and, to promote unity, it avoids theological controversies and politics. South Asian in origin, the Tablighi Jama'at is also active in Europe, North America, and the Arab world. The movement offers no formal training institutes, although some institutions of religious learning are attached to Tablighi centers. Unlike other Muslim organizations, the Tablighi Jama'at lacks welfare or educational programs. Since the movement eschews the broadcast and print media as a matter of doctrine, its spread is entirely through personal contact. With its emphasis on strict adherence to rituals and a concern with the development of individual morality and renewal of personal faith rather than collective action and community change, the Tablighi movement has limited appeal to educated Muslims.

 Religious Identity and Globalization

Since the last third of the twentieth century, modern forms of travel, communication, and mass education have accelerated religious transnationalism - the flow of ideologies, access to information on organizational forms and tactics, and the transformation of formerly elite movements to mass ones - rendering obsolete earlier notions of frontier as defined primarily by geographical boundaries and accelerating in pace the earlier spread of ideas already speeded through the introduction of print technologies. Thus, the devotees of the North African Jewish saint, Baba Sali (Rabbi Israel Abou- hatzeira) meet not only in Israel and Morocco, but also in New York and Europe.

Especially in the Muslim majority world, the advent of mass higher education since the mid-twentieth century, combined with the proliferation of mass media and the greater ease of communication and travel, has led to a significant reimagining of religious and political identities. One change is that patterns of authority have become more diffuse and open. Religiously committed activists increasingly replace traditionally educated scholars as sources of authority. Second, religion has implicitly been systematized and objectified in the popular imagination, making it selfcontained and facilitating innovation. Questions such as ‘What is my religion?’, ‘Why is it important to my life?’, and ‘How do my beliefs guide my conduct?’ have become foregrounded in the lives of large numbers of believers, facilitating individual questioning and encouraging individuals to assume responsibility for their conduct and to participate in movements of social and political action. These transformations also mean that ‘authentic’ religious tradition and identity are foregrounded, questioned, and constructed rather than taken for granted. Finally, the greater access to education, like access to the mass media, has broadened senses of language and community. Just as the rise of written vernacular languages in Europe since the sixteenth century and the spread of print technology created language communities wider than those of face-to-face interactions, mass education and mass communications play a role in the contemporary world, transcending the narrow bases of local communities and dialects and creating new, if fluctuating, bases of religious identity.

See also: Buddhism; Christianity, Origins of; Citizenship, Historical Development of; Judaism; Religion: Nationalism and Identity; Transnational Citizenship.

 Bibliography

<biblio>

Adelkhah, F., 2012. Les mille et une frontieres de 1’Iran: Quand les voyages forment la nation. Karthala, Paris.

Albera, D., Couroucli, M. (Eds.), 2012. Sharing Sacred Spaces in the Mediterranean: Christians, Muslims, and Jews at Shrines and Sanctuaries. Indiana University Press, Bloomington, IN.

Beidelman, T.O., 1982. Colonial Evangelism. Indiana University Press, Bloomington, IN.

Casanova, J., 1994. Public Religions in the Modern World. University of Chicago Press, Chicago, IL.

Della Cava, R., 1993. 'Financing the faith': the case of Roman Catholicism. Journal of Church and State 35, 37-59.

Eickelman, D.F., Piscatori, J., 1990. Social theory in the study of Muslim societies. In: Eickelman, D.F., Piscatori, J. (Eds.), Muslim Travellers: Pilgrimage, Migration, and the Religious Imagination. Routledge, London, pp. 3-25.

Eickelman, D.F., Piscatori, J., 2003. Muslim Politics, new ed. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ.

Ernst, C.W., 2011. How to Read the Qur'an. University of North Carolina Press, Chapel Hill, NC.

Hofert, A., Salvatore, A., 2004. Between Europe and Islam: Shaping Modernity in a Transcultural Space, second ed. P.I.E.-Peter Lang, Brussels, Belgium.

Kepel, G., 2011. Banlieue de la republique. Gallimard, Paris.

Landau, J.M., 1994. The Politics of Pan-Islam: Ideology and Organization, second ed. Clarendon Press, Oxford, UK.

Levine, D.H., Stoll, D., 1997. Bridging the gap between empowerment and power in Latin America. In: Rudolph, S.H., Piscatori, J. (Eds.), Transnational Religion and Fading States. Westview Press, Boulder, CO, pp. 63-103.

Masud, M.K. (Ed.), 2000. Travellers in Faith: Studies of the Tablighi Jama‘at as a Transnational Islamic Movement for Faith Renewal. Brill, Leiden, The Netherlands.

Norton, A.R., 2009. Hizbollah: A Short Introduction, with New Afterword. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ.

Pemberton, K., Nijhawan, M. (Eds.), 2008. Shared Idioms, Sacred Symbols, and the Articulation of Identities in South Asia. Routledge, London, UK.

Rudolph, S.H., Piscatori, J. (Eds.), 1997. Transnational Religion and Fading States. Westview Press, Boulder, CO.

Sageman, M., 2008. Leaderless Jihad: Terrorist Networks in the Twenty-First Century. University of Pennsylvania Press, Philadelphia, PA.

Salvatore, A., 2007. The Public Sphere: Liberal Modernity, Catholicism, Islam. Palgrave Macmillan, New York, NY.

Smith, W.C., 1963. The Meaning and End of Religion: A New Approach to the Religious Traditions of Mankind. Macmillan, New York, NY.

Smith, W.R., 1956. The Religion of the Semites. Meridian Books, New York, NY.

Sumption, J., 1975. Pilgrimage: An Image of Mediaeval Religion. Faber & Faber, London, UK.

Turam, B., 2006. Between Islam and the State: The Politics of Engagement. Stanford University Press, Stanford, CA.

</biblio>

#title Near Middle East/North Africa Studies: Religion

#author Dale F. Eickelman

#date 2015

#source International Encyclopedia of the Social and Behavioral Sciences, 2nd edn, vol. 16, Oxford: Elsevier, 376-80.

#lang en

#pubdate 2024-07-23T14:14:10

#topics

#note Dartmouth College, American University of Kuwait Program, Hanover, NH, USA

#rights 2015 Elsevier Ltd. All rights reserved.

#DELETED temporarily

Abstract

The adherents to Islam, Christianity, and Judaism in the Middle East, while making universal claims for their respective faiths, increasingly recognize the significance of the highly varied local and particular contexts in which their religious symbols, ideas, and practices are understood. This ‘local knowledge’ also profoundly influences the understanding of ideas and practices considered global and universal. Since the midtwentieth century, the rise of mass education, the proliferation of new communications media, and the greater ease of travel have reconfigured how people think about their own and other religious traditions. These understandings are often distorted, but the fact of their existence is now foregrounded in the consciousness of many believers. Local traditions of belief and practice, earlier taken for granted, increasingly are seen as systems of meaning and action to be articulated and reformed, argued and explained.

 The Changed Setting for Religious Pluralism

Islam is the predominant religion in all the countries of the Middle East and North Africa with the obvious exception of Israel, where non-Jews make, primarily Arab Muslims and Christians, up 24% of the population. There are significant Christian and Jewish minorities throughout the region and the lives, doctrines, and practices of the carriers of all these faiths are intricately linked. As with Islam, the practice and understanding of Judaism and Christianity in the region have been highly diverse both in history and in the present, showing an ongoing creative tension between universalism and particularism. The labels ‘Muslim’, ‘Christian’, and ‘Jew’ — not to mention Zoroastrianism in Iran — aggregate the identities of distinct and often autonomous sectarian groups. Christians form significant minorities in Egypt, Lebanon, Iraq, Syria, and Turkey, and European settlers gave the North African states sizable Christian populations until the end of the colonial era in the midtwentieth century.

At the beginning of the twentieth century, Christians and Jews were widely distributed throughout the Middle East and North Africa (Planhol, 1997; Courbage and Fargues, 1997; Sanasarian, 2000). Until the late 1940s in northern Iraq, for example, Sunni Arab Muslims formed a majority of the population in Mosul, with Jews living in both Mosul and surrounding agricultural communities. Shii Turkomen tribes resided in outlying villages, as did communities of Monophysite, Assyrian, and Nestorian Christians. Likewise, Lebanon has 23 recognized Christian and Muslim religious sects, each with separate community identities. At the beginning of the twentieth century there were also thriving Jewish communities distributed widely throughout the region. Some of these remained vital for decades after the declaration of Israel as a state in 1948, and Morocco’s Jewish community, although reduced in numbers, remains vital to this day, with Morocco’s Jewish heritage formally recognized in its constitution (Gottreich and Schroeter, 2011).

Theologians and ideologues often highlight the distinctiveness of their respective faiths, but Muslims, Christians, and Jews in the region often share implicit background understandings and practices. Sacred spaces shared by all three faiths are found primarily only in Jerusalem and nearby places such as Hebron/al-Khalil, and shared Muslim and Jewish places of regional pilgrimage dot the Moroccan landscape and are equally venerated by Muslims and Jews. Such shared shrines continue to play a vital role in popular belief and practice. Thus in North Africa, festivals for Muslim saints (musims) and pilgrimages to regional shrines (ziyaras) have their counterpart in festivals (hillulas) for Jewish saints, with some shrines shared by the two faiths (Albera and Couroucli, 2012).

Variations in doctrine, religious practice, and traditions of shared memory also distinguish Muslim communities from one another. These include Sunni Muslims, the Shia (or ‘sectarians’, who comprise about 10% of Muslims worldwide and are further divided into numerous groups), and Ibadi Muslims of Oman, East Africa, and parts of Tunisia, Libya, and Algeria. The intellectual and educated elite often deny or downplay the significance of local, regional, and sectarian differences in faith and practice, but these practices often are powerfully linked to the local social order and continue to play a major role in the popular imagination.

‘Modernity’ in the form of uniform state schooling and mass communications often alters these practices, but does not erode them. Nonetheless, rising educational levels and the proliferation of communications media, including satellite television unrestrained by state authorities, are tilting the balance in favor of ideas and practices that can be explained, defended, and foregrounded in public.

 Explaining Religious Diversity and Change

Islam, like Judaism and Christianity, is rich and varied in its creativity and cultural expression. It is a challenge for Muslim believers and scholars, both Muslim and non-Muslim, to account for the variations of belief and practice as they have been expressed for over 1400 years in richly diverse cultural and historical traditions. As a response to this complexity, some scholars dismiss as non-Islamic or as incorrect those practices they consider not in accord with ‘central’ Islamic truths, even though people who hold such beliefs consider themselves fully Muslim. Some deal with these issues by seeing ‘foundation’ texts at the core of each religious tradition — the Qur’an in the case of Islam — and then seeing how successive generations understand and articulate them. If such texts and ideas are too closely bound to their original settings, no matter how persuasive for their original audience, they risk failing to attract wider audiences. Such texts must remain relevant to the social and political contexts of succeeding generations.

When first introduced in the late 1940s, the notion of ‘Great’ and ‘Little’ traditions offered one way of coming to terms with the universal and the particular in religious expression and practice. The Great/Little tradition contrast rekindled an interest in how popular understandings of religion — the ‘little’, localized, traditions — were related to elite, literary ones. It also encouraged attention to the specifics of who advocated or explained particular religious orientations and practices, whether they were influential in their own society or marginal, appealing primarily to a particular social group or category (Von Grunebaum, 1955). In some settings, individuals claiming descent from the family of the Prophet Muhammad were given precedence. The concept of the Great/Little tradition encouraged exploring the links among religious ideas and practices, authority, and influence.

Often, however, the concept was employed only to juxtapose statements of ‘essential’ Islamic principles, as elaborated in standard texts and by educated Muslims, with inventories of local religious practices. For example, the study of trance and possession states (called zar cults in the Sudan and East Africa), often indicative of the affective side of religious traditions, was often frequently relegated to the ‘little’ tradition side of the divide and attributed primarily to women.

Yet such ideas and practices also shed light on ideas of the person and how both women and men in societies with such practices express and explore alternative social realities (Boddy, 1989). Mosque-centered activities such as Friday prayers, almost the exclusive domain of men, often have been seen as part of the ‘great’ tradition. Women, who often predominate in visits to local shrines and in zar cults, are then seen as sustainers of ‘local’ traditions. This gendered division is made all the more plausible by the fact that until recent decades women had lower levels of education and mobility than men. An alternative explanation, however, is to see mosque-oriented and shrine-oriented practices as integrally complementary, and which must be ‘read’ together as a unit in order to understand religious practice (Tapper and Tapper, 1987).

In North Africa, Hammoudi (1993) suggested the explanatory utility of linking the canonical Muslim sacrificial feast associated with the annual pilgrimage to Mecca with practices such as Bujlud, a carnival-like masquerade in Morocco’s Berber highlands that follows a few days after the canonical feast. Colonial ethnographers regarded the two events as separate, as do Muslim intellectuals. In the masquerade, a young male villager dons the skin of a sacrificial animal and assumes the character of Bujlud (‘the wearer of the skins’), and with his cohorts cavorts noisily throughout the village, sacrilegiously mocking established religious and social conventions, entering homes, and bantering obscenely with women. Hammoudi argues that the masquerade evokes the contradictions implicit in the cultural classifications that regulate ordinary behavior, including gender roles, directing caricature and self-directed irony against local social hierarchies, tradition, and innovation. The canonical Muslim sacrifice, on the other hand, embodies the ideal community. The canonical sacrifice and masquerade inherently conjoin ritual piety and impiety, embodying an ongoing contest over significance and interpretation in which existing and alternative social orders are embodied and intertwined.

 Ritual and Belief in Morocco

In the late 1960s, Morocco became ‘good to think with’ for understanding religion in complex societies, just as the Trobriand Islands had earlier entered the anthropological canon for understanding exchange systems and India for understanding caste and stratification. The ethnographies of Morocco's colonial era did not lend themselves to comparative studies or lead to disciplinary classics. The publication of Clifford Geertz's Islam Observed (1971), originally a series of lectures delivered to historians of religion, marked a breakthrough in linking religious studies in general to the ethnographic study of specific cultural traditions. Geertz took for granted the unity of the Islamic tradition, but emphasized the highly divergent ways in time and space that it articulated with social experience. His point of departure was Islam as experienced, interpreted, and practiced from the fifteenth century to the present in Indonesia and Morocco, the two antipodes of the Muslim majority world. For Geertz, Islamic symbols and meanings are culturally defined and socially shared, like all other systems of meaning. If commonsense gives shared meaning to immediate practical experience, religion offers a higher and more general interpretive order. These two systems of meaning — commonsense and religion — are intricately intertwined, both shaped by historical experience and giving shape to it.

A key element of Geertz's argument was to explore the constructed meanings of sainthood and Sufism (mysticism) in the two contrasting settings. In Morocco, individuals with highly varied attributes — reputations for piety, scholarship, miracle working, or other distinctions — were popularly imputed with saintly authority. Since the current Moroccan social order took hold in the fifteenth century, Geertz argued, the cultural order in which Moroccan ideas of saintly authority was sustained was characterized by a 'strong man' politics of zealous warriors, rulers, and saints enforcing their will and inducing clients to act on their behalf. Their authority was charismatic, based on personal dominance. In contrast, the Indonesian view of sainthood is hierarchical. Saints incrementally achieved prominence through years of meditation and Indonesia's settled agricultural villages placed high value on cooperation and order.

In the contexts of both Indonesia and Morocco, the idea of saintly authority took significantly divergent forms because of the contrasting nexus of commonsense perceptions of the world and the different historically constructed senses of meaning through which Indonesians and Moroccans interpreted Islam. These commonsense perceptions and background understandings form the necessary point of departure for understanding religious belief, experience, and practice. Indeed, the perspectives of religion and commonsense are intertwined in a dynamic, often unstable, dialectic (Zein, 1977; Eickelman, 2005).

Theologians and ‘common’ people interpret religious texts, including the ‘foundation’ texts of religious traditions such as the Qur’an, in multiple and contested ways. Thus, the most common term for saint in contemporary Morocco is ‘pious one’ (salih), although ‘marabout’, the term used by Geertz and which has made its way into French and English usage, is also understood. ‘Pious one’ conveys the multivalence of Moroccan usage. For educated Moroccans, the term is reserved solely for individuals of outstanding piety, and many speak of saint, or maraboutic, cults as ‘pre-Islamic’ vestiges. For many other Moroccans, however, both in towns and in rural areas, the ‘pious ones’, living or dead, are imputed with mystical powers, including the ability to secure positive outcomes for individuals and groups who have maintained a connection with them through gifts or donations to their descendants (Eickelman, 1976). Moroccan monarchs and senior government officials continue publicly to visit the shrines of pious ones and make gifts toward their maintenance. Elsewhere in the Muslim world there is a similar interplay between different notions of piety, and there is a similar dialectic of ideas of sainthood among Jews of North African origin (Weingrod, 1990).

The emphasis Geertz placed on the cultural dimension in understanding religious experience suggested an alternative to characterizing religious traditions in terms of an essential core prevalent in all places and for all historical periods. His approach instead stresses how systems of religious meaning and practice, like all cultural experience, are contested and dynamic, and therefore not reduced to a single, cohesive set of principles. Some conceptions of Islam are significantly intertwined with, although not limited to, the local social order. However, other conceptions are more universalistic and global, amenable to articulation with a wide range of contexts. These universalistic and particularistic conceptions are copresent and in a dynamic, often volatile, tension with one another.

Geertz’s approach, like other efforts to understand religious expression and practice in Moroccan society and elsewhere, including Ernest Gellner’s Muslim Society (1981) — note the singular — had significant implications for understanding religious expression in earlier historical periods and outside the Muslim majority world. For example, Brown (1981) notes that his understanding of the moral order of early Latin Christianity, the ‘lasting, urgent problems of any civilized community — friendship and protection, justice, power and mercy’ — were in part inspired by ethnographies of contemporary North African saints. Similarly, Cornell (1998) shows how medieval Moroccan arguments on the nature of sainthood — cultural understanding of and debates among mystics in both urban and rural settings about concepts related to God’s love and authority from the eleventh through sixteenth centuries — contributed to the Sufi tradition elsewhere in the Muslim world. Cornell’s argument also compares the North African experience with sainthood as understood and practiced in Europe in the same period. Writings on Judaism in North African and Middle Eastern societies likewise indicate a reemphasis on the cultural dimension and explore the significance of local cultural contexts (Deshen, 1989; Goldberg, 1996; Gottreich and Schroeter, 2011).

 The Iranian Revolution and Religious Politics

The 1978–79 Iranian revolution was one of several major events that underscored the continued significance of religion in politics and public life, notwithstanding its neglect in most midtwentieth century discussions concerning modernization and modernity. In Iran itself, the revolution led to the creation of a new, rapidly changing religious idiom for interpreting religious, social, and political events — and to contesting them (Khosrokhavar, 1997; Adelkhah, 2012). The debates in Iran continue unabated over the form that an Islamic state should take and the role that religion should play in society, including gender relations (e.g., Mir-Hosseini, 1999; Adelkhah, 2000). Successive incremental decisions and the unanticipated outcomes of earlier ones meant that the revolution looked different in the decades after the event both to many of those who participated in it and to the majority of Iranians not even born when it happened. Some observers use the term ‘postIslamism’ to describe Iranian society in the 1990s, emphasizing the significantly different way that many Iranians, including many clerics, began to argue publicly for a more limited role of religious institutions in Iranian politics and public life (Khosrokhavar and Roy, 1999).

In spite of contemporaneous hopes for some and fears for others at the time of the Iranian revolution, it did not trigger similar political movements in other Muslim majority countries. It did, however, compel regimes elsewhere in the Middle East, both secular (including Egypt, Turkey, Syria, and Algeria) and religiously oriented (including Morocco and Saudi Arabia) to become more attentive to popular understandings of social justice and religion in society. From the first decades of the twentieth century, new religious movements emerged that had distinctly modern political forms. Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood, founded in the late 1920s and regarded by the midtwentieth century as Egypt's only genuinely popular mass political movement, foreshadowed the growth of similar later Islamic movements, many of which benefit from their ability to attract leaders with strong skills in organization and communication. Distinctly modern in organizational form, with a clear hierarchy and (at least at the outset) formal criteria for membership, the Brotherhood's leadership rested not with traditionally educated religious scholars but with those effective in organizing their followers and articulating their values, providing social and medical services as well as religious inspiration in many communities. After the fall of the Mubarak regime in Egypt in February 2011, Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood reemerged as a powerful political force, but with strong competition from other secular and religious groups. As after many changes in political authority, those kept by force from exercising political authority and rights in Egypt and elsewhere in the region show inexperience in managing the state machinery once in office. The result has been to engender significant competition from both religious groups, whether or not formally organized for political purposes, and secular ones.

As dramatic as the events of the 2011 'Arab Spring' were in some parts of the Middle East, they were in many ways the culmination of long-term shifts in economy, society, and religious expression and practice. As early as the 1960s, for example, the Muslim Brotherhood and similar organizations looked conservative in contrast to the proliferation of movements advocating the Islamization of politics and society. These 'Islamist' movements ranged from small, radical groups such as the one responsible for the assassination of Egypt's Anwar Sadat in 1981 to larger ones sometimes organized like political parties, such as Hizbullah of Lebanon, the Virtue Party of Turkey (succeeded in 2001 by the Justice and Development Party (AKP)), or the Islamic Salvation Front of Algeria. Some of these Islamist movements had their origins as ‘spokesmen for the despised’, and had Jewish and Christian analogues (Appleby, 1997; Marty and Appleby, 1995). In general, the influence of extremists, having taken off in the late 1960s, appeared to have waned by the 1990s (Kepel, 2000), only to have subsequently regained momentum. Most movements work within existing national boundaries, even if they sometimes receive external or transnational support. Some movements have advocated violence to achieve their goals, but others have been strong advocates of tolerance and civil society, and many movements have altered as they enter the mainstream of national political life.

 Religion as System and Ideology

Since the latter half of the twentieth century, mass education and the proliferation of new communications media have profoundly altered how religious knowledge and practice are produced and understood in the Middle East. In the Arab world, for example, large numbers of people now have the level of literacy needed to follow religious and political debates from multiple sources and the command of formal language needed to participate effectively in public life. The religious lessons learned from state schooling may be regarded with skepticism, but like other aspects of state schooling, they inculcate the habits of thought and language needed to learn about and elaborate alternative views of the role of religion in society.

Ironically, the ideas of many radical Islamists mirror competing secular ideologies in form and structure. The writings of Sayyid Qutb, executed by Nasser’s Egypt in 1966, attracted a wide audience among white-collar workers, professionals, and students, the beneficiaries of modern education. In Arabic and in translation, Qutb’s writings continue to have widespread appeal because they offer ‘Islamic’ explanations for contemporary political and economic developments and for the perceived injustices of existing regimes. More contemporary religious ideologues, like Morocco’s ‘Abd al-Salam Yasin (1928–2012), argue that contemporary Muslim societies have been de-Islamized by imported ideologies and values. Yet the style and content of these writers, like others, imply an audience already familiar with the secular, imported ideologies against which they argue. This is the case even for the writings and speeches of Osama bin Laden (1957–2011) (Euben and Zaman, 2009). Implicitly, they also convey a sense of Islam as an ideology and objectified system of meaning, which can be conveyed as one subject among others in schools, and in catechism-like pamphlets. In this sense, religion forms one of several systems of meaning in modern society, even as some believers argue that Islam is a ‘complete’ way of life. Yet the argument of ‘completion’ does not mean closure. As Iqtidar (2011) argues in a key study on a leading Islamic group in Pakistan that has moderated its views and practices as it becomes more mainstream, the contents of shari’a and ‘tradition’ are constantly contested and adapted to changing social and economic circumstances.

The awareness of alternatives to immediate social circumstances is facilitated by the increased availability of contemporary forms of communication, ranging from the press and broadcast media to readily duplicated DVD (which have largely replaced audio cassettes), ubiquitous mobile telephones, and the Internet. In an earlier era, state authorities easily regulated the media. By the end of the twentieth century, the top-down asymmetry of broadcast radio and television was reversed by newer media that are readily adaptive, interactive, and difficult for states effectively to control. These developments have contributed to the fragmentation of religious and political authority by allowing large numbers of people to participate in an increasingly public debate over the symbolic language of Islam (Eickelman and Anderson, 2003). Combined with political change and the growth of diaspora communities, these developments indicate a changed social and cultural environment for religious expression and practice in which a mass and anonymous public has given way to one characterized by an increased multiplicity of horizontal relationships. The shift to a network society has created communities and communicative spaces in which large numbers of people, while not abandoning their ties of family and community, discover and create alternative ways of thinking about the role of the sacred in society and politics.

Seealso:Transnational Religious Identities (Islam, Catholicism, and Judaism): Cultural Concerns.

 Bibliography

<biblio>

Adelkhah, F., 2000. Being Modern in Iran. Columbia University Press, New York.

Adelkhah, F., 2012. Les mille et une frontierres de l’Iran: Quand les voyages forment la nation. Karthala, Paris.

Appleby, M. (Ed.), 1997. Spokesmen for the Despised: Fundamentalist Leaders of the Middle East. University of Chicago Press, Chicago, IL.

Albera, D., Couroucli, M. (Eds.), 2012. Shaping Sacred Spaces in the Mediterranean: Christians, Muslims, and Jews at Shrines and Sanctuaries. Indiana University Press, Bloomington, IN.

Boddy, J., 1989. Wombs and Alien Spirits: Women, Men, and the Zar Cult in Northern Sudan. University of Wisconsin Press, Madison, WI.

Brown, P., 1981. The Cult of the Saints: Its Rise and Function in Latin Christianity. University of Chicago Press, Chicago, IL.

Cornell, V.J., 1998. Realm of the Saints: Power and Authority in Moroccan Sufism. University of Texas Press, Austin, TX.

Courbage, Y., Fargues, P., 1997. Christians and Jews under Islam. Tauris, London.

Deshen, S., 1989. The Mellah Society: Jewish Community in Sherifian Morocco. University of Chicago Press, Chicago, IL.

Eickelman, D.F., 1976. Moroccan Islam: Tradition and Society in a Pilgrimage Center.

University of Texas Press, Austin, TX.

Eickelman, D.F., Anderson, J., 2003. Redefining muslim publics. In: Eickelman, D.F., Anderson, J. (Eds.), New Media in the Muslim World: The Emerging Public Sphere, second ed. Indiana University Press, Bloomington, IN.

Eickelman, D.F., 2005. In: Geertz, Clifford, Shweder, R.A., Good, B., et al. (Eds.), Clifford Geertz and Islam. University of Chicago Press, Chicago, IL.

Euben, R.L., Zaman, M.Q., 2009. Princeton Readings in Islamist Thought: Texts and Contexts from al-Banna to Bin Laden. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ.

Geertz, C., 1971. Islam Observed: Religious Development in Morocco and Indonesia. University of Chicago Press, Chicago, IL.

Gellner, E., 1969. Saints of the Atlas. University of Chicago Press, Chicago, IL.

Gellner, E., 1981. Muslim Society. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK.

Goldberg, H. (Ed.), 1996. Sephardi and Middle Eastern Jewries: History and Culture.

Indiana University Press, Bloomington, IN.

Gottreich, E.B., Schroeter, D.J. (Eds.), 2011. Jewish Culture and Society in North Africa. Indiana University Press, Bloomington, IN.

Hammoudi, A., 1993. The Victim and Its Masks: An Essay on Sacrifice and Masquerade in the Maghreb. University of Chicago Press, Chicago, IL.

Iqtidar, H., 2011. Secularizing Islamists? Jama'at-e-Islami and Jama'at-ud-Da'wa in Urban Pakistan. University of Chicago Press, Chicago, IL.

Kepel, G., 2000. Jihad, expansion et declin de l'Islamisme. Gallimard, Paris.

Khosrokhavar, F., 1997. Anthropologie de la revolution Iranienne: La reve impossible.

L'Harmattan, Paris.

Khosrokhavar, F., Roy, O., 1999. Iran: Comment sortir d'une revolution religieuse. Seuil, Paris.

Marty, M., Appleby, R.S. (Eds.), 1995. Fundamentalisms Compared. University of Chicago Press, Chicago, IL.

Mir-Hosseini, Z., 1999. Islam and Gender: The Religious Debate in Contemporary Iran. Princeton University Press, Princeton, NJ.

Planhol, X., 1997. Minorites en Islam: Geographie politique et sociale. Flammarion, Paris.

Sanasarian, E., 2000. Religious Minorities in Iran. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, UK.

Tapper, N., Tapper, R., 1987. The birth of the prophet: ritual and gender in Turkish Islam. Man (n.s.). 22, 69–92.

Von Grunebaum, G.E. (Ed.), 1955. Unity and Variety in Muslim Civilization. University of Chicago Press, Chicago, IL.

Weingrod, A., 1990. The Saint of Beersheba. State University of New York Press, Albany, NY.

Zeghal, M., 2008. Islamism in Morocco: Religion, Authoritarianism, and Electoral Politics. Markus Weiner, Princeton, NJ.

Zein, A.H., 1977. Beyond ideology and theology: the search for the anthropology of Islam. Annual Review of Anthropology 6, 227–254.

</biblio>

X

X

X

X

X

X

X

X

X

X

X

X

X